Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?

By Albert Parker Fitch

"Can the church survive in the changing order?" It is a real question. We have a way of supposing that she cannot perish, but there is no such a thing as permanency of this sort in the social structure.

The question is not only real, it is grave, important. At few other times in man's mental and moral history has he more needed the guiding and steadying leadership of a strong religious organization than now.

Can the church survive in the changing order? Well, the answer will depend upon the extent and character of her faith. The day has come for dropping a liberal apologetic for scholastic Christianity; for trying to define ancient phrases which once carried an open and ingenuous meaning; for reinterpreting historical movements so as to make them un-historically acceptable; for reading twentieth century sophistries into good third century metaphysics.

Princess Salome

A Tale of the Days of Camel-Bells

By Dr. Burris Jenkins

A vivid picture of the Palestine of Christ, a vital story of the dawn of faith, and an inspiring message that touches the heart with the spirit of a warm and living Christianity. Dr. Jenkins is known to thousands as a minister of the Disciples of Christ, as a publisher of a large Kansas City Daily, and as a man of many and varied activities. Nation-wide reputation as a writer of religious fiction, however, was reserved until the publication of PRINCESS SALOME. It fulfills the promise of great literary achievement that was given in his previous work, THE PROTESTANT.

George A. Miller, President of the International Convention of Disciples of Christ, says of PRINCESS SALOME: "It will produce faith and love in many cold and indifferent hearts and lives." Price $2.00 (12c postage).

Pittsburgh Ministers Not For Sale

THE Pittsburgh Ministerial Association has issued a sharp and well deserved rebuke to the Employers' Association of their city for its interference with the Y. W. C. A. financial campaign, and its threat of withdrawing money support from the Federal Council of Churches on account of the latter's "social creed." Declaring that the church must guard its freedom to declare the Christian teaching without dictation from the outside, and recognizing that there is room for diversity of opinion, the ministers say: "We the Pittsburgh Ministerial Union resent this attempt of a commercial organization to prescribe limits within which alone the church and other religious organizations may move; we reaffirm the right and duty of the church to proclaim the whole truth of Christ as revealed in the Scriptures and as applied under the Holy Spirit to every relationship in life; we deny to any political, commercial, industrial or any other group or agency the right to set any restrictions on the freedom of the Christian church or its agencies to apply the spirit and standards of the kingdom of God to the whole of life; we declare it our solemn duty and purpose to defend this liberty of the gospel." Recently when Bishop Williams of the Episcopal diocese of Michigan offered his resignation because of criticism of his social message, the diocesan convention passed the following resolution in refusing it: "Resolved, that this convention desires to go on record as standing unqualifiedly for the American right to free speech on the part of the bishop and clergy, regardless of our respective and individual points of view, believing with confidence in the ultimate power of the gospel of Christ, and desiring only that that shall prevail in all phases of our modern life." There is an ineradicable conscience in the Christian church that will rebuke, in its own good time, all attempts to throttle its mission.

Is Education a Help or a Handicap?

A WIDESPREAD impression has been created by propagandists that educated ministers are not efficient. Especially is it said of university trained men that they are not evangelistic. During the past year a committee of the Northern Baptist Convention has been investigating schools and colleges not only for heresy, but for efficiency. The facts they discovered with regard to University of Chicago minister graduates showed that these are strongly evangelistic. By ninety-two ministers investigated, 11,000 people had been baptized in five years. These same men had added about 11,000 other people to their churches in the five years, making a total of 22,000. Their churches had averaged two thousand dollars a year each for the various denominational benevolences and missions. At the same time the men from a popular short course institution of premillennarian views were investigated. These had averaged only five baptisms per annum through five years. They had failed in the very thing in which they have been popularly supposed to be very efficient. These under-trained men raised only $200 per year on the average for the various benevolences. Facts like these have been gathered in great abundance by the Baptist committee. No one can ever tell the committee again that they must look to short-course men for the building of strong spiritual churches with the missionary outlook. They know it is not happening that way. Meanwhile thoughtful people know that young people are pouring out of the universities by the thousand to take their places in various towns and cities where they will reside. These young people can be held for the church only by pastors and leaders who understand the university culture. So long as a denomination has an undersupply of ministers of the best culture, it must expect to leak at the top, losing its people to other denominations that really do believe in an educated ministry.

Shall America Allow the Annihilation of Armenia?

THE French are withdrawing from Cilicia and leaving to the mercy of the Turks the Armenian population whom they used as soldiers in the fight on the Turks and in occupation of the country. The Turks declare they will rebuild their ruined mosques with the skulls of Armenians. There is no refuge for them except to retreat with the retreating army into French Syria, and that the army officials refuse to permit. They are destitute and there is no place to go. Unless there is intervention from some strong outside power or powers, they are condemned to the same awful massacre as has been suffered by their million martyred compatriots. Kemal Pasha has given no securities for the Armenians under his control, and the great powers stand to deliver them over to his tender mercies as a result of their quarrel with Greece. The American Committee on Near East Relief has gathered from the American people more than $60,000,000 and with it saved not less than a million lives, but continued warfare has created starvation faster than they have been able to save its victims. The charity of our Christians will not keep up with the savagery of the Turk, and the political chicanery of the powers that control the destinies of the near east. The time has come when palliation will not suffice. Christian America must take some steps to stop the flow of blood. It is within the power of our government. All the world knows we have no territorial ambitions and that our interference would be on behalf of humanity alone. If we could send millions to save Europe from the civilized Prussian, cannot we do something effective in the same vicarious way to save long-suffering Armenia from the hand of savage Turks? What curious distemper has seized us that the cry of women and children so little appeals to our governmental power?

The Tumultuous Minority

THE theological conservative, impotent by reasons of his meager numbers in many of the great religious conventions of America, seeks to make himself felt by sheer weight of noise. He knows that this embarrasses men of fine sensibilities and leads them to seek compromises. Among the Disciples for many years a small minority has secured concessions through sheer force of lung power. Distributed in the galleries as on football bleachers, they cheer their champions on. The Baptists have for two years been embarrassed by such a noisy contingent. The consideration of the adoption of a creed at Des Moines, presumably an intellectual exercise, was not very different in spirit from the psychology of the crowd that yelled for some hours, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." Without doubt the fear of unfavorable publicity on account of this noisy contingent led the Baptist leaders of decent feeling to do things which would not otherwise have been done. This tumultuous minority is always demanding special parliamentary privileges not found in the rules of order of any parliamentary body. With cries of "steam-roller" they frighten the chairman. The only truly orderly national convention of religious bodies are those where long ago it was realized that there can be no justice and no real peace save as these ideals are realized through law and order. A Methodist General Conference would not hesitate to deal drastically with any one who sought to arouse a tumult. Government by means of a cheering squad would be an absurd suggestion in a Presbyterian General Assembly. Nurses who take care of tiny babies in the hospitals know that they are not to run to the creche every time the infant raises a shout. Such treatment spoils babies. Chairmen of national church conventions have only to deny the wailing infants of reactionism their demands to make good children out of them, and introduce an era of decent parliamentary practice and genuine religious feeling.

Cities Find Out About Themselves

ALL over the country the city survey idea is taking hold. City mission organizations and church federations have been gathering statistics. Des Moines, Ia., has been finding out about herself. She discovers that Methodists pay the smallest average salary to ministers, $1,890, while Congregationalists pay the largest, $4,266. In between are Disciples, $2,170; Baptists, $2,348; and Presbyterians, $2,427. When these figures are given proper publicity in the city they should serve to shame Methodists and Disciples into more generous giving, especially in view of the fact that both denominations are particularly strong in Des Moines. The Baptists are the body second in importance among the Protestant forces of Rochester, N. Y. This rapidly growing city has increased from 162,608 in 1900 to 295,750 in 1920. Meanwhile immigrants have poured in and metropolitan conditions have come to obtain. The Baptist Sunday school attendance in 1901 was 3,676, while in 1920 it was 3,417. Only three years ago it had declined to 2,907. This in spite of the fact that the church membership has increased from 5,251 to 7,995 in the same period. The Baptist Young People's Union now has an average attendance of 256 in the whole city, a little over one half the figures of twenty years ago. The failure of the churches to grip young people is seen in the statistics which show that the Baptist churches have in their membership 33 per cent men, 56 per cent women, 6 per cent girls and 5 per cent boys. Eleven per cent of boys and girls in a church membership indicates a condition far from healthy. Such statistics as these are being gathered all over the country on a large number of subjects. Sometimes the statistics-makers are not very careful, as when they show 10,000 unchurched Disciples in Des Moines, and similar statistics for other denominations. Just in proportion as these statistics are truly scientific they will aid the churches to that careful understanding of their problem which will command the respect of intelligent community leaders.

Psycho-Analysis and Hell-Fire Preaching

PSYCHO-ANALYSIS is the latest fad among the sciences. Without discussing here its merits or its demerits it is interesting to consider one particular in which the psycho-analyst and the old-fashioned evangelical preacher agree. It pays to give attention to one's sins. The psycho-analyst says that so long as perverted desires are concealed in the bottom of our minds and half-forgotten, they constitute a continual moral menace to us. If they are brought out into the light of day and given their just sentence, they will soon be robbed of their power. The old-fashioned preacher thought that it was worth while to preach against sin. Sinners in the past were made to tremble in the presence of an angry God. Too many modern preachers have thought that a true and adequate psychology of virtue lay in directing the thoughts toward the beautiful. Without knowing it, many of these modernists have practiced Christian Science on sin, if not by denying its existence, then by completely ignoring it as a factor in individual and social life. The older evangelical preacher made the starting point of all his work the arousal of the conscience of his hearers. Without the sense of sin there could be no repentance and no forgiveness. The doctrine of hell-fire was perhaps his best method of making vivid his aversion for the sins which he described. The old forms of speech are, of course, no longer usable, nor indeed the older concepts of the nature of punishment, but it is forever true that the approach to the soul's deepest problems is only along the pathway of an honest facing of the sinfulness of the perverted instincts and desires.

Victory for the Clothing Workers

AFTER a combined strike and lockout lasting several months the New York clothing workers seem to have won for the new and better order in industrial relations. The Amalgamated Garment Workers, under the enlightened leadership of such men as Sydney Hillman, have brought a new order of things into their industry. In Chicago, Rochester and other garment making centers they have inaugurated a form of shop representation, a wage board and a scientific method of insuring production on the part of the workers and of economy on the part of the management. This plan also prohibits profiteering and thus gives an incentive to increased efficiency in the shops, for it is no use to demand that the workers produce more unless there is some assurance that they will share in the increased profits of production. The New York garment makers are neither organized nor homogeneous and there was a spasmodic movement to lock out the organized workers and force them back to the sweat shop conditions from which their organizations had lifted them. The overplus of made-up goods on hand through the postwar slump fortified them for the war; they preferred to hold up prices on goods on hand to selling on a small margin and continuing production. After many months the workers, with hungry days behind them and the help of many sympathizers who could give more of sympathy than of bread and butter, have won. New contracts are being signed up in which the employees accept the current reduction in wage, maintain their unions and retain the boards of wage adjustment. Many will remember the great Chicago strike that put the garment making trades here on this basis of a scientific wage adjustment with labor representation, and they know too of the satisfaction both employers and employees find in it. It offers a way of peace to all industry.

Can a Denomination Be Bribed?

A MILLION and a half dollars is a neat sum of money to be offered by one individual to the treasury of a missionary society of a Christian denomination. When one reflects upon the vast labor to which the churches are put in collecting the funds needed for their expansion work at home and abroad, it is a thrilling moment when a church organization falls upon the opportunity of getting in one lump from a single source a sum greater than its entire receipts from all other sources combined. Visions of immense service rise up before the minds of the strenuous solicitors as they contemplate the work that can be done by means of such a donation.

Denominational ambition and pride leap at the opportunity, and a natural sense of gratitude to the generous proposer of the gift releases impulses which easily override the counsel of those who would calmly examine any terms or conditions on which the money is to pass into the administrative control of the organization. After all, it is not polite to look into a gift horse's mouth, and something like a feeling of ungraciousness arises in an eager, aggressive body, such as a Christian denomination is, when it is proposed to debate the conditions attaching to a generous act of so great magnitude. And even if a furtive examination of the conditions is made, the sum of money offered is so bulky and objective a thing and its power for good is so indisputable that any scruples arising out of the conditions attached to it are likely to seem at the moment pale and super-refined and academic in comparison.

This, no doubt, is the psychology that explains the act of the Northern Baptist Convention in voting by about three to two to accept the gift of an anonymous donor to the home missions society who affixed to his gift a creedal statement, presumably of his own writing, as a condition of its acceptance by the society. Yet those who believe in the unescapable power and the transcendent authority of moral considerations, can hardly doubt that when once the first flood of enthusiasm at the prospect opened up by this unprecedented gift has ebbed out, the conscience of the Baptist body will reassert itself and the denomination will see that in accepting the gift, it sacrificed infinitely more than it can possibly hope to gain. Whatever casuistical apologetic may be brought forward to justify denominational ambition and pride in an hour when the practical and sectarian imagination is kindled with a flame that seems irresistibly to devour all doubts and scruples, the moral imagination will be kindled into another sort of flame in its own due time. The day of euphemism and casuistry is short, the day of reality and truth is long. And Baptists, than whom there is no group of Christian people more discerning of naked moral values, will some day wake up to the stark and vulgar fact that they allowed their denomination to be bribed, to be bribed for a sum of money whose very magnitude eclipsed those moral considerations which, had the amount offered been sufficiently less, would have brought hot words to their lips wherewith to spurn the donor's proposal.

With Baptists the creed-making business was historically abandoned with the passing of the New Hampshire and Philadelphia confessions of faith. They have built up within their great body a conscience on the point of the sufficiency of the New Testament as a rule of faith and practice, leaving to individual souls the right of interpretation of the Scriptures under the guidance of the Spirit of God. The cardinal, the fundamental principle of Baptists has come to be loyal obedience to Jesus Christ. Backed historically by their great doctrines of the soul's direct access to God, and of liberty of conscience, the use of a human creed came inevitably to be a stumbling block and an impertinence in the path of progress and in the free unfolding of spiritual experience. For nearly a century it has been a Baptist boast that they were untrammelled by any formulation of man, and bound only by the authority of Christ and the inspired Scripture. This position has been held by all schools and wings of Baptist thought, conservative and liberal, in north and south alike. It is of the very genius of Baptist conviction that in the will of Christ as revealed in the New Testament the church possesses all that is needed for its unity, its progress and its discipline, without any human authoritative supplementation.

The action of the Des Moines convention in accepting a creedal formulation as a canon to which the home missionary organization must be bound in the administration of its work is a direct violation of Baptist history and genius. That the Baptist denomination possesses the right in good conscience to reverse its historic contention and to change its conviction goes without saying. But the Des Moines convention cannot convince the judging world, nor even the Baptist denomination, that the acceptance of the rich man's creed was an act of "good conscience" in pursuance of a deliberate policy to reverse denominational history and to erect new standards. The historic genius of a great denomination is not changed over night. The simple truth is that the convention, led perhaps by secretarial ambition, backed by denominational pride, was dazzled by the shining dollars, a million and a half of them, and sold its historic birthright, and now stands, with its overflowing treasury, in an even less enviable position than guileless Esau who sold his for only a mess of pottage.

Does anyone suppose that the creedal condition would have been accepted had it been tied to a gift of $100,000? Or if peradventure that sum may seem large enough to create a situation of moral overstrain, does anyone suppose that the donor of $1,000 could have induced the convention to accept his creed with his gift? There is not a Baptist with any degree of sensitiveness to the historic Baptist genius who will say so. But why will a Christian body juggle with its convictions when the price is a million and a half, and stand fast upon its principles when the price is only $1000? Does a Christian denomination, too, have its price? Here, alas, is fuel upon which the flame of cynicism is sure to feed.

It will be said, perhaps, that the creed is an innocuous one, that its items are evangelical truisms. But this, even if true, is beside the point. The problem which its acceptance creates is a problem of principle, not of mere fact. What is to prevent another rich man coming along with another gift, and another creedal statement of conditions, in the main identical with this, but differing in its inclusion of one or two points not so obviously catholic but more theological? He will surely be followed by another and another. Here is the devil's device for creating schism and for bringing reproach on the church. There is no end to the process of such a method of creed-making, and no end to the heart-burnings and hypocrisies and alienations that result from it.

But the fact is that the creedal statement which this Baptist convention accepted is far from unambiguity. Every section of it carries its own antinomies. The terms used—"inspiration and authority of the Scriptures," "deity of Jesus," "incarnation," "atoning death," "bodily resurrection," "personal, visible return," "evangelization of the world"—are the very battle-ground of two world views, one of which—and no doubt the traditional one—the unsophisticated donor holds. Men of the modern mind subscribe to the same words as do men of the traditional mind, but the two types of mind invest the words with meanings that are so far apart as to be almost incommensurable. Now by what standards are the administrators of this fund to interpret the theological items to which their right to administer it is tied up? Will they make a broad interpretation? Or will they adopt the method of strict construction, striving to find and to follow out the exact meaning which their author conceived his words to have? If the first, it is clear that the author's purpose is defeated. He will be dealt with falsely, treacherously, by the agency to which he has entrusted his gift. The hypocrisy into which such a duty inevitably forces a church body lays a fatal blight upon pure and undefiled religion. If the second, the denomination consents to mortgage the future, to tie the mind of its missionaries for generations with a cord fashioned and bound by a dead hand. A creed like this never can be revised. Yet any creed must be in time revised. The whole history of creed-making indicates that no group of theologians, calmly and with infinite pains, could write a creed that needed no revision.

What reason is there to believe that this rich layman, untrained in systematic thinking can do so? Indeed there is a positively ludicrous reason for not believing it, for we are told that while the convention was actually engaged in debating the acceptance of the gift the agents of the author-donor were compelled to announce a revision dictated by the author himself! It is astounding that the deputies of an intelligent, free-spirited denomination, after the bitter lessons of three centuries of Protestant creed-making, could consent to such a transaction.

More serious yet are the evident implications of a particular one of the items of the creed, the last one. The author-donor sets it down as something worth saying, that the beneficiaries of his fund must hold that the chief business of Baptist churches is "the evangelization of the world." Here is an innocent enough looking statement, to which any good Christian, traditional or modern in his point of view, will heartily subscribe. Crack it open, however, and in the mind of its author it manifestly is intended to rule out that social interpretation and application of Christianity to which men of modern insight and passion are becoming increasingly devoted,

Anyone can hear the deep breathing of the son of Senegambia in this woodpile. Theological conservatism? Yes. The premillennial doctrine of Christ's return? Yes. But neither of these purposes is so clearly betrayed as the author's purpose to put a clamp on the preaching of the social gospel. This is but another case of a widespread movement of certain men of great wealth to subsidize into subserviency the organized activities of the Christian religion in protection of their interests and privileges against the preaching of social justice and a new day of economic brotherhood. The clock has struck the hour for the church to put a stop to its own participation in their covert and sinister designs.

The egotism of a layman who so magnifies the character of his generosity that he imagines he can coerce or bribe into silence and servility a mighty denomination of intelligent and devoted Christians should have been met with Dr. Fosdick's defiant declaration of independence: Before High God, not for sale! If a church wants a creed, let it make it. Let it go about it democratically. Let the creed be the church's own, calmly and deliberately wrought out, not a creed devised for it by an unknown layman who purchases for it with money a prestige which he could never hope it might gain on its own inherent merits. And if certain rich churchmen wish to endow a creed of their own let them go about it honorably, that is, independently, instead of forcing their creed upon a million or more donors to church treasuries whose gifts are gladly made in full trust of the future and of the Spirit of God.

The church of Christ today faces no peril more serious than that inherent in the wealth of its own rich members. In industry, in all aspects of the social reformation now going on, in the realm of faith and of the church's message, the man of wealth must be taught that the Christian church, like its Lord, is no respecter of persons, and that those who put great sums into the treasury may rightly demand no privilege in the kingdom that is denied to the widow who casts in her mite and her all.

A Great Man's Wife

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE came unto me a woman whom I knew not. And she was of sharp nose and sour visage. And she was unmarried, and I was not sorry for that, but rather glad that some man had Missed her. And she said:

The servants of God are at ease in Zion. Therefore do the ways of Zion mourn, and the spirits of her people languish, while her shepherds say, A little more sleep, a little more slumber, a little more folding of the hands to sleep.

Now while she thus spake, I was getting on my Protective Coloring, for I thought she could have nothing on me. For among my redeeming vices is this, that I rise early, and my worst enemy hath never called me a Sluggard.

And she inquired of me, saying, At what hour of the clock dost thou arise, and read thy Bible, and call upon the name of God, and begin the work of the day?

And I said, When the clock striketh Six, then do I arise, and for the next Sixteen Hours I am on the job.

And I thought that would hold her, but I had another think coming.

For she had stocked herself with Ancient and Modern Instances, that no man might glory in her sight.

And she said, The sainted John Wesley rose every morning at four, and he meditated and prayed, and gat him to his work.

And I answered her, saying, If I had a wife like unto the wife of the sainted John Wesley, then would I sit up and work all Night.

And she was offended at that saying, and she departed.

But she ought to have been thankful that I did not tell her what I would have done had she been my wife.

Now I considered that the wife of the sainted John Wesley was in her own uncomfortable way a means of grace unto her husband; for had he not had a wife who was a shrew, he might have settled down and enjoyed the Comforts of home; but he went bravely forth and did a great man's work, and did it nobly.

I have known brave men, who in the hour of danger went forth nobly to the battlefield, and some of them did it with tearful memories of the Girl they Left Behind Them. But there were others.

And I know some women who left behind them the Comforts of home and the joys of their husbands' companionship, and who nursed Wounded Soldiers; and I know that some of them Camouflaged with their patriotism a very considerable willingness to be relieved of the Monotony of Home Cares. And I know that there were men who listened for the announcement of Zero Hour with the peaceful assurance that if anything happened that would turn the column rules of the Home Paper, it would have the incidental advantage of relieving a strained Domestic Situation.

And when I consider the ways in which a woman can help a man, I am glad that I married Keturah, and not the wife of the sainted John Wesley.

S. Parkes Cadman

Seventh Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

IN writing about Dr. Cadman, even if one shares his breadth of sympathy, one craves something of his rare gift of insight and characterization; the more because he is so baffling to all analysis. He admires widely, and with catholic appreciation; he can praise both Lacordaire and Gipsy Smith, and is as much at home with Newman as with Wesley. At once generous and discerning, dynamic and gentle, he is so many-sided, so fertile, so amazing in his activities, and withal so human and lovable, that he puzzles any artist because he is so unlike any model. The spaciousness and majesty of his thought, the swiftness and felicity of his delivery, the enchantment of his personality, leave one with a sense of dismay. Some years ago an English friend, having heard Dr. Cadman at Whitefield's in the morning and Dr. Gunsaulus at the City Temple in the evening, confided to me his impressions:

Two of your prophets held central citadels in "ye olde London town" today, much to our edification. They differ as much from each other in type as do the men whose pulpits they occupied, Horne and Campbell; but both are princes of the invisible. Cadman is not an impressive figure in the pulpit—until he begins to speak. Then the whole man lights up. His voice has some unusual tone qualities and rare carrying power. Sturdy, broad of shoulder, with close-cropped brown hair touched with gray, he is as decisive in movement as he is direct in speech. He speaks, through his whole personality, of energy and intellect. His closely knit argument, his still more closely knit sentences, finely phrased but delivered with passionate rapidity, overwhelm by the power of reason at white heat. An excerpt is like an amputation. A note directly opposite, but not opposed, is struck by Gunsaulus, who is an impressionist artist in words, relying more on illustration and color. The sermon of Cadman was that of an architect producing a splendid effect as a whole by infinite attention to detail. Gunsaulus is a man of large, strong gesture, of lyrical speech, in which a haunting voice and poetic thought blend to win beauty rather than compel by power. He is dramatic rather than argumentative. Something of the crooning magnetism of Gipsy Smith is tempered in him by a large and rich culture. Cadman revealed throughout his extraordinary power of literary phrasing, and if the impression he makes is more intellectual than spiritual, it is both virile and challenging. America is happy in having two men of such rare gifts, one on the eastern seaboard and the other in the middle west.

Unfortunately, Dr. Cadman—like Dean Inge—has published no volume of sermons, so far as I am aware; and one must depend upon newspaper reports—especially those in the Brooklyn Eagle, which is in fact a great pulpit with one amen corner in New England and the other in Florida, with the Rocky Mountains for a gallery. For a long time I knew Dr. Cadman only in his reported sermons, and that is hardly to know him at all, since there is so much in the personality of the preacher—Rooseveltian in its energy, enthusiasm, and winsomeness—that does not get into print. So it was nothing short of a revelation when I went to Central Church—the Tin Church, as they call it in Brooklyn—taking with me a discerning friend who boasts his ability as a sermon-taster.

The Church was full, though not crowded; the audience for the most part middle-aged people, and the men were in the majority—hard-headed business and professional men apparently. The service was planned and conducted by a man who is not simply a preacher, but a minister, and in the highest and best sense a sacramentarian; sane enough to achieve richness of worship without too much ritual—just as he is wise enough to be liberal yet evangelical in faith. There was about the man, as Carlyle would say, somewhat of the Eternal. When he began the sermon one felt that he regarded the sermon as also a sacrament, not a rostrum for a reputation but an opportunity to lead men to God; and that he loves men too well to lead them anywhere else. There he stood, a stockily-built figure, the very embodiment of mental efficiency and spiritual sanity, reminding me of a passage in a book of science describing the quality called vigor, which is evidently something more than strength; something more than health; a capacity for living intensely, yet without any loss of balance, a power of expending energy lavishly yet without ceasing to have plenty in reserve, an ability to resist strain and to defy fatigue. It implies being ever ready for great exertions and yet having staying power.

THE SERMON

The sermon was entitled "Treasures in Christ"—Col 2:3—and it was no haphazard affair, but a real work of homiletic art, orderly in arrangement, exquisite in language, apt in illustration; but its art was forgotten in the effortless ease—nay, more, the rejoicing urgency—with which it was delivered. It had a skeleton and was athletic enough to stand alone, but so much alive that its bones did not stick out in Firstly, Secondly, and so forth. It was a characteristic Cadman sermon, as much for its vitality as for its distinction of manner; moving in a large orbit, bright with insight and epigram, and reminding one of David Swing in the great names with which it conjured. Its daring and far-ranging generalizations seemed to open new vistas of divine surprise, until we saw Christianity as the center and synthesis of truth; a faith simple, catholic, profound, satisfying the thinker and alone equal to the problem of redemption in its tragic and gigantic modern setting. After the first ten minutes my friend the sermon-taster said it was glorified glibness; at the end he thought it nothing less than miraculous. And no wonder; for it was a portrayal of the uniqueness, comprehensiveness, and supremacy of the living Christ, as certain of its sentences, which my friend can still quote, make plain:

We reflect upon the blind gropings and blurred apprehension of venerable faiths. Their literature is translated and we read it with curious and pathetic interest. The scurvy gods of the pantheons, vindictive and weak, are condemned and repudiated by us. Men may be agnostic, they may become atheists, but never again can men apprentice themselves to these primitive forms. In the teaching of Jesus these erstwhile faiths find explanation. They are part of the cosmic process in religion; tragic, but significant, overtures ere the Lord of men appears to bring them to God. He gives to nature heart and purpose. He shows that the very ground beneath our feet is sympathetic, that no star shines or pales away without His consent. This earthly scene becomes intelligible in Him, and pain and sorrow and death cannot be understood apart from His word concerning them.

No wonder that Christian theology is hastening, under pressure, to restore central authority to the doctrine of the incarnation. Christ Himself, no book, no creed, no ecclesiastical form, has seized the life of this age, so vast, so complex and so baffling, and now, as never, history gives Him testimony and the ages chant: "Thou hast the words of eternal life." If you ask why this changeless power over society exists in Jesus, the only reply is, because He ever lives as a present authority. Other masters are an echo; He is a voice. They died and left their systems to the blemish of time; He controls the event by being with its happening. Hence the adaptations of the religion He founded among different races. Christianity began in Rome, hidden in the catacombs, and upward it came to rear into Italy's pure and brilliant skies its monuments of faith.

Much of the treasure is hidden, but since the treasures are hidden in Christ, they are as safe as He is and as abiding as His eternity. The mighty strands of Brooklyn Bridge are gathered into one great heart of masonry at either end, and there buried out of sight, and we cross the stream in safety. So the complex web of life, its apparent antinomies, its grief, its pain, its ministries, its explanations, are gathered up into the mighty heart of Jesus, and whatever wonder awaits man, however fecund his discoveries and phenomenal his advances, he will continue to cross the gulfs of time in safety, since life, knowledge and wisdom are hidden with Christ in God, to whom be glory forever and ever.

CADMAN, HILLIS, JOWETT

Next evening we met to read and discuss the sermon, but, alas, the report of it in the Eagle was only an elaborate synopsis, hardly more than a thin shadow of what we had heard. Moreover it read less like a sermon than a lecture, or an article in a Review; so much does the work of Dr. Cadman lose when his personality is withdrawn. Something was lost. Glamour was not the word to describe it, because it suggests something unreal, and the spell which he cast over us was not only real, but exalting and revealing. However, we agreed—reading a number of his sermons in the glow of that radiance—that he was one of the best natural orators we had ever heard, for his grace, ease, fluency, fertility, and resource, having a copious vocabulary, rich in content and quality—albeit lacking at times in the reticences and reserves which true style requires. Also, his studentship, at once prodigious and omniverous, filled us with astonishment, and what he had read was assimilated and minted in his own mind. Indeed, he is one of the few popular preachers who really cares for learning, and his knowledge is encyclopediacal in its accuracy and range. As a maker of sermons he is unique, alike in his style and his skill, but hardly the equal of his neighbor, Dr. Hillis, as a master of popular homiletics. Strong, vivid, full-blooded—the Rubens of the pulpit, as Jowett is its Meissonier—he is a great preacher for the greatness of his themes, no less than for the virility of his thought and faith; and because he always leaves us thinking and wondering, not about himself—his brilliant mind, has incisive reasoning, his lambent eloquence—but about the great things of life; about God and man, about following Christ, about the crown of sanctity and the building of that city which hath foundations.

"AMBASSADORS OF GOD"

Of books about preaching by great preachers we have many, and the value of each, aside from the wisdom of experience which it teaches, lies in the unconscious self-revelation of the author. Noble, wise, brilliant in its survey of the history of preaching, fearless and forthright in its facing of the currents of contemporary life and thought, the lectures of Dr. Cadman, "Ambassadors of God," are disappointing in their personal communicativeness, as compared, for example, with the lectures of Beecher, or "The Pastor-Preacher," by Bishop Quayle. It is too ambitious. It tries to cover too much ground; the style is often cumbersome, and at times as ponderous as a procession of elephants. This is due, in large part, to the fact that for Dr. Cadman—as for Beecher—writing is a drudgery, and so much that is most commanding and winsome in the man does not get into his printed work. Had his lectures been reported they would have been ten times better—aglow with flashes of lightning and every kind of felicity and surprise, which only an audience can evoke from the preacher. Despite this handicap, no better book about the great art, which is also an incarnation, has come to us in many a day. An exalted conception of the office of preaching, a romantic sense of its history, rich experience, wide reading, and a vision of the need and challenge of a world troubled, enthralled, groping, unite to give us overwhelming sense of the divine origin, worth and function of the gospel ministry; and that, too, at a time when it is needed. Much needed, too, especially in America, is his emphasis upon preaching as itself sacramental; that is, upon the sermon not as a thing apart, but as a passage in the context of the worship which it seeks to inspire, direct, and interpret.

A PERSONALITY AND AN INSTITUTION

Some things Dr. Cadman ought to explain to his brethren, and one is the secret by which he seems to have all that he has ever heard, read or thought instantly at command, as if he had it pigeonholed in his mind within reach. It is almost uncanny. There is a sentence in the "Life of John Sterling," by Carlyle, which describes it exactly: "So ready lay his store of knowledge round him, so perfect was his ready utterance of the same—in coruscating wit, in jocund drollery, in compact articulated clearness or high poignant emphasis, as the case required—he was a match for any man in argument before a crowd." Hence a ministry of information, no less than of inspiration, in which Dr. Cadman is surpassed by no living man. He reads everything and forgets nothing; and his ability to summon all his resources at will—added to his amazing industry in study, his painstaking preparation, and his incredible gift of speech—make him one of the great public teachers of his time. Nothing human is alien to Dr. Cadman, and his interpretative insight and picturesque eloquence mark him as without doubt the most brilliant and effective popular lecturer since Beecher—a Christian publicist, a former of intelligent national opinion, an incomparable champion of fraternal righteousness and practical idealism, whose personality is an invaluable asset to the republic.

A LEADER OF AUTHORITY

In Brooklyn, Dr. Cadman is not simply a personality; he is an institution. Not alone as orator, but as pastor, organizer, citizen, and friend, he is a leader whose authority is only equalled by his sanity, and his church is a community force. Keeping his poise in a difficult time, weighing the issues carefully, thrilling in appeal, terrific in denunciation, during the great war he was a tower of strength, not only in his own city, but all over the land. If a vexed question agitates the public mind, or some united public effort is needed in behalf of the public good, it is Dr. Cadman who crystallizes the sentiment and best judgment of the community. His conferences for men at the Bedford Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association have been for years both a local and a national forum, and a feature of Greater New York. Week after week he holds a vast audience—perhaps the largest in the country—discussing an astonishing range of subjects, and in addition answering questions dealing with every conceivable topic, from the character of Socrates to the Passion Play at Hoboken. There he is in his glory, and his replies, if sometimes oracular, are compounded of accurate knowledge, sanctified common sense, and sparkling wit, equally a joy to the student and a terror to the crank. For example:

Q—Do you believe in the Darwinian theory of evolution, and do you think it explains anything?

A—According to that theory, man is not only descended from the ape, but he has within him a whole menagerie, and sometimes the ape is uppermost, and sometimes the ass. I am inclined to believe in it; it explains a lot.

Q—Who was the greatest man, Caesar, Alexander, Cromwell, or Isaac Newton?

A—If true greatness consists in the right use of a powerful understanding, Sir Isaac Newton leads the list. It is to such men as Newton—men who enlighten their fellow men—not to men who enslave them by violence, that we owe reverence.

Q—What was the ideal of the Pilgrim Fathers, and why do you attribute supremacy to them in the making of America?

A—A theocracy consisting of a solemn allegiance to the covenant of the gospel and a determination to walk by its rule, whatever the cost. The Pilgrim was supreme because his ideals were the loftiest and he made the largest sacrifices in their behalf. It was reserved for a band of obscure and despised sectaries to lay down in all essentials the principles of representative democracy. They set sail from the old world, but they carried a new world in their hearts.

Q—What is the matter with the church? Where are the great preachers, such as we used to have?

A—Internally, sectarian strife; externally, the prevalent indifference and the superficial character of much of the national mind. Preaching has killed the Christian church. We go to church to hear the star in the pulpit. We have become sermon tasters instead of Christian workers. You hear a fat old grocer boast that he has sat under the pulpit of Rev. Blowhard for twenty years, and all the time you know that he has been skinning the public. We are a sorry lot and make a poor fist at religion.

Q—Has Christianity failed? After two thousand years of its influence why are we in such a mess?

A—No; Christianity has not failed; as Chesterton said, it has been found difficult and laid aside. I should like to see a demonstration of its efficiency in every sort of man, using the leading churches for the occasion. Get together the regenerated Pharisees, the converted nobodies, the saved who were once lost and far away from God. Let the preacher for once retire. What eloquence could equal the story of such transformed lives! The outcome would be that many of us would perceive that the same power that brought St. Paul to the feet of Jesus, that sent Henry Martyn to India and Father Damien to the lepers, that touched the tongues of St. Bernard and of Beecher, is an everlasting power and has signs and wonders attending it.

So wholesome, so intelligently loyal, so nobly prophetic is the Americanism of Dr. Cadman, that one has difficulty in remembering his British origin. None the less, because he married a wife he does not hate his old mother, and no small part of his remarkable ministry is the service he has rendered in behalf of the friendship of English-speaking peoples. Here, too, he has been an Ambassador of God, embodying, as he does, the common spirit and ideal of kindred lands. No doubt William James would classify Dr. Cadman among the "tough-minded," rather than among the mystics; but he would rejoice in his brilliant intellect, his abounding vitality, his buoyant good cheer, and his infinite brotherliness, which knows no bounds of creed, or sect, or party—all the rich human qualities which make him so radiant and so fascinating. No man is more beloved by his brethren, as much for his goodness of heart as for his gifts of mind, all of whom have an honorable Christian pride in a ministry as fruitful in personal blessing as it is nation wide in its influence.

A Note From Noodleland

ONCE in Noodleland the upward-looking natives resolved to have a temple built, towering toward the sky.

So they sent for an architect who made them a thrilling picture of the kind of temple they thought they wanted. It pleased them to the tingle of a finger-tip, and they hired him to put the job through.

After a few days, seeing no signs above the hilltop of the temple for which their souls craved, they went in a body to the chosen site across the hill to see how the work might be going on. There they found their architect hard at work directing the digging of a great hole in the ground.

"What are you doing?" their spokesman asked.

"Building your splendid temple," the architect replied.

"But you are building it in the wrong direction," the spokesman explained. "Our temple was to tower toward the sky."

"It is for a firm foundation that I am digging down," said the architect.

"Foundation nothing!" the crowd shouted in chorus. "We didn't order a foundation. We ordered a temple."

Then they denounced the treacherous architect to his face and mobbed him.

LOUIS F. POST.

Back to Russia

By Karl Borders

ONE day last winter I chanced to board the same car with a Russian acquaintance as we both came down to work. Partly with explicit intent, and partly as sop to a goading conscience, I may often be found on such occasions these days scanning a simplified Russian grammar—euphemistically so-called. And thus my Russian friend espied me. After a bit of small talk on the amenities of grammatical research, she casually remarked, "You would be surprised to know how many people are studying Russian with the intention of going to Russia to live." "And little wonder," she added, "with things as they are in America."

Without considering for the moment the shocking implications of the addendum, the fact that any one is deliberately seeking to go to Russia now challenges attention. But certainly with great numbers of Russians themselves this desire is dominant. A year ago, lured by Russian and Russians, I attended classes for several months at what is known for short as the Soviet School, and for long, the School for Technical Aid to Soviet Russia, where, night after night, summer and winter alike, young Russians come to study tractors and agriculture and the simple branches of the various practical sciences, with the avowed purpose of returning to the land of the bolsheviki to aid in her economic redemption. In January, 1920, one of our federal forces had carried the entire school off to jail on the general assumption that it was red. But by the good sense of the judge before whom the case came the school opened the next day pending the production of evidence to show why it should not continue. Which evidence has not, to my knowledge, ever been brought forth.

WIDESPREAD DESIRE TO RETURN

However, this is aside from the question. The significant fact is that here were a hundred young Russians burning the candle at both ends in order that they might be prepared to return at the earliest possible moment to the aid of Soviet Russia. And to them may be added many other hundreds. Indeed, it has been rare to find recently any Russians who do not express their intention of returning very soon to the land of their birth.

And to give point to these intentions, they are actually going. The steamship agent of one of the large banks in Chicago, specializing in Russians, informed me that they had been shipping from fifty to sixty a week since September, 1920, when it became possible for them to go. Another bank across the street estimated that they had arranged transportation for not less than five hundred in the same length of time. Add to these figures the proportionate numbers going through other agencies here in Chicago, and in New York, where, I am informed, they are leaving in great numbers, and in other centers of Russian population and in relation to the total Russian population in this country, the movement assumes the dimensions of an exodus.

When I suggested a year ago to an official in the Chicago police department that such a movement was probable, he implored me to do nothing to prevent it—which is one point of view, shared no doubt by many. But there is a psychological and patriotic interest which will not be so easily satisfied. When we are informed by an anti-bolshevist bulletin that probably two million Russians have found refuge from Leninism in the various countries of Europe and America, our greatest surprise is that the millions are not multiplied, the general assumption being that nothing save a girdle of red bayonets prevents a depopulation of the land. But the phenomenon we are witnessing is a totally different matter. Why should any man wish to leave our own land of comparative plenty for a chaotic, starving soil; why exchange political institutions of proved value, though possibly not flawless, for ones about which there seem to be, at least, pronounced differences of opinion? Why, in short, in a choice between America and Russia, prefer Russia?

REASONS FOR THE RETURN

Most of the reasons for returning are very simple and very laudable. A majority of the real Russians, by which we ordinarily understand non-Jewish Russians, in this country are men who came in large numbers in the period just preceding the war, leaving their wives and children at home. These homes lie mainly in the war swept area over which Poland and Russia have contended. In many cases letters have not come through for months and often years. The man would be less than human who, under such circumstances, did not seek to return. Both agencies with which I talked reported that a negligible number of Jews were among those to whom they sold tickets, which would seem to indicate that it is this non-family group of Russian gentiles which is leaving, and this confirms the impression I have received from the personal knowledge of numbers of men who have gone.

The case of Feofan will illustrate. Seven years ago he came, leaving a young wife with his parents on the little farm in Minsk, then Russia. In a few years the war came. His entire family, increased by a son whom he has never seen, were first imprisoned by the Germans, then alternately the little farm was overrun by Poles and bolsheviki, and when he left Chicago he had not heard from them for ten months. He said to me one day, "I know that I will have to live on black bread and have few clothes, but I cannot feel good when I know that I have plenty and they have nothing." No one studying the general state of unrest among foreigners in America should be unmindful that for vast numbers of them, like Feofan, the war is not yet over. This terrible state of uncertainty and fear about their loved ones lies over them like a pall and colors much of their thinking.

An immediate factor of great importance is the widespread state of unemployment in America. "We are only spending the money we have saved. Why not take a trip to Russia?" they have often said to me. I talked to one young naturalized Russian who had done his bit in the war, as we waited in the station for the international train to go out bearing some of his friends back to the old country. He was not attempting to return but remarked that he had as well be there as here since it was no longer possible to make a living here. This condition becomes significant when we remember that most of our Russians are common laborers and have, consequently, been among the first affected by the slack times in industry. One wonders, in this connection, what provision in some of our recently proposed immigrant legislation, which provided for increased ingress during periods of demand for labor, could be made for the care of the surplus when we fall upon such times as now grip us.

NATURAL CURIOSITY

But to return. Perhaps the altogether natural curiosity to see the new Russia impels many a man to go. Again and again I have heard them say, "I want to see what it is like." Two or three Protestant Russian preachers, who are anything but bolshevistic in sympathy, have avowed to me their great desire to see their old land on this score as well as for other reasons which I shall mention shortly. Indeed it can be easily understood that one who is in the least interested in the country of his birth would desire to revisit her after these years in which so much has transpired to change the land of the Tzar.

A very few, including the ministerial and missionary group mentioned, entertain high notions of returning to save their country from its present oppression. However, missionaries, as such, have been forbidden entrance and the few who have gone in have done so under the guise of workmen. The local Russian paper made lengthy editorial comment recently commending the action of the Soviet government in forbidding the entrance of the Salvation Army. And one of the leading evangelical Russian ministers of this country who set out for Russia in the spring with a considerable group of fellow missionaries was turned back at the border, though some of his followers succeeded in gaining entrance as workmen.

I recall, too, one of the finest types of Russian I have known, a skilled car repairer, who returned this spring with his wife and little girl. His final word to solicitous friends at parting was, "I am not a bolshevik." Possibly he may have been lured by the need of men of his trade and high hopes of financial gain, or there may have been some of the deeper motives of a desire to help in the salvation of his country. He was reticent except in the denial of bolshevik sympathy.

DISLIKE FOR AMERICA

Nor can we blink the fact that numbers of them are leaving because of a distinct dislike for America. We have complacently told our disgruntled guests that if they did not like us they could find a "better 'ole." But I venture to say that there is little cause for national rejoicing when riddance is bought at the price of self esteem which we have paid. The iniquities of the department of justice have been sufficiently advertised to need no further amplification, but the inevitable results of that regime of hysteria are yet in the reaping. At a national Americanization conference last summer, a certain man who has been engaged in that work for many years made the statement that the entire process of Americanization had been set back at least ten years by this misguided zeal. In the mind of many Russians, old Russia has come to America and the America to which they set out in the beginning, the idealized land of hearts desire has been transplanted to the new Russia.

I cannot refrain from recording one of the little ironies of this deplorable period through which, let us hope, we have passed. It is known certainly that at least two of the secret service agents employed in the anti-red campaigns of a year ago in Chicago were men who had received their training in radical-hunting in the service of the Tzar, performing the identical sort of work they did here. Can it be wondered that again and again Russians have said, and doubtless more often thought, "This is like the land of the Tzar"?

But as the most glowing and vivid pictures have come out of periods of persecution, so have all these adverse conditions in America conspired to build, if not a new heaven, at least a new earth in the minds of the vast majority of the Russians in this country. Unhampered by few facts, and choosing these to suit his taste the great proletarian mind here has conceived a veritable working-man's Utopia in Russia. The statistics of the bureau of immigration for the years of the greatest Russian immigration, just prior to the great war, reveal the fact that about one-third of those admitted were illiterate. Few of them have in the intervening years learned to read the American papers. The literate two-thirds have, therefore, been dependent upon a predominantly radical Russian press, while the other third has sat at the feet of the fluent Russian orators who have almost invariably been exponents of red radicalism. With these sources of information and a natural predilection for revolution, and a quite proper national pride as a background, there need not be any speculations as to the conception of the new Russia prevailing in the minds of these groups.

SOME RETURN TO AMERICA

And if a certain minority have had the hardihood to seek the whole truth they have been confronted with a mass of contradictory facts and opinions which has balked not a few of our own best minds; and like not a few of these minds, have finally been reduced to utter disbelief of all they see printed. Occasionally some one of their number returns from this land of the shadow. He is, of course, besieged by a host of earnest seekers after the truth. And they are sent away hissing or believing, according to the previous conceptions entertained, wherein lies a text for the tenacity of human prejudices and a sad commentary on the state of man's shattered faith in man.

I know of one such case. The brother-in-law of our Russian pastor recently arrived in New York after perilous experiences at the hands of the bolsheviki. He relates how, when he found himself able to walk about the streets in America unmolested, he could scarcely believe it true. And when finally he was persuaded that it was all real, he went immediately to take out first papers for American citizenship. But his unfavorable tales fell on deaf ears, and most of his hearers went away with their faith in the man impaired but unshaken in their roseate dreams of the new Russia. Thus like Cassandra must any man prophesy who speaks evil of his native land to the Russians in America.

Whatever may be the truth of the tales that come out of Russia, and probably like the reports of the blind men concerning the elephant of old, there is truth in all the stories, something new has been born in the Russian colonies here. And this something, despite its violent and menacing aspects in some instances, despite its crass literature and crude political theories, is not wholly, nor even mostly, bad. No one who has been present at any of their frequent mass meetings, unless he be an avowed radical hunter, can have failed to sense something of the profound emotional currents released. Devotion to an ideal, call it bigotry if you like, burns always most ardently, it seems to me, in simple breasts. There is none of that nice balancing of facts to which educated minds are accustomed, none of the cold subjection of emotion to logic, but in naive, childlike fashion imagination and fact, what is and what we wish may be, are woven into one gorgeous fabric and flaunted before the world as the banner of a new faith.

A CHANGED SPIRIT

A Russian who has been in touch with a certain group of Russian Evangelicals in New York for many years, told me that when he first went to their meetings he was unwilling to go again because he found them depressing. There was a melancholy and a hopelessness of this world present in all that was said and done. And he declares that the revolution in Russia has made a marked and visible change in the spirit of this group and is noticeable in all the other similar groups he has visited. He sees a more buoyant faith in the goodness of this world, an alertness of mind, and even a quickness of speech that was not present before.

Thus to my mind the entire movement among the Russians in this country takes on the characteristics of a sudden and explosive liberation of mind, accompanied like all explosions by sound and smoke, and under certain circumstances even destruction, but nevertheless breaking shackles and bringing liberty. There may be some who will interject that they have had liberty since the day they set foot on American soil and that they are despicable ingrates if they have not been aware of it all along. To which I reply that there is a liberty of body and a liberty of mind, and that while their bodies have been working in America the most of them have had the shadow of Europe over their minds.

For these reasons, one or all together, and probably for other reasons I have not named, they are going. I have watched them congregated at the station hours before time for their train, most of them older men with occasionally a woman and children, their baggage piled in one lot for inspection, looking a bit dazed still, some of them not yet comfortable in American clothes—a scene in many respects not unlike Ellis Island—talking, forever talking, until time for farewells, then the agent hustling and herding them out the gates in the last five minutes, then the final farewells. I cannot forget the genuine feeling of those hurried partings. One does not often see mustachioed men—and they all grow mustaches when they plan to return—kissing each other full and ardently on the lips. As they moved out through the gates and the rumble and puffing of the train subsided, Whitman's Song of the Open Road came back to me, which for all the varied reasons of their going and to whatever objective goal, seems at the heart of the going to be true for them—and, as for that matter, for Russia—

"They go! They go! I know that they go, but I know not where they go, But I know that they go toward the best—toward something great."

VERSE

Mystic

ALWAYS in life, now here, now there, a man,
Young, spirited, desirous of full joy,
Living in pleasant riot, has suddenly (Passing a leper, a beaten ass, or looking Up from a harlot's face to a glint of stars)
Has suddenly paused . . . has suddenly known great cold
Close to his heart . . . has suddenly from still eyes
Sent one spear-thrust through myriad veils . . . and then,
From that fixed moment when Illusion died,
He is no more the same. Riches are dust
To him thenceforward, and from that agony
Of concentrated vision no thing escapes
A piteous self-revelment. . . . Flesh is seen
Ripening but to corruption, and the hot pride
Of high emprise is known for vanity.

What are his kindred then to him—they are shadows!
Leave them or leave them not, they will shift and change
And vanish. . . . And so he leaves them. He is alone.
He is alone. He knows not heat nor cold,
Hunger nor thirst—nor sleep. He waits . . .

At last,

Upwelling from his granite bleakness floods
A warm and ever-flowing spring of tears:
And the man feels he may no longer wait.
The hour has come. He speaks . . .

Or is it God—?

Why Not Begin?

WHETHER the time be slow or fast
Enemies, hand in hand,
Must come together at the last
And understand.
No matter how the die is cast,
Or who may seem to win—
We know that we must love at last—
Why not begin?

Ministers Outside the Ministry

IN a recent number of The Christian Century I attempted to show that the shortage in preachers applied mainly to the smaller churches and that there was no hope of recruiting men to overcome this deficit so long as the churches remained small and unable to support either a minister or a working program. The real problem is that of denominational duplication more than ministerial deficit, and no sort of sectarian obscurantism will be able to remedy the difficulty. The plea may be voiced from every church top by denominational overhead officials and college leaders, but until churches can support a preacher and a program that challenges young men to service there will be little more than the noise of pleading. Men on the western slope of life may be contented to live in one place and preach in four unrelated neighborhoods as a means of supplementing their incomes and of keeping the denominational cause alive, but young men will not be challenged to enter the ministry as a life calling with that program before them. When the churches capable of supporting a pastorate are all taken these men will enter some other type of social service or take up business.

There is no deficit in pastorates able to pay a decent living and support a program of real service. In fact, there is some reason for believing that there are more men than pulpits of this order. At least we hear often of men of large caliber going over into social undertakings of a non-ministerial type, and of others taking up business at from two to three times the salaries. They refuse to hide their light under the bushel of a parochial or sectarian limitation that inevitably shuts them off from the service they feel able to render.

The Wider Ministry

There are probably more young people entering professions that minister today than ever before. Social service has many specialized forms of activity and it gives a personal touch and a practical grip on human problems without the limitations of creed or ecclesiastical convention. We have heard much about the state universities not sending youth into the pulpit. The fact is that they have not been cultivated to that end. But they are enlisting an ever-widening stream of rich young life for social service. We urge those contemplating the ministry to attend the church college, and we fail to establish schools of religion in the circle of those university schools which train for other professions, and then charge that the state university does not give us preachers! The Red Cross, the social settlement, charity work, health organizations, home economics and farm agent work, the Y. M. and Y. W. C. A., social surveys, industrial welfare and many other types of social activity are enlisting thousands of our best university graduates.

These young people are not one whit less inspired by the Christian motive than are those who enter the pulpit. The writer has known and taught hundreds of them and knows whereof he speaks. They are consecrated in heart and mind and deliberately devote themselves to occupations that require tireless application to human beings with most distressing problems. They have much less opportunity for books and for daily exercise in the things of culture than do preachers, and they deal, not with polite church members, but with the poor, illiterate, diseased, alien and sinful. They wrestle with indifference in the public mind which is more difficult than any found in church boards, and they have much less assurance in their new and more or less precarious support than the pastor has in his established church organization. There may be a lack in the pulpit ministry but there were never so many enlisting for that wider ministry which consists of going about doing good.

Preaching and Ministering

We do not have too much good preaching, but we do too exclusively confine the church's ministry to preaching. Getting so much out of books and so little out of human contacts, we have elevated sermonizing to the ethereal level of the æsthetic and cultural. The sermon should educate and stimulate culture, of course, but it should also answer the problems of men and society down where men live together. There is great promise in the tendency of the younger men in the pastorate to study human problems in the rough as well as in its refined form in books. It is an old saying that a "house-going dominie makes a kirk-going folk." But it is equally true that a church with a social program brings a crowd to its door. If it is good to visit the homes of the poor, it would be better to work for fewer poor homes; if it is gracious to comfort the sick and console the mourners, it would be better to prevent illness and save lives; if charity is a Christian virtue, the prevention of poverty is a greater virtue; if saving from sin is our great obligation, keeping youth from being led into sin is a greater.

The greatest redemptive act is that of preventing disaster. The social program of the church may not serve to build up the local church as rapidly as some people demand, but it is a wider evangelism that will build for the future. The greatest act of church statesmanship today is the one that accepts the divine law of self-forgetting service for the church. Institutions incline to serve themselves and thus impair their service functions to humanity; the church is no exception. It is losing its greatest opportunity when it turns the call of social service over to nonchurch agencies, and it is today thus losing much of its best ministry.

From Circuit to Center

More than any other denomination in America the Methodists seem to have arisen to the occasion. They have never been much troubled by doctrinal controversies; their emphasis, from Wesley's day, has been more upon living than upon creedal believing. They have tithed the mint and anise of doctrine less and their incomes more than some others. Now that they are largely delivered from the obsessions of extreme emotional experience, they are turning their great practical organization to a type of enterprise that is full of promise.

Methodism perhaps has a greater number of small rural and village churches than any other denomination. Their circuit system has sent many very poor pulpiteers into service, but it has furnished the smallest church with oversight and kept a program alive. Now they propose to turn from "circuit to center." The coming of good roads and the automobile makes possible such enlargement of the local church parish as to suggest the enlarging of the parish toward the old circuit boundaries; at least it will permit such unifications of the one-time preaching "appointments" as to make a church center possible, and to locate there a pastor trained in the making and executing of a community church program which will radiate from this central church. The Methodist organization will plot the whole nation into Methodist parishes and adopt an evangelistic program intended to reach every unchurched family. They invite the cooperation of others but do not propose to spend any time in controversies; while others dispute over the cackle they propose to go get the egg.

To carry out this program they have voted some $9,000,000, established well panoplied survey bureaus, employed sociological and ministerial experts, set-up rural church departments, adopted conference programs with definite goals, are organizing district rural societies and holding rural ministerial institutes all over the land for the instruction and inspiring of the best minds in their local ministry. There is very little said about Methodism in these institutes, slight reference is made to its traditions or historic shibboleths, the lecturers are from many evangelical communions, and the motto is "Not what the church can get out of the community, but what our church can contribute to the community." A united movement of this type and spirit would give American Protestantism a program that would challenge young men.

British Table Talk

Has Britain Passed Her Zenith?

London, June, 1921.

FROM certain points of view Britain's outlook within living memory was never darker than it is now. With the longest coal-mining stoppage on record, a strike among cotton-spinners, a dispute in the wool trade, and impending engineering troubles, the condition of the manufacturing and commercial world is grave indeed. There are millions of unemployed, large numbers of them receiving state support. Trade is dwindling, the national revenue far below the national expenditure, there is lamentable waste in some public services, the house of commons is supine. The dominant interest of many people of all classes is sport—usually, though happily not always associated with gambling. The mass of citizens pursue the even tenor of their way, except when disturbed by a shortage of coal, a threatened strike that directly hits them, or an insatiable tax-collector. One mitigating feature of our industrial troubles is an absence of all violence, and the good temper which as a rule obtains between opposing parties. The truly astonishing thing is that so far the outward life of the nation shows few signs of its internal disorders. It is quite certain, however, that things cannot continue for long as they now are. Alien onlookers suggest that Britain has passed her zenith and is now in her decline. Possibly the wish is father to the thought. We have immense reserves, and as history shows, practically unlimited powers of self-recovery. Inestimable assets, of vast potency, are our young manhood and young womanhood. If an Englishman may say it, it would be hard to find finer types of virile, intelligent, high-souled humanity than the boys and girls in our schools and colleges. Wisely and strongly led, one feels they are capable of the highest human achievement. Unfortunately, inspiring, idealistic leadership is lacking or inadequate. Doubtless the greater part of what is unsatisfactory and ominous in our national life is due to after-war reaction. And the gloom is not unrelieved. At a recent meeting, presided over by the Archbishop of York, when the industrial situation was under discussion, it was insisted that the present unrest is due to spiritual aspiration rather than to a desire for mere economic gain. The governor of the bank of England, after closely watching national and international affairs, can see signs of a gradual emergence from our troubles, and is confident that our position today is better than it was a year ago. He says he is more of an optimist today than he has been for years, and that if we follow up the agreement with Germany by strengthening the league of nations the world-outlook will steadily brighten.

The Inseparables

It is hardly possible to exaggerate the satisfaction given in this country by the adoption by the United States Senate of Mr. Borah's resolution requesting the President to call a conference with Great Britain and Japan with a view to the reduction of naval armaments. Mr. Harding's announcement that America will have nothing to do with the league of nations naturally caused great disappointment, but our chagrin would have been greater but for the belief that the repudiation was one of the letter rather than of the spirit—of a particular form and not of the fundamental principle. We do not forget that the President has proclaimed himself an advocate of an Association of Free Nations. As Edward Price Bell, London correspondent of the Chicago Daily News, points out, it is the soul of the league of association that matters, and, so far from repudiating this, America, by her representatives, has pledged herself to "unfaltering co-operation" with Great Britain. It matters little what the international link be called so long as it exists, and it ought not to be beyond the wit of the world's statesmen to devise means for utilizing the existing machinery for creating an instrument acceptable to all parties concerned, for maintaining the peace of the world. As General Smuts urges, we must have some sort of high court of justice and civilization, if only for mutual self-protection. While the league of nations is not perfect and may not have fulfilled expectations, it is capable of amendment, and indeed one of its functions is to improve itself; and already it has to its credit a list of substantial achievements. Lord Robert Cecil reminds us that it has set on foot an international campaign against typhus in Central Europe. A plan for an international court of justice has been settled, and it is hoped that the court will be definitely set up next September. Progress has been made in formulating plans for the limitation of armaments and the establishment of the mandatory system. A number of minor international disputes will be peacefully settled. In close connection with the league two labor conferences have been held, and steps taken towards international labor legislation. Finally it has been proved that representatives of between forty and fifty different states, of widely divergent culture, religion, language, race and history, can meet in one chamber and co-operate heartily and even enthusiastically in the cause of peace and goodwill amongst men.

Whatever be the future of a world league, certain it is that America and Britain are inextricably bound together. Scarcely a representative man on either side of the Atlantic discusses our mutual relations without insisting on our inseparableness. The finest passage and the one that evoked most response in Mr. Harvey's oration in the crypt of St. Paul's cathedral at the unveiling of the Washington bust was the peroration in which he declared his sincere belief that Americans and Britons were now entering upon a new era of respect, tolerance and cooperation, with better understanding, with no barriers left in the way, to a point when not only ourselves but all the world would realize that what we do together is for their benefit as much as for our own, and that "the omnipotent God will put his blessing upon all of us in that endeavor."

League of Nations Day

Industrial troubles, particularly the coal stoppage, compelled the modification of the plans for a national pilgrimage in June in support of the league of nations. The proposed processions from distant parts of England had to be abandoned, but many local efforts are being made, culminating in a great demonstration in Hyde Park on Saturday afternoon, June 25, when the Archbishop of Canterbury and Lord Robert Cecil will preside and speakers of national reputation will address the multitude from twelve platforms. It is significant of the spirit that animates the young people who range themselves under Miss Royden's standard that the (Fellowship) Branch of the League of Nations Union to which they belong, having begun the organization of the Thames' Side Route before the change was announced, decided to "carry on." Beginning at Southend on Saturday-Sunday, June 11-12, they are, while these lines are crossing the Atlantic, marching, with banners flying, pennants waving, and bands playing, through the county of Essex to London, holding many meetings, outdoor and indoor, on the route. In churches and chapels and halls, in public parks, on village greens, and in crowded marketplaces, they are telling the people (sometimes through a megaphone) that there is no greater cause than that represented by the league of nations, and that unless we can ensure world-peace all other human efforts may prove futile. It is astonishing how difficult it is to make people realize that if ever there is another great European war, instruments of destruction have been developed to such a pitch of devilishness, that whole cities may be wiped out in a night. Because the prospect is so appalling, unimaginative people rest content in the belief that it will never be realized. But that was exactly their state of mind when the imminence of the European cataclysm was foretold. Years ago H. G. Wells warned us that "war in the air" would mean social destruction instead of victory as the end of war, and he justly claims that he was a true prophet in regard to the peril of militarism. "The great catastrophe marched upon us in the daylight," he writes, "but everybody thought that somebody else would stop it before it arrived. Behind that great catastrophe march others today." Mr. Wells is not satisfied with the league of nations, but only because he has a still larger vision—the world-state. Some of us hold that the former is a stepping-stone to the latter. The membership of the League of Nations Union, which exists to support and strengthen the league itself, now numbers in Britain 100,000 and is increasing daily. In a message to the Fellowship Pilgrims Lord Robert Cecil says: "It is very encouraging to find how well the people of the country are responding to the call for redoubling their efforts in view of the attitude of the United States. Certainly my conviction is as strong as it ever was that in the league, and the league alone, lies the hope of the future of European civilization."

Hastening Slowly

There is a pause, or certainly a slackening of pace, in the church reunion movement. Fraternal interchanges are becoming more and more frequent, Anglicans going much farther than they were prepared to do a few years ago, but no definite steps are at present being taken towards attempting to unite Anglicans and non-conformists—or free churchmen, as they much prefer to be called. The Archbishop of York has addressed, in his most persuasive style, the Congregational, Baptist, and English Presbyterian Assemblies, the Bishop of Petersburg has addressed the United Free Church of Scotland Assembly, and the Archbishop of Canterbury has expounded at considerable length to the (Established) Church of Scotland Assembly the Lambeth Appeal—which, by the way, the "Scotsman" newspaper calls "a supreme masterpiece of ambiguity, lofty in tone, but capable of any and every interpretation." The value of the appeal and the utterances and efforts that have followed it is that the issues have become more clearly defined and we now know precisely what are the obstacles to reunion. The present is a time for thinking and conferring and preparing for further action when the right time comes. Meanwhile the movement for the union of the two great Scottish Presbyterian churches progresses, while British Methodists—Wesleyan, Primitive, and United—are gradually drawing closer together. There is sharp difference of opinion among Methodists in regard to methods and details, rather than the general principle, of the proposed union, and it remains to be seen whether these can be harmonized. As there is much misunderstanding, the Rev. E. Aldom French, convener of the united committee appointed two years ago by the three conferences, has made the position clear. After preliminary inquiry, the committee presented to last year's conferences a draft scheme for union, which was submitted to the synods last month (May); not in order that the question of the desirability or otherwise of Methodist union might be decided, but for "suggestions." The united committee was directed by the conferences to receive these suggestions and to embody them, as far as possible, in an amended scheme to be presented to the next conferences. In the great majority of the thirty-five synods of the Wesleyan Methodist church, which is much the larger body, amendments antagonistic to union were proposed, but in only two synods were these carried. The synods have not declared in favor of union, they were not asked to pronounce upon it this year, but they have kept the door open for the continuance of the negotiations in spite of the efforts of a minority to close it. The majority in favor of the course is more than 4 to 1. Nor are all the minority to be regarded as opposed to union. In some synods those who led the opposition openly stated that if the churches adopt union they will loyally support the United church. In the great majority of the Wesleyan synods a requisition in favor of the substitution of federation for organic union was proposed, but adopted in only one of the 35 synods. When the amended scheme is prepared to maintain a union it will be submitted to the synods and quarterly meetings. At the last meeting of the united committee against a resolution proposing to postponement on the whole question, Mr. Aldom French carried an amendment instructing the committee to continue its work.

World Brotherhood

Mr. William Ward, president of the World Brotherhood Federation, left England a few days ago on an important mission to the North American continent. Before sailing he stated that after the World Brotherhood conference at Washington last year a big wave of enthusiasm for the movement spread over the United States, and there was a notable accession to the membership of the federation. The National Council for the states, which was decided on last October, has now been set up, and Mr. Ward is to meet that body, in conjunction with the North American members of the World Brotherhood executive committee, to complete the arrangements for the visit of their delegation to the congress to be held in Prague next August. Mr. Ward will also confer with brotherhood friends as to a comprehensive forward movement throughout the United States in the autumn. "Many circumstances," he says, "have hitherto conspired to prevent us from taking full advantage of the enthusiasm aroused at the Washington congress, but I am advised that the time has now arrived for a good start to be made with our brotherhood campaign." He adds that the prospects for the movement were never brighter than now. "I have received requests," he says, "from all parts of the world for information concerning our aims and immediate program; and I have been urged to send delegates to various countries to explain the movement and to assist the local committees in the organization work. Calls of this character have come from Scandinavia, Germany, Denmark, India, China, Japan, and South Africa. In the latter case, with General Smuts already at the head of the brotherhood movement, we are assured of strong support and wise direction to any special efforts that may be made when the financial position is satisfactory. Unfortunately, with so many other demands upon them, men and women of goodwill have found it difficult to help the brotherhood movement financially, but the clouds are passing. Mr. Ward's experience is that the brotherhood gospel has but to be proclaimed fearlessly to evoke an immediate response from the people of all lands. During and since the war the organization of which Mr. Ward is the head has done much to relieve distress on the continent of Europe. For instance, for nearly three years a number of Serbian boys and girls have been the guests of the brotherhood movement in this country, while in England these Serbian refugee children have made remarkable progress in their English education and training. One of the boys is the leading scholar at the Faversham Grammar School, where the children are quartered, and in many cases the village youths have been outstripped by their Serbian competitors in football, cricket, and other English sports. The little visitors are now seeing the sights of London, and on Saturday they take part in the London brotherhood festival at the Crystal Palace.

Ambassadors of God

By S. PARKES CADMAN

In this book, just from the press, Dr. Cadman, well-known Brooklyn preacher, maintains that the outstanding truths for preachers to proclaim are few, simple and experimental. He bids them find these truths in the Scriptures and shows how their greater peers in the Christian church through all the centuries have taken this Scripture material, and shaped it, each to the needs of his own generation.

Right About, Face! *

HERE we face a radical change—from a murderous hater of the Christian religion to a most devoted adherent. The picture is sharp. There are no blurred lines, no foggy atmosphere, everything stands out as clearly as a white tower backed by dense green foliage. Every effect demands a cause. What is back of this effect? The Living Lord. Give as much weight to the internal struggle of Paul as you please, value the impression made upon his mind by the fidelity and bravery of the martyrs as highly as you must, consider the consent of his inner heart to the noble teachings of the Man of Galilee, do not ignore his reaction against the whole business of persecution; in a word, give proper weight to all the psychological processes, and all must fall to the ground unless you evaluate the Risen, Living Lord. There is another way to prove this: when Paul became a preacher what was the big idea around which he gathered his ideas? The Resurrection of Jesus. There is no dodging this evident fact. This is a gospel of power, sacrifice and intense loyalty because he has been convinced that Jesus, the good man, dared to die for his cause and that after his death he was raised to eternal life. No enthusiasm for a dead man could have changed Paul. No appreciation for a simple life or for a beautiful new religion could have given him his fiery spirit in his new faith. Only the conviction that Jesus was crucified and after that was raised to new life, could have given him his gospel of light and power. Just how the vision appeared, just what the objective Jesus was, just how the voice spoke I do not know, and what is more, I do not particularly care, although it is an interesting academic question. Just how wheat nourishes me I do not know. Precisely how the electric battery in my car functions I do not know. I do know that I live by bread and that when I put my foot on the starter the car moves. I know that Paul was converted and that the thing that converted him was the conviction, the undoubted fact that Jesus was alive and at the right hand of God. I know that only such a faith gets very far today. Ethical Culture is fine. We all want to be nice, refined, gentle people. We want to be artistic, capable of understanding Browning and able to criticize art exhibitions. But underneath there must be some bones. We are not jelly-fish. Refinement is often only the face-powder of civilization! Do we believe with all our hearts in a holy God who demands righteousness? Do we believe that His Son, Jesus Christ, is now a Living, Reigning Lord and not a mere disembodied ghost? There have not been lacking very bright and very good men who have entirely glossed over this vital fact. I am interested in the fact that Jesus, the man, lived a beautiful life. I am concerned that his teachings were wonderfully wise, challenging and brilliant. But I am not a disciple of some dead Socrates or Aristotle. I am not a follower of some martyred Lincoln or Huss. I do not propose to dedicate my life and enthusiasms to anything less than a divine Son of God who rose from the dead and who guarantees me an eternal life for faithful service and trust.

How easy it is to get side-tracked upon the "How"; it is the big fact to which we must hold ourselves. That fact is "Conversion." Have you ever been converted? In a certain church worshipped a man of strict morality and of high aspiration. He was as near perfect as a human being can be. One day while presiding at the communion table he suddenly broke into tears. After that he was as humble, gentle, brave and sacrificial as a man can possibly hope to be. What happened? A sudden realization of the truth of the facts with which he was dealing: Jesus died for him; Jesus, alive for evermore, making intercession for him; Jesus, the Son of Almighty God, the Saviour of his own heart as well as of the whole world. Show me the converted men and women and I will show you the fiery and powerful leaders in the church at large. Paul can only be explained in terms of his conviction of the Resurrected Christ.

BOOKS

CHURCH COOPERATION IN COMMUNITY LIFE, by Paul L. Vogt. THE RURAL CHURCH SERVING THE COMMUNITY, and RURAL SOCIAL ORGANIZATION, both by Edwin L. Earp. Doctor Vogt is director of the rural church work of the M. E. church and Professor Earp is a teacher of sociology at Drew Seminary. Both have written before on the rural church problem and gained recognition as experts in that field. Professor Vogt seeks to relate the rural church program to its community under the new social interests. He writes out of a rich experience in the rural church field and with a solid background in sociological knowledge. He deals especially with the program of the local church and with problems of denominational adjustment. Professor Earp, in the first book, covers questions of survey as well as that of church program. Both relate the program to the larger considerations of the new rural life movement. In Rural Church Organization Professor Earp gives us a very concise outline study of the entire rural community and the rural life movement in its organizational aspects. For a short book it is the best yet written on the problem. (Abingdon Press.)

DEMOCRACY AND ASSIMILATION, by Julius Drachsler. Professor Drachsler has rendered a distinct service in making the study contained in this book. He has blazed a new path by studying the question of intermarriage between the various races in the United States and by attempting to evaluate the forces of amalgamation and assimilation. Part I of the book is given over to a discussion of the causes which gave rise to the so-called Americanization movement, and to an examination of the various factors which go to make up, to hold together or to disintegrate the immigrant community. It is in part II that Professor Drachsler makes his distinct contribution, and, in fact, there is little doubt that the author would have made his work much more widely known if he had treated this part of the present book in a separate volume. The author has made a careful study of 100,000 marriage records of New York City, and here presents his findings, with special reference to intermarriages between various racial groups. He presents a large body of statistical data and indicates the various ways in which these are to be interpreted.

The book is a very scholarly piece of work and one which no student of the problem of immigration can well afford to ignore. Every page shows the endless effort and the careful study which the author has put into it. The book is thoroughly documented; the footnotes are, in themselves, very valuable, especially from the scholar's point of view. The volume is destined to take a definite place in the literature dealing with the subject of immigration. Although the author views the problems from the point of view of the student, nevertheless he has considered matters practically and not too idealistically. (Macmillan, $2.50).

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Presbyterians Will Promote Work at State University

The Presbyterians propose to stir up their brethren in Wisconsin with regard to religious work at the state university. A committee of business men and ministers is touring the state in behalf of this interest. They started the canvass at LaCrosse and will cross the state in the work. The University of Wisconsin enjoys a very high standing in the educational world, and like all of the state universities of the middle west, it has an ever-increasing student body. Twenty years ago a university professor visited the denominational state meetings vainly seeking a denomination that would inaugurate some religious work on the campus of the university. Now most of the evangelical bodies are more excited over the idea than the professor was then. He saw it first and it has taken time for the idea to catch on among the church people.

United Presbyterians Will Have Denominational Paper

At the General Assembly of the United Presbyterian church at Philadelphia, the question of a denominationally owned newspaper was brought up by a committee which reported favorably on the project. The assembly with little debate accepted the report of the committee. Another committee was created, a committee of five, which was charged with carrying out the will of the assembly. Whether the privately owned papers will come into the system remains to be seen. All northern Baptist papers have been absorbed into the denominational organ, The Baptist, excepting the Watchman-Examiner of New York.

Independent Christian Science Church Formed

The schism in the Christian Science ranks continues to widen. This is occasioned by the pending lawsuits which will determine who will control the huge profits of the Christian Science publishing business. It is also occasioned by the very autocratic form of government which prevails in this group. Recently a group of Christian Scientists met in Hotel Astor in New York and formed the First Independent Christian Science church of that city. This act was a protest against alleged arbitrary action on the part of the mother church in Boston. From some source there seems to have been released a lot of mortal mind among the followers of Mrs. Eddy.

Discouraged About the Passion Play

The village of Oberammergau is discouraged about the Passion Play. It seems to them that the world is in no mood to stop and consider the sacred mysteries which in the past have been presented every ten years. Tourists are not going to Germany in large numbers and it was the tourist patronage which had much to do with the success of the venture. Formerly the play was given every ten years, but the war has made a break in the succession and it is possible that the whole idea may be given up. If so the religious world will feel distinctly poorer, for the Passion Play of Oberammergau has attracted both Catholic and Protestant to a common shrine to bow before their great common possession, the Christ of faith.

Dr. Agar Talks Efficiency to Baptists

During the past year Dr. Agar, the well-known Baptist church efficiency expert, has been gathering fresh figures on the matter of church efficiency. While the Baptist denomination takes in new members each year which equal about eight per cent of the membership, their losses each year are four per cent by exclusion and erasure. The most startling fact discovered is that 27 per cent of the membership reported by Baptist churches is non-resident and therefore seldom actively related to the work at all. Only fifty per cent of the denomination are regular givers by pledge. Seven per cent of the money of the churches comes from the loose contributors. This is Dr. Agar's answer to those church members who assert they will give but will not pledge. By such facts as these this able church efficiency expert has sought to stir up the people of his household of faith to more effective work.

Well-Known Baptist Layman Joins Babson

Two well-known Christian laymen of America will be co-workers henceforth. Mr. George W. Coleman, a Baptist, is well known as the advocate of the forum method of social discussion in the churches. Through his efforts the Forum in Ford Hall, Boston, has been carried on successfully and many other forums have been set up in various parts of the country. Roger W. Babson is the Congregational layman who has been making speeches all over the country to business men urging the importance of religion as one of the foundations of the social order. Mr. Babson conducts a statistical organization which supplies business men with facts. Mr. Coleman has been engaged to be the president and dean of Babson Institute, a new and unusual school for business executives.

Y. M. C. A. Ministers to Russian Bourgeois

Over one hundred thousand Russian refugees are to be found in Germany. These have been driven from their homes by the bolsheviks for various reasons. They are made up of landed proprietors, government officials, professors, lawyers and army officers. In days gone by they were people of resource and of refinement, but under the new conditions are destitute of the means of life. Both the Quakers and the Y. M. C. A. are ministering to them. The association is setting up its characteristic program of recreation, education and religious instruction. These refugees wait with what patience they can possess for the end of the bolshevik rule or such modification of the program of this group as shall give them a chance in Russia for life.

Noted Music Publisher Passes Away

One of the well known figures in evangelical church circles in Chicago, Mr. Edwin O. Excell, a song evangelist and a publisher of musical books, died recently. Mr. Excell came to have a national reputation through his work as chorister for Sam Jones. He composed many tunes for the words of gospel hymns. Prominent in Sunday school circles, in 1914 he was made vice president of the international association. In 1916 he became treasurer of this organization and was holding that position at the time of his death.

Methodists Get Out a Manual on Publicity

The Methodists are becoming keen on the subject of publicity for their churches. They have a national department which is a clearing house for publicity ideas. At the recent Council of Cities held at Buffalo, an address was delivered by Ralph Welles Keeler, director of the department of publicity for home missions. The address made such an impression that it has been put into printed form and will be circulated among town and city Methodist pastors everywhere. The subject of the booklet is "Publicity for City Methodism."

Will Try to Keep Episcopalians Married

The problem of keeping married folks married is felt by religious folks to be one of the great problems of civilization today. Most sections of the country report a large increase in the divorce rate, due doubtless to many ill-considered marriages during the war. In the Protestant Episcopal church a society has been formed called "The Society for Upholding the Sanctity of Marriage." There are many Episcopalians who believe that divorce should never be allowed for any cause. These will endeavor to interpret their ideals to the rest of the church.

Missionary Becomes Financial Administrator

Rev Roscoe R. Hill, for many years a Disciple missionary in Cuba, and in more recent years president of a Spanish-speaking normal school in New Mexico, has been appointed as financial administrator for Nicaragua. The United States has a protectorate over that country at the present time and there was needed an administrator with an excellent knowledge of the Spanish language and of Latin American problems.

Eight Scholarships for Baptist Young Men

The cooperation of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society, the Board of Education of the Northern Baptist Convention and the New York City Mission Societies has brought about the offering of eight scholarships which are available to Baptist young men who wish to fit themselves for service in Americanization, settlement work or religious education. The young men must hold the A. B. degree and commit themselves to carry on the work indicated. The courses will be given in Columbia University.

Theological Seminary Has Commencement

The Northern Baptist Theological Seminary of Chicago held its commencement recently. A number of honorary degrees were conferred. The commencement address was delivered by a Chicago pastor, Dr. Judson B. Thomas, on "Denominationalism—an Asset or a Liability." In the view of the speaker it was a great asset. The graduating class this year is composed of twelve men and women, four of whom are to become deaconesses. The institution was founded a few years ago in protest against the alleged heresies of the University of Chicago.

Ministers' Meetings End with Picnic

In many cities the ministers are ending the season of their activities by holding a picnic for the ministers and the families. The Baptist ministers of St. Louis held such a picnic at Forest Park. The Disciples ministers of Chicago voted not to adjourn the first of June according to custom but carried their meetings on into July. A recent meeting was held at the University of Chicago in fellowship with students and professors of that institution who are of the same denominational persuasion. These ministers are talking of a picnic for the whole Disciples constituency of Chicago. This used to be an annual custom but the custom fell into disuse a number of years ago.

Denominational Lines Tangled at Famous Little Church

"There's a church in the valley by the wildwood" has been sung by many groups of Christians in recent years in appreciation of the little country church of happy memory. The church that originally inspired the lines of this hymn is located at Bradford, Iowa, a country corner near Nashua. It is a Congregational church which now has a Disciple pastor. On a recent Sunday Rev. Elbert Robb Zaring, editor of Northern Christian Advocate (Methodist), filled the pulpit of the Disciples minister in the Congregational church. The little church is visited by many pilgrims, being especially popular for weddings. So many people have come here to be married that the congregation now charges a fee of five dollars for the use of the building. The visitor's register accumulates names at the rate of five thousand a year.

Miss Maude Royden Has Found a Church

Miss Maude Royden preached last year at the Kensington Town Hall of London. She is rapidly becoming the outstanding preacher of the city. Though an Episcopalian, she finds the pulpits of her own denomination closed against her. She has tried in vain to secure the use of some Episcopal buildings which are now closed, feeling that her work needs the atmosphere of a church building. Recently she secured the use of a Congregational building in Westminster. The Fellowship Guild, her supporting organization, is made up of Anglicans and nonconformists.

Ministers Crossing the Ocean This Summer

Tourist travel was interrupted for many years by the war but it is rapidly getting back to normal. This summer large numbers of ministers will cross the Atlantic. The Federal Council has been securing their names and they will be

The Northern Baptist Convention

(By Our Own Correspondent)

THE peak of interest at the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines, June 22-28, was reached on Thursday when the question of a big endowment with a creedal attachment was considered. The discussion came at the end of a hot, weary day, when the nerves of the crowd were on edge. Rev. Charles W. White, secretary of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society, had announced that his board had accepted a gift of a million and half from an anonymous layman on the Pacific coast for the carrying on of Baptist mission work in the west. The gift was accompanied by a proviso that the proceeds of the endowment could not be used to support ministers who did not subscribe to the creed that was attached. In this creed was a reference to the "visible" return of Jesus and to the Baptist conversion formula of baptism on confession of faith. The layman wanted to change his creed just a little to close up one more gap in it, and the convention was voting on the acceptance of the gift, including the changes.

Rev. R. M. Vaughan of Newton Center, Mass., led the floor fight against the acceptance of the gift on these terms. He demanded that the society negotiate with the donor for the removal of the condition. Judge F. W. Freeman of Denver, a prominent premillennialist, closely associated with Dr. J. C. Masee and Dr. W. B. Riley of the Conference on Fundamentals, spoke in behalf of the creed and the acceptance of the gift. There was noise and disturbance in the discussion and some unhappy personalities. In spite of parliamentary procedure, extraneous matter was dragged into the debate, as when Dr. M. P. Boynton of Chicago charged that "the Divinity School of the University of Chicago had betrayed its trust in using Baptist endowment funds to teach doctrines that are unbaptistic." The meeting was due for adjournment at 5:30, but it went on to 6:30, when a vote was taken. With over two thousand delegates present, the vote seemed to be about in the ratio of three to two in favor of receiving the money with the creed tied to it. The missionary secretary won, but with such a narrow margin that he certainly faces further trouble.

GOOD HUMOR AMID EXCITEMENT

The future policy of the Baptists with regard to conditional endowment came up for discussion on Saturday morning. The chairman was evidently nervous. When some in the galleries began to shout, and it looked as if the disorder of Thursday night would break out again he threatened the crowd that if they did not behave, "He would throw them into a prayer-meeting for the rest of the forenoon." The fear of this quieted everybody. In the midst of the debate he made the house stand up and sing "From every stormy wind that blows." The humor of this was not lost on the audience. It was finally decided to appoint a committee composed of the personnel of all the Baptist boards to bring in a recommendation to the next convention with regard to endowments having creedal conditions attached. This committee will be composed of over a hundred men and women, the most prominent of the convention.

Another of the big moot questions of the convention was settled so quietly that the hour set apart for debate was not at all needed. Last year a committee had been appointed to consider the charges of heresy in schools and colleges. This committee has really done a great deal of investigative work. It was headed by Dr. Frank M. Goodchild, of New York. The minority report brought in by Franklin W. Sweete was an aggressively liberal document while the majority report might be called in vulgar parlance a case of "pussy-footing." The difference between these offered occasion for violent debate, but through some arrangement effected outside the session, the convention agreed to receive and file both reports without adopting either one. This disposed of the movement which had sought to put the entire line of Baptist theological professors on the rack. Mr. Sweete called attention in his report to the fact that not a single Baptist institution has been requiring a creed, but that during the past year a certain institution took action, setting up a definite list of doctrines as qualifying conditions for its managers, teachers and trustees. Figures given by Mr. Sweete on the efficiency of ministers trained in Baptist seminaries as compared to untrained ministers were a complete answer to reactionary criticism.

PLAN OF THE CONVENTION

The Northern Baptist Convention was organized a little over a decade ago. Previous to that time the annual gathering consisted of a series of conventions of the various missionary societies. The convention is composed of one member of each church for every hundred members. If all the ten thousand Baptist churches in the north took advantage of their rights to representation, there would be an impossible multitude. As a matter of fact at Des Moines the delegates numbered around 2,500. Visitors were given the privilege of the galleries, and of these there may have been a thousand. To the convention all of the societies make their reports and the con-drafted into service in England during their travels. This is a part of the program of British and American churchmen to cultivate Anglo-American friendship by frequent interchanges of pulpits and by such other contacts as will beget acquaintance and good-will.

Dr. Grenfell's Mother Passes Away

The mother of Dr. Grenfell of Labrador fame, passed away at her home in England recently at the advanced age of 89 years. She was very proud of her missionary son, and was always interested in his work. A few years ago she suffered a fall which resulted in the fracture of a leg, but she made a remarkable recovery from this accident.

No-Tobacco League Makes Progress

The organization of churchmen against the tobacco habit is the work of the No-Tobacco League of Indianapolis. The secretary is Rev. Charles M. Fillmore of Indianapolis. Mr. Fillmore reports that in seven states this society has established itself. The league will hold its annual meeting at Winona Lake, Ind., in August. It is expected that before the year is over organizations will be effected in Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, Mississippi and Kentucky. Strong emphasis is laid upon the harmful effect of tobacco among juveniles.

vention nominates the officers of the several societies. The convention publishes a weekly journal, "The Baptist," has a board of promotion and in many ways functions as an aggressively active organization.

Except in the emotional stress of debate, business is conducted in good order. Nearly all of the reports were in print, as were some of the resolutions. A weekly journal furnished a daily edition with full announcements and the texts of resolutions. The result of this in the conduct of business was greatly to expedite all the ordinary legislation.

The convention exercises only advisory authority over the local Baptist church. Even though a creed were adopted by the convention, it could only be recommended to the churches. Most of the program of the annual gathering is taken up with inspirational addresses on Baptist work. Certain changes are contemplated for the future. June has been extremely hot for two years, and as the delegates mopped perspiration they voted cheerfully to recommend that the time of convention be changed back to May. It is proposed to convene biennially instead of annually. The most unusual change proposed is one for limiting the number of possible convention cities. Five cities will be chosen, possibly more but not less, which are suitable for a Baptist convention in the light of the fact that the geographical center of Baptist population is in Indiana. These cities will not be taken necessarily in rotation, for it is recognized that events may make it expedient to go to a city out of its turn. The cities chosen must be able to make a national convention comfortable in every way.

When the convention assembled on the first day, the various state delegations were organized separately. From each state was chosen one member for each of four important committees. These committees are on Order of Business, Next Meeting, Resolutions and Nominations. The international fellowship of the Baptists was most dramatically illustrated by the introduction of people from all over the world. Native girls from oriental mission lands who have been studying in this country were introduced and later used in a pageant celebrating fifty years of history for the women's foreign missionary society. Delegates from the Scandinavian countries, England, Latvia and other sections helped the delegates to conceive their denomination as a truly world-wide organization. The pageant on Wednesday evening was a triumph of dramatic art and made a deep impression. It set forth five decades of missionary history, and the call from the field at the present time.

Dr. John Y. Aitchison reported for the board of promotion of the Northern Baptist Convention. He has been the leader for 1,500,000 Baptists in 10,666 churches. The board of promotion has correlated the activities of seven national, thirty-four state and ten city organizations. These have presented a united appeal instead of the old method of competitive activity. He reported that the Baptists were the first great denomination to pay off their Interchurch obligation of $2,500,000. Large sums were borrowed for this purpose, but they are being rapidly paid off from the receipts of the Baptist World Movement.

Dr. Aitchison reported that the total subscriptions to the New World Movement aggregated $57,824,299.85. The total cash receipts of the past year for this movement were $12,596,694.48, of which $778,268.18 came from annuities, legacies and invested funds, while the remainder represented actual giving. "Northern Baptists are confident of their ultimate success in raising the $100,000,000 fund," Dr. Aitchison declared. The board of promotion had an expense budget the past two years of $1,900,000, of which over $300,000 was for printing. The board of promotion is asking for twenty millions this coming year for Baptist causes.

The committee on interdenominational relations reiterated the utterance of the Denver convention in 1919: "In the nature of the case anything like organic union of Baptist churches with other denominations is impossible." The committee asserted on its own account: "There is little likelihood that the churches of the Northern Baptist Convention will participate in a movement toward organic unity. The task before the church today, however, is so vast as to be impossible of accomplishment by any one denominational body or by all the denominations acting as separate units without cooperative planning and endeavor fully and loyally in every way consistent with its principles and polity."

INNOCUOUS SOCIAL SERVICE RESOLUTION.

In the field of social service the denomination declared for disarmament, for the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, for the abatement of the nuisance of evil dance halls and immoral movies and made some declarations of a general sort in behalf of industrial justice, so worded as to hurt no one's feelings. The committee on evangelism is enthusiastic for the use of the professional evangelist as an aid to the pastor in mass evangelism. It is proposed to use many of these professionals during the coming year.

Denominational Day is to be made a permanent institution in the calendar of the church. Last spring the topic on that day was "The Need of a Regenerate Church Membership." The third Sunday in April will henceforth be observed every year as denominational day, and on a single day the whole denomination will think together with regard to the great fundamentals of the faith.

The denomination now has an effective publicity department in connection with the New World Movement. This department not only advertises the missionary interests of the church, but during the convention maintained a department for the convenience of the press. As result the Baptists enjoyed good publicity, friendly and accurate, throughout the convention.

The most conservative of the great evangelical denominations, and with the long history, the Baptist denomination enjoys that strength and enthusiasm which arises out of cohesiveness and much persecution. It is a denomination that has never been in any country a state church. Its people originally numbered not many of the rich or the learned of this world, though now there are many of both. It claims to place special emphasis upon a regenerate church membership, the use of the New Testament ordinances in their original form, the possession of soul liberty and the operation of the Holy Spirit. Baptists have protested historically against state establishment of religion, sacerdotalism and sacramentarianism.

Northern Baptists have wider extremes of culture in their membership than do southern Baptists. For this reason the problem of unity is more sensitive. The Moody Bible Institute type of minister has found in this denomination a most fruitful field. At the same time some of the best trained men of Harvard, Yale and Chicago are to be found here. At the University of Chicago Divinity School alumni organization there were 140 ministers present. These extremes mean that the denomination will continue to have great difficulties in maintaining unity until the stragglers have time to catch up. O. F. J.

episcopal diocese in the country has grown beyond the ability of even two men to administer. Bishop Manning is regarded as a high churchman, but the two suffragans are low churchmen, the Rev. A. S. Lloyd and the Rev. Herbert Shipman. The choice of these men indicates that it is impossible in this diocese for any one type of churchman completely to dominate the situation. The diocese of New York has larger influence upon the church than any other, and the reconciliation of divergent viewpoints in the office of the bishop augurs well for the future unity of the Protestant Episcopal church in its national life.

Conservative Theologian Passes

Bibliotheca Sacra, of Oberlin, has been known throughout the Christian world as a journal devoted to the defence of the older modes of religious thought. It was ably edited by G. Frederick Wright, D. D., LL. D., F. G. S. A., of Oberlin. He served for many years as professor of apologetics in Oberlin College. He passed away recently. His studies in geology as well as scriptural disciplines gave him academic standing.

Summer Students Will Hear Good Preaching

The students of the University of Chicago will hear good preaching this summer. The announcement which has been issued includes the following eminent names: Professor Harris Franklin Rall, of the Garrett Biblical Institute, Northwestern University, June 26; Professor James H. Snowden, of Western Theological Seminary, Pittsburgh, Pa., July 3; Professor Theodore Gerald Soares, of the University of Chicago Divinity School, July 10; Professor Allan Hoben, of Carleton College, July 17; Professor Gerald Birney Smith, of the University of Chicago Divinity School, July 24; and Professor Herbert Lockwood Willett, of the Disciples' Divinity House, Chicago, July 31. For the month of August the University Preachers will be President Ozora S. Davis, of the Chicago Theological Seminary; Rev. J. Bradford Pengelly, of St. Paul's church, Flint, Mich.; and Dr. Carter Helm Jones, of the First Baptist church, Philadelphia, Pa., who will be the Convocation Preacher on August 28.

Noted Southern Baptist Passes

Last May Dr. J. B. Gambrell completed four years service as president of Southern Baptist Convention. He was ill at the time, but it was hoped that he might recover. He passed away on June 10, his funeral service being held in First church of Dallas. He was nearly eighty years of age. He made a trip through Europe last year for the purpose of comforting and carrying aid to Baptists in the stricken war countries of Europe. He served his denomination in a great many capacities, being successively college president, seminary professor, editor, secretary, pastor and president of the Southern Baptist Convention. He was known for his keen wit, his quaint illustrations and his intense theological convictions.

Big Meeting Over New Missionaries

A notable missionary meeting was that held in Third Christian church, of Indianapolis, June 10. It was a service of public recognition and farewell given in honor of fifty new missionaries set apart by the Disciples communion to the service of the gospel in foreign fields. Forty of these have been trained in the College of Missions of Indianapolis. Thirty-five other missionaries were present at the meeting. Two leading missionary officials, Dr. F. W. Burnham and Dr. Stephen J. Corey, conducted the meeting, and the address was given by Dr. George A. Campbell, pastor of Union Avenue Christian church of St. Louis. At the close of the meeting a pageant entitled, "On to Lhasa," was staged in honor of Dr. A. L. Shelton, who is returning to Thibet with four new missionaries. Dr. Shelton was captured by bandits nearly two years ago in China near the Tibetan border. He has been recovering from a surgical operation made necessary by the suffering he underwent while in captivity.

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffeine contained in each:

Black tea —1 cupful.....	1.54 gr.
(hot) (5 fl. oz.)
Green tea —1 glassful.....	2.02 gr.
(cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice)
Coca-Cola —1 drink, 8 fl. oz.....	.61 gr.
(prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup)

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

A Summer University Course at Small Expense

THOUSANDS of ministers—as well as laymen—are endeavoring to keep abreast of these rapidly moving times by spending half the summer at some of the universities. This is a wise plan. But some cannot do this. University courses are expensive and six weeks is a long period to be away from one's work. Why not pursue a home study course? Going to the university, you would have perhaps three or four courses of lectures and studies. This would cost you perhaps $200. If you must stay at home, you can feast upon a dozen courses from such men as Dr. John H. Hutton and Dean Inge of England, and Prof. Albert Parker Fitch and Bishop McConnell of America. And the cost to you will be only about $20.00. In other words, buy the right books, read and study.

The Outline of History

By H. G. WELLS

A SURVEY OF THE 41 CHAPTERS

The World's Dawn.

The world was old long before the coming of man, those immeasurable ages of life's first faint stirrings of which most of us know so little and are unable to learn much from professorial monographs. The "Outline" gives this marvellously interesting story in language which brings before the mind's eye a thoroughly understandable realization of those ages through which mass and matter passed, up to the crude beginnings of living creation, and thence to the giant reptiles and animals—a brilliantly told story, covering millions of years and culminating in the advent of man.

Man's Advent.

The dim mystery of man's origin is wisely dealt with. Sources are examined—the Bible, Evolution, and so on, in the light of actual discoveries of the Neanderthalic and other ages, and so is composed a picture of earliest human life and origins, which is full of enlightenment on the question. After that picture, the reader is shown mankind's victories and failures in the struggle for life against mammoths and monsters, his gradual rise from the primitive, the instinct of love and hate, the family idea, the earliest methods of protection and reasoning, the growth of intelligence. And so he emerges from savagery, he takes his first step along the path which leads to today.

Civilization's Cradle.

It is curious to picture an inarticulate world, yet it was so until man began to think; then came speech, which for long was the only means of record, a time of mythology and superstition out of which religion grew. The next steps in communication were signs, picture-language and writing, then art and culture. How, gradually over many centuries, all this came about in different parts of the world is told in the "Outline" and a marvellously fascinating story it is, of a world in civilization's cradle, still in the swaddling clothes of development.

History's Beginnings.

When mankind woke up to a realization of cause and effect, history began; sanguinary wars, brutal enslavings of nations, wholesale magnificent though crude conceptions. Thrilling pages these make in "Outline," wherein graphic portrayal is given of how these early races, some vanished, others surviving, made history, and in doing so wove the fabric of the world's polity, out of which evolved both the freedoms and oppressions of today.

In Anno Domini.

A right understanding of these years is necessary to the student of social and political questions, particularly in early Anno Domini when the world consciousness was keen and its conscience impressionable. It was the age of mind over matter, of noble chivalries struggling amid selfishness and greed, of Crusades and Magna Charta, the dawn of light and freedom. These two thousand years of progress are vividly outlined by Mr. Wells in words which get at the truth through the glamour and glitter and leave the reader in good view of the facts in accurate perspective.

What of Tomorrow?

After coming down to recent years, traversing the nineteenth century and revealing much about the Great War, the author takes the reader to the top of the high tower of his farsightedly practical imagination and shows him the world as it is to be if right and freedom are to sway and mankind is to gain good from the trials which have lately been tearing civilization. Without doubt such a coherent and common-sense plan of world co-operation as here depicted is an ideal worth the sacrifice of the War years, and if it is to come it will only be by united and unselfish action. Such a plan to study and work for is alone worth many times the cost of these volumes—invaluable as they are in other respects.

Singing the Social Gospel

AN OUTSTANDING characteristic of the new hymnal, HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH is its modernness. This has been widely commented upon by the hundreds of church leaders who have adopted the book for their congregations. As an illustration of this quality of modernness we would call attention to the unique section on "The Kingdom of God," with sub-sections entitled "Social Aspiration and Progress," "Loyalty and Courage," "Human Service and Brotherhood," "The Nation," "Peace Among the Nations," etc. In this section are 101 great hymns which sing the evangelical social gospel which the modern pulpit preaches. Many of these have never before been used in a Church hymnal. Here are some of the authors' names:

Emily Green Balch
Nolan R. Best
John Hay
Felix Adler
Charles Mackay
John G. Whittier
Ebenezer Elliott
W. Russell Bowie
Charles Kingsley
Rudyard Kipling
Frank Mason North

John Addington Symonds
William DeWitt Hyde
Richard Watson Gilder
Algernon S. Swinburne
Gilbert K. Chesterton
Washington Gladden
William Pierson Merrill
Katherine Lee Bates
Frederick L. Hosmer
John Haynes Holmes
T. Wentworth Higginson

Think of being able to sing the social gospel as well as to preach it! The social gospel will never seem to be a truly religious gospel until the Church learns to sing it. HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH is the only Church hymnal in which the social note of today's evangelical preaching finds adequate expression. The use of this hymnal will thrill and inspire your congregation with a new vision and purpose.

By Kirby Page

The Sword or The Cross?

From "The Nation" (New York)

"In his searching little volume, "The Sword or the Cross," Mr. Page presents with force and truth the extreme position against war which must in our opinion be taken by everybody who would be a sincere and loyal follower of the teachings of Jesus. Undoubtedly this book would not have been allowed to circulate during the war, which is but another proof of the fact that all wars constitute in themselves a denial of Jesus and everything that he stood for. Mr. Page does not hesitate to accept the logical consequences of his position. Thus he declares in answer to the question whether war is justifiable as a means of preserving political liberty that 'the following of Jesus Christ is infinitely more important than the maintenance of political liberty.' Had the Bolshevists but had the vision to see this at Brest-Litovsk, had they but refused to fight and also to sign the shameless German demands, and thus to resist the German evil, their whole status in the world, and probably their future, would be entirely different. We wish for Mr. Page's little volume what is, alas! an impossible wish, that it be placed in the hands of every school child in this allegedly Christian nation. It would do a world of good and be a powerful weapon in the fight which is now on to save humanity from being exterminated by the very science of warfare which it has lately devised, it being today a problem whether war shall go or civilization perish. Not the least of Mr. Page's service is his final disposition of those phrases of Jesus which, together with the episode of the money-changers in the temple, are so blasphemously cited by the believers in mass-murder to make it appear that Jesus condoned what would have made all his teachings merely ghastly hypocrisy."

EDITORIAL

In the Roped Arena

FOR one momentous day two weeks ago all other interests gave way in the minds of a great majority of the people to a contest between two fighters watched by eighty odd thousand perspiring "fans" in an arena in Jersey City. The contest was advertised as a boxing match, but if it had lacked any of the elements of a prize fight, except the technical fact that the rewards of the contest were stipulated and certain, instead of contingent upon success, it would not have appealed to so large and enthusiastic a constituency. This is in itself a commentary upon the cultural progress of the more or less human race. In this case, however, there was a curious division of sentiment. Nearly everyone was confident that the American would win, but wished that the Frenchman might. This was not due to the courtesy naturally felt toward a foreigner who is a guest on our shores. It was the result of a deep-seated sentiment that in all regards except brute strength the Frenchman was the better man. He had an honorable war record, which was not true of the American bruiser. He is a man of engaging personality. He is interested in other things beside fighting contests. His defeat in the roped arena was foreseen and regretted by nearly all. And that is the hopeful side of the uncivilized business of the prize ring. There was a certain disgust in the attitude of mind with which a large portion of the reading public received the news of the result already discounted by expectation. This was true even of those who staked money on the issue, and won. The prize fight, no matter what the stakes or how distributed, is an outlaw in the civilized world. It must oppose an ever growing and healthy public opinion. It must seek furtively an area where the conscience of the community, or of public officials, is lax and corruptible. Like the saloon it will not long be able to find a place where immunity from a proper regard for law, order and decency can be secured. It is an outlaw and a pariah.

Signs of Promise in Chicago Politics

FOR several years past Chicago has furnished the nation a cause for astonishment and depression in its apparent commitment to an administration notoriously corrupt and extravagant, the plunderer of the taxpayers, and the protector of vicious interests. Mayor Thompson entered upon his first term with an astonishing majority, the proof that his cowboy swagger and sporting associations were rather pleasing to the rank and file of the voters. At once, under the astute leadership of a politician of somewhat shady character, the Lundin-Thompson machine began to take form, one of the most powerful and unscrupulous organizations with which any American city has been cursed. The policy of increasing the numbers of public employes, and boosting salaries for the obedient servants of the city hall regime recruited an army of interested and well-rewarded helpers, who were at the autocratic command of their leaders. After four years of this, the reelection of the mayor was accomplished with a plurality of only fourteen per cent of his first supporters, and was made possible largely by the huge republican victory of the presidential election. But it encouraged the machine to attempt control of the state institutions, and building on the foundations furnished by city and county patronage, the attempt was made with a considerable measure of success to secure control of the state legislature. The original Lundin-Thompson machine became the Lundin-Thompson-Small organization, when the mayor's candidate for governor was elected. The machine then set out to bring the judiciary under city hall control, and a list of judges was submitted to popular decision with every device of adroit campaigning. This, however, was too much even for this subservient community, and the mayor's candidates were soundly beaten, carrying some worthy judges to oblivion because of their suspicious associations. This has been followed by the loss of several pet administration measures in the legislature, all looking to increased power and revenues for the machine.

The Day of Disillusionment

IT begins to look as though even the city council, long the willing or enforced tool of the city hall, had come to something of its former independence, and had started on a plan of abating the intolerable burden of expert fees and special assessments under which the taxpayers are destined to groan for a generation to come. The lists of salaries and fees paid to city employes, who have gradually been removed from civil service conditions, and therefore made more completely tools of the bosses, has become a staggering item in the city's expenses, and the demands of the administration are for ever-increasing allowances for useless or fantastic ends. Without blinking an eye the machine poses as the advocate of lower traction rates on the city transportation lines, an attitude of such manifest insincerity that the further demands for funds to carry on the legal battle are almost humorous. The eyes of the people of the city and the state are rapidly being opened to the character of the incubus which has gradually obtained power to increase and reward its henchmen, and the beginning of the end for this selfish and unscrupulous organization is in sight. When once the people understand that such control as they have granted these plunderers costs them unnecessary millions yearly they will take matters in hand, turn the rascals out, and put the administration of public affairs on a sound basis. Then and then alone shall we see proper provisions for home rule, a just and rightful regulation of public utilities, a rational and equitable system of taxation, the completion of the Chicago Plan, and the adoption of a new state constitution. That will put an end to the hornblowing extravagance of the city hall plunderbund, with its self-exploiting "pageants of progress," its boosting of favored and protected amusement parks, and its other devices for raising funds and deluding the community.

Are Church Conventions Worth What They Cost?

NEARLY every denomination that has an annual national gathering discloses some agitation in favor of changing to a biennial session. The Baptists report a demand of this sort backed by some of their strongest leaders. The Disciples talk at different times unofficially about just such a consummation. Even among Presbyterians an overture has defined itself in favor of limiting the number of meetings of the General Assembly on the basis of the economies involved. A convention which costs each delegate an average of fifty dollars and probably more, runs up some enormous totals when the attendance reaches five or ten thousand, as it occasionally does in the case of certain communions. Are conventions worth the money—especially those conventions which are largely "inspirational," and which leave most of the business to be transacted by executive committees? This question is being widely asked. On the other hand, those denominations which have a biennial meeting are continually facing the demand to go back to the annual meeting. The Congregationalists will be strongly influenced by this suggestion at their meeting in Los Angeles. A great many Congregationalists wish to have counsel on national questions of importance to Congregationalism more frequently than once in two years. While these national gatherings cost a great deal of money, they accomplish some things that are absolutely necessary to the life of a denomination. Sectionalism is held down by frequent intercourse between all states and provinces of North America at the conference table. If the real problems of the denomination get an open discussion, some things are settled to stay settled. Thus differences of opinion find an end somewhere in the overwhelming defeat of some group of protesters. The hundreds and thousands who go to these national meetings bring back to local churches information which breaks down the provincialism of the parish and tends to make the humblest Christian in the land a member of the church universal in his cooperative sympathies. The religious conventions of America total an expense every year running into the millions. Not all of them are worth the money, but most of them are; and they all might be.

"You Made An Ass of Yourself"

HENRY WARD BEECHER once received the following letter: "Dear sir: I journeyed over from my New York hotel yesterday to hear you preach, expecting, of course, to hear an exposition of the gospel of Christ. Instead, I heard a political harangue, with no reason or cohesion in it. You made an ass of yourself." Seating himself at his desk, Beecher turned the sheet over and wrote: "My Dear Sir: I am sorry you should have taken so long a journey to hear Christ preached, and then heard what you are polite enough to call a 'political harangue.' I am sorry, too, that you think I made an ass of myself. In this connection I have but one consolation: that you did not make an ass of yourself; the Lord did that." One is reminded of this incident by the address by Mr. Lloyd George to the Primitive Methodists of Wales, in which he warned the churches not to meddle with political affairs, and especially with the war in Ireland. During the great war the premier was all in favor of the churches meddling in politics, to the extent of supporting the war, but it is different now when they rebuke the lawless Black and Tans. Today, in face of a horror which stains the name of Britain with shame, the prime minister would have the churches deal only in glittering generalities. It is hard to imagine Beecher remaining silent, or dealing only in platitudes, in the presence of such an outrage or in face of the great problems of brotherhood which confront us in industry and in international relations.

Jan Smuts, Practical Christian Idealist

DURING the peace conference the regret was more than once expressed that the greatest statesmen were men of the smallest nations. Masaryk of Bohemia, Venizelos of Greece and Smuts of United South Africa—"the other U. S. A."—were the most fruitful in constructive suggestion, as opposed to an outworn cunning. At the British imperial conference, just closed in London, Smuts was again the outstanding figure, in clear-seeing realism no less than in forward-looking idealism. With the forthrightness of a soldier, and the vision of a Christian seer, he saw the futility of intrigue, and his insight went at once to the heart of things. Mr. Lloyd George was out-topped, both in character and statesmanship, by the sturdy, clear-minded Boer. His type of politics looks tawdry alongside the large-mindedness and practical humanity of the man from South Africa. As a result, at this writing there is a ray of hope for peace on earth, even in Ireland; for the Dominions made it plain that they do not approve of the machine-gun policy of the prime minister. They are tired of his playing politics with a tragedy which imperils the peace not only of the empire, but of the world, and poisons the springs of goodwill between English-speaking peoples. Smuts sees the larger issue, and his plain-spoken honesty is worth more to the world than a fleet of battle-ships.

IN most of us there is a certain self-distrust which makes us wonder what we should do in such emergencies as we can conceive. And it is one of the curiosities of psychology to watch one's own behavior in the midst of unusual things to note what one will do, and judge if it is better than we had thought it might be. With something of detachment sensitive people observe their reactions to life and find themselves encouraged or depressed by their own conduct. But usually they behave with greater poise and courage than they anticipated. Therein, if they would but profit by the self-scrutiny, they discover unknown springs of power within their souls.

Stevenson wisely observes: "It is a commonplace that we cannot answer for ourselves before we have been tried. But it is not so common a reflection, and surely more consoling, that we usually find ourselves a great deal braver and better than we thought. I believe this is everyone's experience; but an apprehension that they may belie themselves in the future prevents mankind from trumpeting this cheerful sentiment abroad. I wish sincerely, for it would have saved me much trouble, there had been some one to put me in a good heart about life when I was younger; to tell me how dangers are most portentous on a distant sight; and how the good in a man's spirit will not suffer itself to be overlaid, and rarely or never deserts him in the hour of need."

It is a part of the gospel of confidence and courage—which is the essence of the message of Jesus—to expect the best from ourselves, as well as from others; and not to be betrayed into the self-distrust which is already a half defeat before the crisis has arrived.

Highest Honors In an Affair of Honor

THE ENTIRE CHURCH in America should rejoice with the Disciples communion in its unprecedented accomplishment in completing a fund of over $600,000 wherewith to pay its share of the $6,000,000 guaranties given to New York banks by the bodies participating in the Interchurch World Movement. And the entire American church will do so when it knows the facts concerning the burden the Disciples had to carry and the heroic and unconquerable spirit in which both their leaders and their rank and file went about carrying it. The break-up of the Interchurch left the Disciples in a position unlike that in which any other of the larger denominations found itself.

With their Men and Millions Movement launched six years before the Interchurch, and completed a year before, the Disciples denomination had been the pioneer among Christian bodies in making a comprehensive and united drive covering its entire field and seeking large sums of money for all its missionary, benevolent and educational interests. Their field had therefore been so recently gleaned of many millions that its soil, though inherently generous, could hardly be presumed upon to bring forth a crop of gifts on a scale equal to the askings of the denominations in the Interchurch. Yet they entered the movement in a spirit more ardent, less captious, more unsuspectingly cooperative than any other of the leading bodies, save, perhaps, the Congregationalists.

The Disciples were favorable to the most thoroughgoing plans of unity. Their leadership was genuinely disappointed at the turn of events when the original idea of a common treasury was displaced, at the behest of certain denominational judicatories, by the idea of each denomination soliciting funds for its own sectarian treasury.

Yet in the face of so recent a clean sweep of their own constituency and in spite of much dissatisfaction with the modified Interchurch scheme, the Disciples societies went heartily and hopefully into the common enterprise. Their societies signed guarantors' notes for $600,000. The Presbyterian and Congregational denominations signed for $1,000,000 and $300,000 respectively; the Northern Baptists signed for $2,500,000, and the Methodists for $1,000,000. When the crash came and the banks were compelled to fall back upon the guarantors for every dollar that had been underwritten, the other denominations paid more promptly than the Disciples, leaving them conspicuous in their apparent failure to match their bond with its execution. Why do not the Disciples come up like the rest of the denominations? it was asked.

The answer is that the other bodies were in positions incomparably more favorable to the prompt and painless discharge of their obligation than that in which the Disciples stood. The Methodists had an overflowing treasury as a result of its just completed Centenary Movement.

They wrote a check for their underwriting obligation. The Baptists raised nearly $60,000,000 by their Interchurch activity. It was easy for them to write a check for their underwritings. The Congregationalists raised a great fund of $30,000,000. They likewise wrote a check. The Presbyterians had raised a great fund also, but decided against the use of any portion of it to pay Presbyterian underwritings. They organized a vigorous campaign throughout their denomination last December which resulted in the securing of only 40 per cent of the amount necessary, just as the Disciples first campaign launched at the same time for the same purpose fell far short of its goal. But the Presbyterians funded the remaining 60 per cent and pushed it forward to be absorbed in future budgets of the denomination.

The Disciples had no fund upon which they could legitimately draw a check. Their missionary funds were already appropriated—over-appropriated, indeed—and all their missionary work would seriously suffer if so large an amount were taken to pay the underwritings. Besides, one-half of the Disciples' total portion had been underwritten by the Educational Board, the youngest and least affluent of the circle of church societies. In fact it could not have produced $10,000 of assets if the banks had undertaken to force payment. What were these Disciples societies to do? The only thing they could do was to go direct to the people and the churches, lay their helpless case before them, and ask them to pay the debt as an affair of honor. It proved a big undertaking. It was necessary to bore through all that stratum of human nature wherein is lodged an instinctive aversion to paying for a "dead horse." The denominational conscience had to withstand the most sordid and enticing solicitations from the reactionary opponents of the Interchurch, who put forward this piece of ethical casuistry: The boards did the signing of the guarantees; they acted upon their own counsel in doing so, and not upon any general authority—the Disciples have no general body that could give such authority; therefore the debt is no debt of honor for the churches of the denomination but for the boards; therefore why should the rest of us worry! Not a few were deceived by this irresponsible—and incomprehensible—propaganda. But the conscience of the body as a whole was unperturbed by it and the money was provided by nearly 3000 churches—a vast number as experienced denominational leaders will agree—as an act of moral integrity and of love.

Here, then, would seem to come to an end the last chapter of that tragedy named the Interchurch World Movement, which was the tragedy of an ideal inspired of God slain by the folly, the short vision and the sectarianism of men—Christian men. Yet the tragedy has served—as all tragedy does—to throw a great light upon the essential nobility of some aspect of the scene in which it takes place. In this instance the unflinching integrity of American Christianity at the point where its honor is involved is made luminous. And, in common fairness, we believe that all denominations will wish to applaud the heroic, faithful and triumphant fashion in which the Disciples of Christ took the unstained banner of Protestantism, thrust into their hand by an unforeseen fate, and planted it, still unstained, at the crest of the hill.

Unescapable Questions

THERE are many Chinese students in American educational institutions, and it appears that several of these academic groups have been concerning themselves with questions relating to the nature and value of religion, and the relation of Christianity to the faiths of the orient. Two such groups have sent out questionnaires to friends in the universities in which they are studying. One of these sets, as quoted by Dr. Clarence H. Hamilton in an article in the Journal of Religion, includes the following inquiries:

Is religion necessary at all? Will not education and the general enlightenment of a community gradually eliminate religion from society? Can not the fine arts give to man satisfaction which religion is supposed to give? In what way, if at all, is the morality of a community dependent on religion?

Does China need Christianity? In what ways, if at all, are the native religions defective? Is Christianity in a position to supplement the native religions? What, in concrete, are some of the things which Christianity can do for the common people of China?

Is not Christianity retarding modern progress, especially progress in forming scientific habits in the solution of problems, by asking men to accept such statements in the Bible as the story of creation, the virgin birth of Jesus, and such creedal doctrines as trinity, resurrection, etc. Are not such practices in Christian churches as public prayer, sacrament, and baptism reactionary from the point of view of a scientific ordering of life?

In face of the persistent missionary movement in China what should the Chinese people do? How can the Chinese prevent the loss of elements in Chinese civilization which, though "alien" to Christianity, seem desirable? How can the Chinese keep China free from those western denominational schisms which rose from historical reasons having little application to China?

These are questions to attract the attention of all sincere students of religion, and to encourage those who are concerned for the Christianization of China. When groups of serious minded young people set their thought upon great themes of this order, there is sure to be a constructive issue to their thinking. Christianity has nothing more to ask than a searching inquiry into its message and ideals. To have been able to enlist the attention of these Chinese students in investigations as much worth while as these is a notable achievement.

Some of the questions bear only upon the problem of China in facing the modern and the western world. It is natural that the friends of the venerable culture of that land should look with disquiet upon any tendency to substitute the learning of another and very different people for its own ancient civilization. Not without care and critical inquiry ought this to be done. There are many Chinese of the first order of intelligence who have looked carefully into the nature of Christianity, and believe that it is not only the faith that China needs, but the only religion that can offer the promise of sound morals and a truly scientific religious belief. It is for these younger Chinese in our institutions of learning to make the like inquiry, and to reach constructive conclusions for the guidance of the generation to which they belong.

But there are deeper questions raised in this questionnaire. They relate to the nature of religion, and to the interpretation of Christianity. They are the sort of questions which young people, particularly of the student class, are asking with deep concern in this generation. Perhaps the youthful mind, with its lack of historical perspective, is little likely to possess the materials for sound judgment on these impressive themes. But it is certain to demand the right of questioning, and to form some sort of opinion on the facts at hand.

And here is where the open mind and the generous spirit is essential in dealing with the questioner. People who are not quite sure of their ground, but are very much devoted to a conventional orthodoxy will proffer a dogmatic answer which leads no whither and shuts off further search for truth. Christianity has nothing to lose and everything to gain from the frank facing of the question as to whether religion is really necessary, or is to be regarded as a phase of culture which will be left behind in the progress of the race.

In meeting the doubts and inquiries of the thoughtful youth of all lands, and particularly our own, one has to confess that their understanding of Christianity has been immensely hindered by small and superficial definitions of the religion of which Jesus Christ was the first interpreter. The relation of the Bible to Christianity has been clouded by impossible theories of a miraculous sort of inspiration inhering in the religious records of Hebrew prophets and Christian apostles. Subordinate events, if events at all, like the virgin birth of Jesus, the miraculous element in his life activity, the physical resurrection of the body, both of Jesus and of his followers, and the narratives of primitive times, have been thrust into the foreground of religious teaching, and misnamed "fundamentals." Doctrines like the trinity, the vicarious efficacy of the blood atonement, the redemptive virtues of a particular form of baptism and of a particular manner of administering the eucharist, have been set in a place of importance far out of proportion to any values which the attentive student of religion can discover in them. And the great basic facts of the life and message of Jesus, his gospel of good will and hope for a social order wherein righteousness may dwell, have been obscured.

Worst of all, the essential oneness and symmetry of the Christian movement have been made difficult of comprehension by the survival of denominational variations which have ceased to have significance either for the interpretation and defense of neglected truth or for the increase of efficiency in Christian service. This is the outstanding difficulty confronted by students of religion in other lands, and by great numbers of purposeful young people in our own. They have the perfect right to ask, as they are doing with such insistence, whether the churches are making it easy or difficult for those who have the training and the outlook of modern life to find conviction and happiness within the circle of the dogmas and the denominational devices of present-day Christianity.

We believe that an increasing number of the Christian leaders of the day are meeting these tests of the younger generation, which is not at heart vicious or giddy, but impatient of evasion and compromise with fact. As for the rest, those who reduce Christianity to a creed, a ritual or an organization, they will go their way, and from the view of those who deal with reality they are already vanishing. They are fighting hopelessly and petulently against the spirit of the age, the spirit of progress, and the spirit of Jesus. The portion of the church that can and will survive is that portion which sets itself fearlessly to face the facts of life, and to apply to them the enduring and ever-unfolding program of the Master of the ages.

Sure Things

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE came unto me a man who inquired of me, saying, Hast thou a little money to invest? For I should like to let thee in on the Ground Floor. I have Inside Information upon a Sure Thing.

And he told me of a Corporation whose stock was selling Very Low, because the Management were Bearing the Market that they might themselves buy a Controlling Interest in it; and how they intended to Bull the stock a little later, and make it Very Valuable, so that he who bought now would make a Nice Little Roll.

And I said, If that be the little game of the Management, I will let them play it. I have long since ceased trying to beat men at their own game. For I have stood and watched the nimble Pea as it made its unobtrusive way from one Shell to another, and I have considered how many times I should have guessed wrong if I had guessed at all.

And he said, Nay, this is no Shell-game, but a Sure Thing.

And I said, There are several men Playing Croquet at the Poor House, and others who have Graduated from business and now are Pitching Horse Shoes at the County Farm, who owe their present relief from the presence of the Maddening Crowd to the generosity of friends who let them in on the Ground Floor of some Sure Thing.

And I said, Listen to me, and understand my position, whether thou doest likewise or no. I do not Gamble. I do not Speculate. I deal with a very few Sure Things, and these are among them:

A Dollar Containeth One Hundred Cents, and no More. It is easier to borrow an Hundred Dollars, than it is to pay back an Hundred and Six. The best way to get Money is to Earn it, and the best way to increase Money is to spend less than one earneth.

And he said, Those are Old Foggy Rules, and they will never get thee far up the Ladder of Finance.

And I said, Those rules and a few other Sure Things have kept me thus far with a safe distance between my door and the Wolf, and I have carfare and a meal ticket for some days in advance.

And that will still be true of me when those who trust in the Inside Information concerning Sure Things are playing checkers somewhere in an Old Men's Home for those who have Seen Better Days.

Christians or Pharisees?

By Katharine Lee Bates

HOW long ago is it that conversation was soothing and gracious exercise? In these latter days, finger-bowl families, that would never dream of eating with their knives, breakfast with sworded tongues, slashing at one another. What wonder, when the father, a solid citizen, has voted for Harding; the mother, an incorrigible Wilsonian, for Cox; the son and daughter, scornful young collegians, for Debs; the maiden aunt for Watkins? You may fondly think yourself a liberal, but to your neighbor on the right you are a bigoted conservative, and to your wealthier neighbor on the left little paler than a red. Old friends, meeting after long absence, quarrel in ten minutes. Under this pressure of incessant, heated argument, it must be a firm spirit indeed that does not, in those silences far beneath the passion of speech, make searching question of itself, striving to ascertain its own quality as affecting, if not determining, opinion, prejudice, judgment.

For instance, I threw back indignant denial to a dear comrade in many labors who, when I refused to accept her roseate view of Lenin and his evangel, retorted sharply through the scandalized telephone: "If you had lived in the time of our Revolution, you would have been a Royalist." But ever since I have been wondering if I would.

THE HAUNTING DOUBT

This is a minor trouble, for there were brave and honorable royalists in those difficult years leading up to 1776, but the haunting doubt which actually torments me and will not let me go is whether, had I been a Jew during the three years of Christ's ministry, I would have stood with him against the pharisees or not. My aversion to the wildfire doctrines of the innumerable fierce agitators of today is embarrassed by this lurking incertitude. From a distance of nearly two thousand years it is easy to condemn the complacent self-righteousness, hypocrisy and cruel greed of the men who, in their own church and time, represented orthodoxy and respectability. We accept without stir of protest the denunciations, familiar since childhood, hurled against them by the passionate young Nazarene, even by him whom we have been taught to think of as the gentle Jesus—lip-worshippers whose hearts are far from God; binders of heavy burdens for other men's shoulders, burdens they themselves will not move a finger to lift; ostentatious in their hollow piety; loving the uppermost rooms at feasts and the chief seats in the synagogues and obsequious greetings in the market-place; devouring widows' houses and for a pretense making long prayers; fools and blind; rigorous in the petty externals of religion but omitting justice, mercy and faith; making clean the outside of the cup and the platter that within are full of extortion and excess; whited sepulchres; serpents; sons of hell.

The pharisees exist for us only in Christ's terrible portrayal. And Christ is our accepted Master, whom the centuries have haloed and enthroned. He speaks with authority and we hear with reverence. But the bitter language of these foreign agitators, whose attacks are directed not against dead and gone pharisees, but against the capitalists of today, repels us as we listen. Yet our repulsion is disconcerted by a misgiving that another voice may be speaking through those angry accents—another foreign voice, a Hebrew voice, the voice of an unschooled young working-man of Galilee, that heretic and radical whom we, though with differing interpretations of the term, acknowledge as the Son of God.

SONS OF HELL

What can be said of the pharisees? They were, in common Hebrew estimation, the "best people." By their name they were "separatists," forming a select society of Jews gathered in "from every region under heaven." They would "compass sea and land to make one proselyte." They not only directed the temple service and all ritualistic observances, but through the synagogues, which served the purposes of schools as well as of churches, they were in charge of education. They were high in favor with the common people, who took their side against the agnostic sadducees. Josephus, who studied into the tenets of pharisees, sadducees and essenes before he chose his sect, joined the pharisees, whose faith and conduct he thus describes:

"Now, for the pharisees, they live meanly, and despise delicacies in diet, and they follow the rule of reason; what that prescribes for them, they do; and they think they ought earnestly to strive to put reason's dictates into practice. They also pay a respect to such as are in years. . . . They believe that souls have an immortal vigor in them, and that under the earth there will be rewards or punishments, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; and that the latter are to be detained in an everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again. On account of these doctrines they are able greatly to persuade the body of the people, and whatsoever the people do in divine worship, prayers and sacrifices, they do according to the pharisees' direction; insomuch that the cities give great attestation to the pharisees on account of their entirely virtuous conduct, both in the actions of their lives and also their public teachings."

We are on our guard, reading this, against the partiality of a pharisee for his own sect, but Josephus, who briefly describes the sadducees as denying God and immortality, observing religious ceremonial only so far as compelled by law, disputatious, and so unpopular as to be obliged, when made magistrates, to put on the guise of pharisees "because the multitude would not otherwise bear them," gives a glowing account of the essenes, those monastic mystics who lived in socialistic communities, "having all things in common, so that a rich man enjoys no more of his own wealth than he who hath nothing at all."

AGREEMENT WITH JESUS

The theology of the pharisees, as distinguished from that of the sadducees, was the theology taught by Christ. It was not to the creed of the pharisees that he took exception. The most direct doctrinal discussion that the gospels record is that held by him with the sadducees "touching the resurrection of the dead." Against these worldly sceptics Christ maintained the existence of a living God who is the God of ever-living souls, while striving to purify their clouded earthly conception of immortality. "In the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven." Christ and his strange forerunner, hermit of the desert, had no sympathy with the sadducees as such. Sadducees as well as pharisees had quailed before the stern greeting of the Baptist by the Jordan, wild figure in girdled raiment of woven camel's hair: "O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance." Sadducees as well as pharisees tempted Christ with questions, seeking to "ensnare him in his talk, asking that he "show them a sign from heaven," yet it was mainly against the pharisees, whose supernatural holdings were essentially his own, that the young reformer's anger burned. Sometimes he coupled them, as when he warned his disciples to "beware of the leaven of the pharisees and sadducees," by which those literal puzzle-heads were slow to understand that he "bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the teaching of the pharisees and sadducees." Far oftener Christ coupled the pharisees with the scribes, terms that were often identical, for the scribes, the lawyers of the day, casuistical interpreters of the code of Moses, would naturally belong, the more eminent of them, to the sect of pharisees.

WHEN HE SPEAKS OF SCRIBES AND PHARISEES

As two classes, Christ distinguishes them in function, the scribes as teachers of the holy law, the pharisees as its guardians and exemplars. Even as the scribes, substituting quiddities and sophistries for the effort to know and reveal the truth, had "taken away the key of knowledge," entering not in themselves and hindering those that would enter in, so the pharisees had "shut the kingdom of heaven against men, for ye enter not in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering in to enter." When the pharisees heard that this disconcerting street-preacher had silenced the sadducees on the question of the resurrection, it was "one of them, a lawyer," who renewed the effort to trip him in the apparently respectful query: "Master, which is the great commandment in the law?" We are almost grateful to this treacherous inquirer, for his asking brought forth for answer that crystal declaration of "pure religion and undefiled," the very quintessence of Christianity, though in truth the two commandments were both embedded, like jewels, in the matrix of the Mosaic law: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it—Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets."

"IF I HAD BEEN THERE"

Again I wonder, with an aching soul, whether, had I been in that multitude that stood "astonished at his doctrine," had I heard those divine words ring out, I would have sided with the Galilean vagabond or with the glowering pharisees.

If then, Christ held and taught those beliefs, in God and immortality, in moral responsibility, in the distinction between the virtuous and the vicious after death, which the pharisees themselves maintained, if his condemnation was not directed against their fundamental articles of faith, was it for their ritualism that he denounced them? Did he despise the careful decorum of the temple service, or the many rules mainly of hygienic intention, rules relating to bodily cleanliness, to wholesomeness of food, that governed Jewish life? No answer could be more emphatic than the answer that he gave standing on the mount of the beatitudes, blue iris and scarlet anemones brushing his sandalled feet as his gaze ran from the long range of Mount Carmel on the west to the harp-shaped Sea of Galilee below him on the east and rested on the eager faces of the multitude gathered about him in the grassy summit hollow of that green Sinai of the new commandments: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. For I say unto you, that except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven."

"THEY SAY AND DO NOT"

From childhood Jesus had loved the Temple, "my Father's house." Submitting to be baptized of John, he said: "It becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." The leper whom Christ's compassionate touch had healed was bidden "show thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing those things which Moses commanded." Both to the multitude and to his disciples Christ declared: "The scribes and the pharisees sit in Moses' seat: all therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do."—but take note, he added, that the pharisees do not do these things themselves. Christ bade his hearers follow the precepts of the pharisees, not their example. "Do not ye after their works, for they say and do not." It was not ritualism that Christ opposed, but the supremacy of ritualism over righteousness. "These ye ought to have done, and not to have left the other undone." The religion of the pharisees, "blind guides, who strain out the gnat and swallow the camel," fell short not only in its failure to embody itself in conduct, but especially in its substitution of letter for spirit. They were formalists, who "made the word of God of no effect by their traditions." Christ despised, as all generous young souls despise, the empty show, the pompous parade of piety, and hardly less than its pretense, he scorned its all-absorbing punctilio, its solemn attention to trifles. Such religion, his burning words avowed, made the gift greater than "the altar that sanctifieth the gift"; the gold of the temple more sacred than "the temple that sanctifieth the gold," more sacred even than "him that dwelleth therein."

Christ disliked the very look of the pharisees,—the broad phylacteries on their foreheads, their long robes and wide blue fringes. I am not sure that he did not enjoy shocking them, startling them out of their set proprieties. We are told of one occasion, when, dining with a pharisee, he refrained from conforming to the custom on which he knew that his host would lay exaggerated stress and sat down to meat without the customary ablutions. To the offended glance of the pharisees he replied that outer cleanliness was as nothing compared with inner purity, that self-sacrifice was a better cleanser than water. "Give alms of such things as ye have; and, behold, all things are clean unto you." In like fashion he challenged their levitical distinctions between clean and unclean food. "Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man; but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man." That saying so displeased the pharisees that the disciples hastened to tell Jesus, but he was not perturbed. "Let them alone; they be blind leaders of the blind." So blind, indeed, were the disciples themselves that the Master had minutely to explain to them that he was speaking not of physiological processes but of moral.

MISINTERPRETING CHRIST

How persistently the Christian church, on its journey down the ages, has misinterpreted its Lord! What has the wandering mystic of Syria to do with splendid basilicas, elaborate ceremonials, altar vestments stiff with gold embroidery, costly shrines and starving childhood? How hideous that the name of one so tender with tired, frightened women and with the clinging brown babies of Palestine, lover of the birds of the air and the foxes of the field, should have been invoked for fiery persecutions and furious polemics! And have we changed all that? Would Christ find no pharisees in the front pews of our churches today? Where would he look for his saints? Would his deep distrust of wealth appear again? Would he measure the growth of Christianity through these nineteen centuries by his old, beautiful, bewildering standards: "Resist not evil"; "Love your enemies"; "Give to him that asketh thee"; "Take no thought for the morrow"; "Be ye perfect?" would he turn away "sore amazed," "troubled in spirit" and "exceedingly sorrowful?" Yet I think I would still be patient with the long blindness of his church, remembering that his first chosen disciples, even the nearest and dearest of them, so little apprehended his spirit that, on his last journey to Jerusalem, James and John, impetuous Sons of Thunder, besought him to call down fire from heaven to consume a Samaritan village which had refused him shelter.

Was not Christ the Pitiful, the Christ who yearned over Jerusalem, perhaps a little hard upon the pharisees? Is it strange that they should have been scandalized to hear a dusty wayfarer arrogate to himself not only the cure of diseases but the forgiveness of sins? "Who," they reasoned in their hearts, "can forgive sins but one, even God?" His very townsfolk, though they wondered, as they listened to him in the synagogue, "at the words of grace which proceeded out of his mouth," were so enraged at his preposterous claims—"Is not this Joseph's son?" "Is not this the carpenter?"—that they set upon him to mob him,—to hurl him over the precipice on which Nazareth is built. What would I have thought of Christ, I wonder and still wonder, if I had heard those respectable people of Jerusalem talking of him,—dangerous demagogue stirring up the ignorant multitude, preacher of maddest profanities, unlettered leader of a group of ill-bred Jews, fishermen and the like, who "wash not their hands when they eat bread" and, journeying on the Sabbath through the cornfields, are so lawless—and so hungry—as "to pluck ears of corn and to eat, rubbing them in their hands."

A VAGRANT REVIVALIST

I can almost hear the talk buzzing about me now. "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" "Out of Galilee ariseth no prophet." "He eateth and drinketh with publicans and sinners." "A gluttonous man and a winebibber." One tells how this vagrant revivalist not only heals the sick upon the Sabbath but defends his action by impertinent comparison with a man's pulling his ox out of the ditch or, even worse, by the blasphemy that he is only following the example of God his Father, who works all the days of the week. A sly-faced rabbi boasts of the keenness with which he had watched this probably low-lived fellow, a guest at meat in his own house, to see if he knew that the intruding woman who "wet his feet with her tears, and wiped them with the hair of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment" was "a sinner." Another, from Jericho, tells how Jesus lodged there for a night with that notorious tax-collector and blackmailer Zacchaeus, while another whispers, with a certain relish, that this upstart had insulted "the chief priests and elders of the people" by the astounding utterance: "Verily I say unto you, that the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of heaven before you."

Almost I dare to hope that by this time I should have realized and resented an undertone of malice in the gossip,—to hope that I might have listened with sympathy, even though with incredulity, to the young Galilean, had I chanced upon him, weary and wayworn, in the midst of a critical group baiting him with questions. "Why do John's disciples and the disciples of the pharisees fast often and make supplications, but thy disciples fast not?" His answers, keen though gently urged, would silence but not convince them, for they did not mean to be convinced. That stubborn hostility hurt him, as "they held their peace," and he "looked round about on them with anger, being grieved at the hardening of their heart."

PHARISEES AND PHARISEES

Did Christ, in his wrath against the hypocrites, forget that many a pharisee was "righteous and devout, looking for the consolation of Israel"? Gamaliel, the teacher of Saul of Tarsus, himself "a pharisee, the son of a pharisee,"—was eminent in the sect, "a doctor of the law, had in honor among all the people," holding back the sanhedrim from killing Peter and the other apostles "lest haply ye be found even to be fighting against God." "A man of the pharisees," "a ruler of the Jews," "a master of Israel" was Nicodemus, who "came to Jesus by night" and marveled to be told that a man must be born again, born of the Spirit, to enter into the kingdom of God. To that seeking pharisee, timid though he was, Christ opened with all gentleness his deepest and divinest truths. Later on, Christ's enemies were in conclave and, in rebuke of the officers who, having failed to arrest the Prophet, had given for their excuse: "Never man spake like this man," they sharply asked, as if the very question were a crushing argument: "Have any of the rulers or of the pharisees believed on him?" Nicodemus dared not say that there was one—a chance for deathless glory lost—but did attempt a protest against hasty action, drawing down on himself the quick suspicion: "Art thou also of Galilee?" He had gained in courage when, after the crucifixion, he came with myrrh and aloes and helped Joseph of Arimathea wind the martyred body in fair linen and lay it in the garden tomb.

Upon the people Christ ever "had compassion," though to teach them spiritual wisdom was like teaching a stone to blossom. They wanted a giver of material blessings, a leader of revolt against the Roman rule, a king of the Jews. "Master, speak to my brother that he divide the inheritance with me." James and John pleaded for thrones on his right hand and on his left in the new kingdom. The Samaritan woman, tired with trudging to the well over rugged mountain paths, stared at him wistfully with her pagan eyes as he told her of the living water, and begged: "Sir, give me this water, that I thirst not, neither come all the way hither to draw." But the pharisees, students and teachers of religion, might have understood him if they would. "Are we also blind? Jesus said unto them, If ye were blind, ye would have no sin; but now we say, We see: your sin remaineth."

THE PHARISEE IN US

How may I rid myself of the pharisee in me? Not Nicodemus nor Gamaliel can reconcile me to that fellowship. In these sorely troubled times, with our own bewildered country hesitating at the parting of the ways, clear thinking, unclouded by prejudice, is the supreme necessity. New gospels, running all the way from pacifism to anarchy, are proclaimed in noisy and discordant chorus. Impartial hearing and a generous attitude are due to their apostles, yet not all these quarrelling apostles can be right. Christ bade his followers be on their guard. "For there shall arise false Christs and false prophets." Not all popular leaders are good shepherds; some are thieves and robbers, that come to steal and to kill and to destroy. It is no valid claim on our allegiance that a man has been persecuted. Has he been persecuted "for righteousness' sake"? In millions of American homes today discussion focuses, in much the old terms, on one or another suddenly arisen agitator. "Some said, He is a good man; others said, Not so, but he leadeth the multitudes astray." Not all false prophets are "ravening wolves." Some are sheep within as well as without. Our modern wilderness is full of reeds "shaken with the wind." In this jungle of new faiths, what are the tests whereby we may distinguish the Divine from the Satanic? "By their fruits ye shall know them." But until the fruits have ripened, what of the birds "lodged in the branches thereof"? Are the beatitudes singing there?

If I am to drive out from my heart this demon of a pharisee, I must keep my eyes forward, cherish my faith in human progress and reverence the vision of youth. Not that youth is always wise and gracious! Green apples may be hard and tart, but in them is the hope of harvest. The past, precious as its heroisms and achievements are, must not hamper the forward-pressing feet of Time. To filch a shining sentence from Vachel Lindsay's "Golden Book of Springfield," let us "remember that every yesterday is but a box of costly spikenard to be broken on the feet of holy tomorrow."

Irreparable was the loss of those old pharisees, "who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and set all others at nought," in that Christ was with them and they knew him not. The grace of God was upon him; the spirit of God was in him. "Unspotted from the world," he tested religion by its kernel of rectitude and mercy, not by its husk of form; he was the Spirit of Love made manifest, and of the pharisees he was rejected and despised. "Every sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men; but the blasphemy against the Spirit shall not be forgiven." Do we know Christ today? Is it he who comes "to cast fire on the earth"? Still he is "set for the falling and the rising of many in Israel; and for a sign which is spoken against; yea, and a sword shall pierce through thine own soul; that thoughts out of many hearts may be revealed."

They Know Not

WHO never has beheld the fields grow green
From behind prison bars,
Nor from a narrow cell at twilight seen
The dear forbidden stars
Glisten above the shadow of a wall
Where Death stands guard,
Nor ever heard the dreadful hammers fall
On a new scaffold-board—

Who never has from joy been shut away,
By the proud world forgot,
And waited, hour by hour, and day by day,
With human souls that rot
Under the lash of heartless tyranny
Where Life has nought to give
Save tears—he knows not what it means to die—
Nor what it means to live!

New Occasions—New Duties

By Ernest Bournier Allen

I AM a Christian optimist. I do not propose to survey present conditions in the spirit of Jeremiah or Cassandra. I do not believe God has forgotten or forsaken or feebly relinquished his world. I do not suppose he has voluntarily turned it over to the bolshevists, the capitalists, the scientists, the Republican party, the Mayor of Chicago, "the world's greatest newspaper," or the devil! I know too that the public, including the church, is weary of being put under the microscope, labelled Sodom or Gomorrah, and consigned to the shelves allotted to ruins in the world's museum of erstwhile great civilization! My friend, Dr. Douglas of Ann Arbor, says the "public is weary of being pounded." He says, "The word 'problem' is collar-galled from overwork." I think so, too, but despite its more than 400,000 words the latest dictionary does not offer much choice in describing the conditions for which the word "problem" stands. But my friend is eternally right when he says we need more of the magnanimous sympathy of him who regarded his public as sheep without a shepherd!

As an antidote to gloominess perhaps we need a reminder of the sermon John Wesley preached from the old text in Ecclesiastes: "Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? For thou dost not inquire wisely concerning this." We should scarcely expect an optimistic sermon from that text in a time which we have been told was one of the darkest in England's history. Every sixth house in London was a gin-house. In no other times could Hogarth the artist have found material for his picture, "Gin Lane," with its woeful sign, "Here you may get drunk for a penny—dead drunk for twopence. Straw provided." In Wesley's time the colliers of England were slaves. There were 223 offences for which a man could be hanged. A little girl of eight broke a window, stole two pennyworth of sweets and was sentenced to be hanged. Lecky tells us that every week a wagonload of children from six to eight years of age was sent from London workhouses to toil in the Lancashire cotton factories from five in the morning until eight at night. All the coal of the country was brought up on ladders by women, commonly stripped to the waist, with baskets of coal on their backs. God was a terror and not a Father. Another historian writes as follows:

As soon as the battle of Waterloo was fairly fought and Napoleon put away to St. Helena, professors, historians, political students and journalists all began with one accord to prophesy the downfall of Great Britain. Everything conspired to hasten this end. The parallel of Carthage—England has always been set up as a second Carthage—was freely exhibited. There was the dreadful dead weight of Ireland, with its incurable poverty and discontent; the approaching decay of trade; the enormous weight of the national debt; the factories were choked with excessive production; poverty stalked through the country; the towns were filled with ruined women; the streets were cumbered with drunken men; the children were growing up in ignorance and neglect. What could follow but ruin—swift and hopeless ruin?

If John Wesley could preach hopefully in those days, let us think of the progress the world has made since his time and believe that better days are not only with us but still ahead. H. G. Wells believes we are making progress and that the best is yet to be. Probably we are too close to our own problems to measure them sanely or fairly. If we point out many of the hardships today, we may shrug our shoulders like the French peasant and say: "C'est la guerre." John Spargo is right when he affirms that "the aftermath of the war is a spiritual cataclysm such as civilized mankind has never known before." Dr. Atkinson, who has just returned from four months' survey of conditions in Europe, says he hears repeatedly a new reason for present poverty, suffering and unrest: "C'est la paix." We must agree with Walt Whitman's challenging words:

Wert capable of war—its tugs and trials?
Be capable of peace—its trials;
For the tug and moral strain of nations
Come at last in peace—not war.

I.

The Christian statesman takes account of the reciprocal relation between religious interest and better conditions. The former profoundly affects the latter. Who has made a more scientific study of this relationship than Mr. Babson? Read this statement in his recent book on "Fundamentals of Prosperity:"

We study the trend of religious interest as closely as we do the conditions of the banks or the supply of and demand for commodities. Statistics of church membership form one of the best barometers of business conditions. We have these figures charted back for the past fifty years. Whenever this line of religious interest turns downward and reaches a low level, history shows that it is time to prepare for a reaction and depression in business conditions. Every great panic we have ever had has been foreshadowed by a general decline in observance of religious principles. On the other hand, when the line of religious interest begins to climb and the nation turns again to the simple mode of living laid down in the Bible, then it is time to make ready for a period of business prosperity.

Today the tide is turning. The trend is upward. There were twenty-five thousand people who joined the Protestant churches in the Chicago area at Easter time. Similar results are reported all over the country. Who ever knew a day when there was so much expected of the church, when so many leaders and organizations turned to it for help? Parish ministers may make their just declarations of independence and affirm that there are so many calls upon them to present special themes in the pulpit that the fundamental routine work is in danger of neglect. Yet it is a good sign of the times. The word of the church counts. People are eager to secure its approval and support. It would be a tragic failure on the part of the church if it failed to exert every ounce of its influence in the present circumstances. It is a time for the church to review the pages of history, survey widely and analyze constantly present conditions, and then speak out! What principles has the church to emphasize? What shall it say upon the three greatest problems of our day: the relation of the various races, the universal industrial unrest, and our international obligations?

II.

Race prejudice is as old as history. Each generation has been called to face and conquer it. The Jew hated the Gentile, the Greek looked down on the barbarian and the Roman disdained all the rest of the world. Your race and mine and every other have had their supercilious attitude toward other races. In the christian conception of human relationships there is no superman governing all others. Every race is recognized as having a contribution to make to the welfare of all others. There has been some ill-advised hatred aroused in recent days against the Jew. He has suffered his pogroms often since the dawn of history. In America he has faced less of physical danger, although more or less good-naturedly nicknamed and mistreated here. Our greatest challenge in America today is to eliminate race prejudice in the case of the black man. The time has come when we must think of the Negro as a national asset. He was distinctly so in the work of the war. He came north to meet a marked labor shortage. He now numbers one-seventh of the working forces of the United States. In 1910 eighty-seven out of every one hundred Negroes of ten years of age and over were wage earners. He speaks the English language. By and large he does it almost as well as the illiterate of the white race. He does not need to be Americanized. Slave or free he has always been a patriot. He came to this country one year before the Pilgrim fathers and mothers. Yet no genealogical society keeps a record of his ancestry, no historical society preserves the furniture he brought with him in his Mayflower! Whips and chains are not pleasant to look at! He has been long years a slave and is still having a hard time. He is more than an economic asset. He is a part of the very life of the republic.

Brave endeavors are being made to change America's treatment of the Negro for the better. Governor Hugh M. Dorsey of Georgia has rendered conspicuous and courageous service in calling attention to conditions in his own state. He lists one hundred and thirty-five examples of alleged mistreatment of Negroes in Georgia in the last two years. In only two of these cases is the "usual crime" against white women involved. He frankly declares that "if the conditions indicated by these charges should continue, both God and man would justly condemn Georgia more severely than man and God have condemned Belgium and Leopold for the Congo atrocities. But worse than that condemnation would be the destruction of our civilization by the continued toleration of such cruelties in Georgia." His remedies are four: (1) publicity; (2) "an organized campaign by the churches to place in every section of Georgia a sufficient number of Sunday schools and churches where, in their separate places of worship, the young and old of both races will learn from suitable teachers the gospel of justice, mercy and mutual forbearance for all"; (the italics are my own); (3) compulsory education for both races; (4) the organization of committees on race relations to confer together and act as may be wise concerning matters vital to the welfare of both races.

The other day Rev. John Haynes Holmes of New York spoke at a mass meeting of colored people in Chicago. He declared truly that "race prejudice is coming north of Mason and Dixon's line." Lynchings no longer occur in the south alone, no longer is the black man a southern problem only. The only solution he offered was political action. He declared that the British Empire sooner or later is going to fall into the hands of the laboring classes, and that it will be so here. Therefore, the twelve million Negroes of the United States must organize and vote together to get what they want. Today the Negro is discriminated against in the majority of hospitals. No matter how critically ill he may be, he cannot get the same treatment as that accorded the white man. He cannot purchase desirable seats in many theatres. He is shut out from the majority of hotels and there are famous Christian schools in the United States which do not advise him to make application for entrance! One of his leaders in a letter to President Harding says:

"We want the right to vote.

We want to travel without insult.

We want lynching and mob law quelled forever.

The first and fundamental and inescapable problem of American democracy is justice to the American Negro."

The time has come for our churches to speak out. Sixty-seven years ago there was only one church in Illinois which dared to risk public opinion by giving an invitation to Abraham Lincoln to speak against human slavery. The social interpretation of the gospel of Jesus Christ includes the application of his teaching not only to industry but to racial problems. There is no other solution than by impregnating the hearts of men with his spirit of brotherliness toward all other men in the world, particularly toward black men in America. Education alone will never solve the problem, particularly that type which assumes that the Negroes are forever to be "hewers of wood and drawers of water." Yet education will help and the churches have inspired and furnished more education for the black race than any other agency, whether governmental, personal or economic. We shall continue to have our riots in our Chicagos and in our Tulsas, until both races are dominated by the spirit of Christian brotherliness, patience and helpfulness.

III.

Fermenting processes continue in industry the world over. It has been so for the past one hundred years and probably will continue in the years to come. The present attitude of certain leaders of capital and labor is undoubtedly that of war and not brotherhood. There are encouraging individual and local exceptions, and the spirit of hatred and suspicion must be displaced by the determination to grant justice and to show friendliness. It is hatred and the war spirit which create the radical in the ranks of both capital and labor. One cantankerous employer, however just and great may be his provocation, can create a great many anarchists or rabid socialists. The result is the organization of groups like the Industrial Workers of the World who teach their children to learn by heart these words from the preamble of their national constitution:

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

War everywhere always proceeds on the hypothesis that it is fair to do anything you wish if only you win. Vincent St. John says in his history of the structure and methods of the I. W. W.:

As a revolutionary organization the Industrial Workers of the World aim to use any and all tactics that will get the results sought with the least expenditure of time and energy. The question of right and wrong does not concern us. No terms made with an employer are final.

We shall never get anywhere on the basis of such immoral principles. Questions of right and wrong do certainly concern labor and capital alike. In some way or other, we must replace the spirit and terminology of war with the spirit and terminology of Christian relationships. Until we can do that, there will be no peace, no permanent progress, no prosperity for all. The church has a final and authoritative word to speak to both belligerents at this point. It does not need to understand or pass upon all details in order to speak with authority.

IV.

The mind of America is not yet clearly expressed with reference to our international obligations. About opportunities for trade, we are more certain. Delegations and commissions of business men are going from all our great cities to open up or strengthen business relationships with the whole world. No clear word comes to us from our President, although he seems to be feeling after the right statement to fit the international situation. Our Ambassador to England in his first address says that we sent our young soldiers across the seas "solely to save the United States of America and most reluctantly and laggardly at that." Sharp expressions of disapproval of this statement have come from many quarters. It is said the Gaelic term, Sinn Fein, means "Ourselves Alone." This motto is the symbol under which the Irish war is being carried on. We are now told that American opinion desires us to adopt an analogous motto, "America Alone." It is said that we can have no possible interest in Europe except as concerns our own welfare.

Christian principles compel us to deny this total repudiation of our responsibility. We went into the war for something more than to save ourselves. Great principles of government and of justice were at stake which we could not do less than defend with our lives. We shall not repudiate the responsibility which the strong bear to the weak, which democratic nations like our own bear to those who are seeking democracy through self-determination and sacrifice. We believe that God made of one blood all the nations of the earth and that it is appointed to us to live together in peace and mutual helpfulness. We are under divine constraint to help our brothers everywhere so that they may secure for themselves the same liberty which we sought and now enjoy.

Black versus White

"I SHOULD not be surprised to awaken any morning and read in the morning paper that a thousand people, black and white, had been killed in a race riot somewhere in the United States," said one of the leading churchmen of Arkansas to the writer a few days ago. This man is one of the leaders in the south, an editor and one whom the governor calls into consultation often on racial matters. Recent trips in the south and interviews with men from every state—men who are without exception leaders in their local communities—expressed agreement with his ominous forecast. When asked if the condition of peril obtained in the south only or followed the Negro migration north, the universal reply was that, to their mind, it was true wherever whites and blacks met and dwelt together in large numbers. When we look back over race riots of recent years, we only need to recall that Chicago, East St. Louis and Springfield are in the north, that Cairo is in a northern state though at its southern extremity and that Tulsa is western and northern much more than southern. In other words, the Negro question is not any longer a southern question but a nation-wide racial question.

The Negro is migrating north in large numbers. He is leaving the country and small town in the south and moving into the cities in the north. The race riot is made more probable by the aggregation of large numbers of blacks in cities where there are large numbers of low class whites. The northerner quickly develops all the racial antipathy of his southern brother, without acquiring the personal affection for many colored folk that every high class southern man feels. The black man is kept out of the labor union in most cases, and is not accorded the opportunities to become a skilled worker as in the south, and he is crowded into close living quarters in an effort to save the real estate values which are of course depreciated by his coming into a community.

The Inflamed Situation Today

The Tulsa riot illustrated the inflamed situation that exists today. A Negro bootblack steps on the foot of a hysterical white elevator girl; she screams that he is attacking her; he runs in fear, is captured and jailed. The low class whites begin to talk lynch law; certain Negroes, disciples of the Du Bois theory that their only way to justice is through blood, go to the jail and offer their arms to protect him; the sheriff sends them away with a promise to call upon them if needed. Late in the evening a crowd of whites gather before the jail and the news spreads in the colored quarter that a lynching bee is preparing. A group of armed Negroes assemble and as the sheriff is persuading them to retire a white bystander attempts to disarm one of them, a shot is fired and the battle is on—ten whites and two colored men are killed. The blacks are driven back into "Little Africa," machine guns, inflammables and aeroplanes are brought into play and the end is that the Negro quarter is burned, scores of colored people are killed, many of them, the best of the race, are assassinated in cold blood, and the toll of whites is at least a score.

An analysis of the situation seems to show that the causes lie in a mass of blacks close up to a mass of low whites, a city government of the corrupt kind that is found in a boom town, a group of Negroes imbued with the idea that the carrying of firearms constitute the best means of self-protection and justice, and a group of whites who believe the 'niggers' should be shown their place." The plot is all laid. It needs only a hysterical girl, to say nothing of a real crime to furnish the match to start the powder train. It was not a crime, let alone the "usual crime" that caused the trouble; it was a critical situation that exists just beneath the surface wherever blacks and low-brow whites live together.

Negro Progress and Racial Friction

What can the outcome be where two races so antipathetic anthropologically as white and black live in intermingling relations? Can it be true that the so-called inferior, that is the less advanced race, must always live subservient to the more advanced? Is the way out through illiteracy and incompetence for the black and complete command of black destiny by the white, with a consequent never-ending recurrence of animal-like crime wherever the suppressed race exists? If these questions point the way to the only solution of the race question, then neither our theories of democracy nor the ideals of Christianity are available.

There are those who find abundant evidence that Negro education is the cause of the critical present situation. Education brings self-respect and a demand for justice; it breeds a race respect that rebels at the assumption of superiority and is irritated by its application. It involves also a strain of half-matured dignity and presumption of equality that does not comprehend itself and leads to ways that exasperate the other race with its settled assumptions of superiority.

The war has not only left all situations involving friction and prejudice in an inflamed condition, but it has given the Negro a stimulus that prompts much of the present trouble. He thinks he did his duty for democracy and should have his rights under democracy. The teachings of the Du Bois school that Negro rights will be won only by Negro blood, are given open ground for fructification. That there are many grounds for serious complaint cannot be disputed. The Jim Crow car and the Negro school are as a rule not so good as those for whites. There are many circumscribing lines drawn by custom and prejudice around the colored workman's opportunity. Even the labor unions deny him economic rights oftentimes, and he is increasingly used as a "scab" and strike-breaker. There is no doubt that half-educated and ill-advised local Negro leaders have led to secret arming of their fellows, and there is a resurgence of the temper of desperation accompanying Negro progress.

A Christian Solution

The low white says education ruins the Negro. The cultured white sees no other solution than that of education, and he sees that it must be an education of the low white as well as the Negro, for it is the low white the Negro arms against, just as it is Negro progress that enrages the low white. No Negro leader worthy of the name desires racial intermingling; he only asks social justice and equality before law and custom. In the measure that he is a worthy leader he counsels his race to be self-respecting and self-sufficient, eager only to be worthy of what he demands.

The Y. M. C. A. has initiated, in the south, a movement for race understanding and conciliation. While the Ku Klux Klan organizes whites, and the Negroes promote the National Association for the Advancement of the Colored People, there are 700 committees organized in southern counties and cities to cultivate racial understanding and to bring about justice for colored people. These committees are made up of a small group of white Christian leaders and a like number of Negro leaders. In most cases they meet together and talk frankly, the whites asking the colored members frankly to state their feelings, and they pledge themselves to take up cases of real dissatisfaction and injustice and see that right is done. The blacks are counselled against the rabid publications which are now being published in northern cities, and the whites against the conditions that incite a Negro sense of injustice. They have no dogmas and advocate no doctrinaire schemes. They seek only to work for a way out through frank understanding and the application of a genuinely Christian disposition to do the just and righteous thing.

This method commends itself as a beginning of the solution. Its end cannot be accomplished in a day, and it may take a millennium; but there is no hasty method. Some one has said God is never in a hurry—the devil seems always to be. Racial cleavages are deep and racial prejudices are easily aroused to bitterness. Whites and blacks will live together peacefully only under conditions of justice and good-will. Intricate and difficult relationships that are so full of irritation can only be adjusted through understanding and the deliberate use of magnanimous Christian methods. Only as we seek to promote them shall we evolve an era of peace and good-will.

THE EXPOSITOR'S Dictionary of Texts

Outlines, Expositions and Illustrations of Every Major Text and Dominant Passage of the Bible

Editors: Sir W. R. Nicoll, Lane T. Stoddart
James Moffatt, D.D.

Its Methods

Each exposition is a sermon compact and complete in itself. Each text suggests a theme by which it is headed; for instance, the exposition on "Like as a father pitieth his children," is entitled "THE GOD OF THE FRAIL"; to the exposition eight minds contribute.

Plan and Purpose

The Editors' purpose in planning THE EXPOSITORS DICTIONARY OF TEXTS was to compile a compendium of Scriptural insight and comment. They did so by glean- ing from the master theologians and preach- ers of the past half century the best exposi- tion on every major text and dominant pas- sage of the Bible.

Great Sermon Makers Approve It

"Judging by the effect on myself I should say that its value lies in this: That by its wealth of apt and unhackneyed illustrations it starts the mind on lines of thought reaching far beyond the text under review. I welcome it as a precious boon to preachers."—REV. PRINCIPAL DAVID SMITH, D.D.

"In suggestiveness, originality and practical useful- ness I should think the Dictionary stands alone. This book flashes light on one everywhere."—REV. G. H. MORRISON, M.A.

"Its comprehensiveness seems to me to be one of its chief merits. I look forward to much assistance from constant reference to its pages."—REV. CANON J. G. SIMPSON, M.A., D.D.

"All is sifted, modern, thought-provoking. The hard- worked pastor will find much gold here for his mint- ing days."—REV. W. L. WATKINSON, D.D.

"It is a prodigy of toil, and the result is admirable. It is a treasury of the best things chosen with unerring wisdom, arranged with skill, and made immediately available for the preacher's use. The ministry of souls is never out of sight. A more quickening and useful companion to the preacher of the Word does not exist."—REV. JOHN CLIFFORD, D.D.

June, 1921.

DR. CLIFFORD'S plea for a new evangelistic effort has soon borne fruit. As the result of his suggestion East Anglia is now the scene of a religious revival such as England has not witnessed for years. The Rev. A. Douglas Brown, Baptist minister at Balham, a South London suburb, and son of the well known preacher, the Rev. Archibald Brown, for many years pastor of the East London Tabernacle, tells us that when he read Dr. Clifford's words he got down on his knees and rededicated his whole life to God. He realized that if we are to get back to primitive methods of evangelism we must get back to the primal forces of the Christian religion. With the view of carrying out Dr. Clifford's idea, Mr. Brown went to conduct four days' services in Lowestoft, an east-coast seaside resort. The results were so encouraging that he went to other towns—Ipswich, Yarmouth, Colchester, etc.—spending most of the week in evangelism and preaching in his own church on Sundays. Within a few weeks over a thousand conversions were reported, while requests for prayer totalled nearly 300 on one day. At one church in Ipswich fifty-five young people confessed Christ. Many remarkable stories of changed lives are being told. Husbands have returned to their wives, wives to their husbands, those who had shown no previous concern for religion have had long-buried emotions stirred into life, and backsliders have returned to the faith. One happy result of the mission is to give a strong impetus to the movement for Christian unity. On one Sunday evening at Oulton, a Norfolk village, the Methodists and Congregationalists closed their places of worship and joined in a united service in the parish church. The vicar afterwards wrote to Mr. Brown's church at Balham: "I want to say that no one who has not had the hallowed joy of sharing in this movement, which is in no sense localized to one town, can have any idea of the miracles of grace that are being wrought. It has been village work—barns, churches, chapels and institutes crowded beyond their capacity, and souls saved by the score." Asked to explain the movement, Mr. Brown says: "If the organized churches would not put the social gospel first, kept their pulpits free for spiritual truth, got back to real prayer, a study of God's Word and a passion for souls, we should get the revival we are all longing for. If the churches attempt to cater for the pleasures of the world they are beaten before they get on their boots." Defining his distinctive message, Mr. Brown says: "It is not denominational, but a voluntary coming together of those who hold certain doctrines. These may be defined as ruin by the fall, redemption through the atoning blood of the regeneration, and transformation by the power of the Holy Ghost, and the personal and imminent return of our Lord Jesus Christ." Mr. Brown, whose methods are not those of the professional evangelist, but rather those of a minister desiring to build up the churches, is receiving urgent appeals from all parts of the country to conduct missions.

Miss Royden at the Guildhouse

The Fellowship services conducted for a year past by Miss Maude Royden and Dr. Percy Dearmer at Kensington Town Hall entered upon a new chapter on the first Sunday in June when they were transferred to Eccleston Guildhouse, previously Eccleston Square Congregational Church. Both afternoon and evening the congregations were even larger than hitherto, about 1,200 people being present at the evening service when Miss Royden discussed the future of the Fellowship. She has recovered her strength and voice, but her doctor insists on her taking two months' holiday, beginning the middle of July. Miss Royden explained that there was no desire to found a new church or form a new sect; rather she encouraged those who belonged to some organized religious body to retain their association with it, with the view of drawing the churches closer together and promoting more friendly feeling between Christian people of different denominations. It is our sacred duty, she urged, to do all in our power to bring about the reunion of the churches, and to avoid saying or thinking anything that will cause bitterness or add to the narrow intolerance that has characterized too many churches; to pledge ourselves to help to reunite the scattered people of Christ. Acknowledging the generosity of the Congregational authorities in placing the fine Eccleston premises at the disposal of the Guild, Miss Royden said that by such an act the cause of reunion would be more advanced than by many conferences and speeches. She appealed for, among other things, funds, gifts of (leadless glaze) crockery, and for volunteers—especially men—to come and scrub the lower hall. Incidentally, she announced frankly that she was going to discuss politics at the Sunday meetings. Religion, she said, is everywhere or nowhere, and if we won't have politics in religion we must not be surprised if there is no religion in politics. While they preferred the title "Guildhouse" to church, for their special purposes, they would never forget that it was the house of God, and, being the house of God, it should be the house of all God's children, touching their lives on all sides. The two ministers define their aims as (1) To supply a platform for perfectly free and frank discussion of all problems on which people's consciences are perplexed, whether "religious" or "secular"; (2) To see that even in our worship there shall be at least some part in which all who enter can share—if it is only in the moments of silence that end the prayers; (3) To ensure that all that can be made beautiful in our worship and in all our surroundings shall be so beautiful and sincere that all who come shall realize the presence of God, the first Author of beauty; (4) To make of ourselves a real "fellowship," and give to the often very lonely people of this great and crowded city a chance of finding and making friends; (5) To help each other to apply to the difficulties of our daily lives the principles we proclaim and discuss on Sundays. Many activities are being started, and there is every promise that the work will grow in extent and influence.

The Red Flag Vicar

We have at least two living instances of men who bred in royal or aristocratic circles have associated themselves with the extreme left wing of the social movement. Son of Sir Henry Ponsonby, Queen Victoria's private secretary, Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, was born in Buckingham Palace and is now a member of the Independent Labor Party; and the Rev. Conrad Le Despenser Roden Noel, grandson of the Earl of Gainsborough and son of a Groom of the Privy Chamber, was for a time secretary of the Church Socialist League and has lately figured in the public press in connection with certain proceedings at the old-world church of Thaxted, Essex, of which he is vicar. He recently hung the following manifesto, chalked on a large blackboard, at the entrance to the church:

"The rich man wars on the workers. It has always been so. The few live in comfort and folly by robbing the many. The rich killed Jesus, the poor man's Friend. The king, the empire, the rich and their toadies killed Christ. Our rulers, the empire, the rich and those who surround them kill him now. Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these (the Irish and the miners) ye have done it unto me." In the chancel the vicar hung the red flag and the Sinn Fein emblem. These flags were removed by students and presented to the Bishop of Chelmsford, who confessed himself embarrassed by the gifts. Some of Mr. Noel's views are apparently hereditary, for his father was the author of a poem beginning:

"What! Shall wealth kneel on the fainting forms Of millions whom scarce a raiment warms?"

Personal

Not only Wesleyan Methodists but a wider circle lament the death of Rev. S. F. Collier, for many years the devoted head of the Manchester and Salford Mission. His funeral was the occasion of one of the most impressive tributes the city has ever witnessed. For the service in the Central Hall 3,000 people attended, some having waited outside for four hours.—Canon Carnegie, rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster, is recovering from a severe operation.—Rev. A. A. David, Headmaster of Rugby, is the new Bishop of St. Edmundsbury and Ipswich.—Dr. Frederick Lynch of New York has been spending some weeks in England. He stayed with the Bishop of Peterborough for a week, and afterwards visited Dean Burroughs at Oxford. Returning to New York, in June, Dr. Lynch comes to England again in the autumn for a three months' tour in the Northern European countries on behalf of International Friendship through the Churches.—Dr. Stuart Holden sails for America July 16; he preaches at St. James's Church, Madison avenue, New York, and at Columbia University, and takes part in summer conferences at Lake Orion, Northfield, and Grove City.—Dr. Alexander Irvine arrives in America in mid-June for an extensive lecturing tour, concluding in October at Florida.—A recent American visitor to Chester, on entering Little St. John's Church, discovered hanging near the altar "Old Glory," presented by a parish in the United States, which had received a Union Jack from the Chester Church.—The death is announced in his eightieth year of Dr. T. Vincent Tymms, formerly Principal of Rawdon Baptist College.—Before he left England the Crown Prince of Japan was presented by the British and Foreign Bible Society with a copy of the Japanese Bible as a memento of his visit to this country.

BOOKS

SOCIAL ADAPTATION, by Lucius Moody Bristol, Ph.D. Professor Bristol's "Study of the development of the doctrine of adaptation as a theory of social progress" under above title was awarded the Wells Prize at Harvard, and Professor Carver writes the preface. It is a closely studied summation of sociological theory from the days of Comte to our own time. We have thus a transcript of the sociological interpretation of history, including biological history, and of the motives and methods of social progress, from the schools of materialistic evolution to those of social idealization and religion—from the passive adaptation of a mechanistic theory of life to an active control under free psychic factors. There is perhaps no better text for classes in sociological history and philosophy and all students of social theory will find it an invaluable compend and reference work. (Harvard Univ. Press.)

THE SOCIAL CASE OF HISTORY, by Ada Eliot Sheffield. This is a technical guide to social case work, but it should be in the hands of every intelligent parish worker, and of every minister who is undertaking to put a measure of science into his pastoral visitation. In so far as he has wisdom and skill, the minister is the case worker, par excellence. The prejudice on the part of sentimentalists against social case work is due to misapprehension. Case work, as opposed to work done with and for people treated in the mass, is by definition a recognition of the religious principle that the individual is of supreme importance and must be dealt with as a person. If ministers and church workers would take people as seriously as the author of this little book does and treat them with such detailed solicitude they would not only be more scientific but more religious. Consider this counsel, for example (p. 219)—"the case worker, therefore, will be increasingly an expert engaged in mobilizing remedial influences by establishing relationships in her client's life: relationships that energize salutary motives among all the related parties." There could certainly be no more spiritual task than this. (Sage Foundation, $1.00.)

CATASTROPHE AND SOCIAL CHANGE, by Samuel Henry Prince. This is a study of Halifax following the great explosion of 1917. It is a doctor's dissertation in sociology and therefore carries the approval of a scholarly faculty. The author studied the Halifax disaster and the subsequent history of the city with a view to discovering what relation there may be between catastrophe and fundamental social change. As a record of fact and an analysis of data the work is valuable. The author frankly recognizes that many such studies as that recorded here will be necessary before any conclusion on the precise theme of the book can be reached. Two views of history are here contrasted—the evolutionary and the catastrophic. The biblical student will recognize at once the distinction as identical with that between the prophetic and the apocalyptic conceptions which appear when the older prophets are compared with Daniel and the Revelation. The extreme of apocalypticism appears today in premillennialism, which people of scientific mind have long since abandoned. But it is well known that in the mental development of the individual there are not only gradual, continuous processes, but sudden mutations, so to speak, which condition some of the most important changes in human experience. Mr. Prince has challenged sociologists to recognize the possibility of similar efforts in social development. In the case of Halifax the disaster ushered in a remarkable era of progress. It is quite as possible, the author points out, as in the case of Galveston, for a great calamity to result in continued retrogression. (Longmans, $1.50.)

THE SCIENTIFIC SPIRIT AND SOCIAL WORK, by Arthur James Todd. When one recalls that psychology has only in recent years been admitted to the realm of the sciences; that sociology is only now assuming a definite status by the side of economics and biology; and that social psychology is still struggling for a place in the sun; then the need of a book like this is apparent. Professor Todd offers at once a philosophy of social betterment, an ethical basis for social effort, a critical evaluation of present tendencies and a chart of social progress. Notable from the spiritual point of view is the author's definition of the individual and of individual rights. He views the individual as a social product, socially conditioned; his "rights" are relative and derived. The chief significance of Christianity he finds not in the ethical individualism of Christian teaching but in the social structure which Christianity has reared to give expression to its fellowship. Professor Todd regards Jesus, as described in the gospels, as an ideal social case worker. Written just after the war, the book reflects an optimism as to the carry-over of wartime idealism which has not been realized. It is nevertheless stimulating as well as informing. It would be difficult to find one other volume that goes so far toward defining social work and constructing a rationale for it. The minister seeking to orient himself in the field of social betterment will find it very helpful. (Macmillan, $2.00).

FREEDOM OF SPEECH, by Zechariah Chafee, Jr. "Give your mind sea room," might be taken as a romantic subtitle for this very significant volume by Professor Chafee. It is dedicated to Judge Learned Hand, United States district judge (New York), "who during the turmoil of war courageously maintained the tradition of English-speaking freedom and gave it new clearness and strength for the wiser years to come." The author believes that risk is a prerequisite of democracy, and that bad ideas can only be met by better ones. Chafee is professor of law at Harvard. The book bears the stamp of a keen, courageous, thoroughgoing, judicial mind. Against the background of opposition among us to the war with Germany, Professor Chafee, with the hand of a master, measures the mistakes we have made and the perils of peacetime espionage acts; he deals first with this "concrete situation of opposition to war" and then works out interestingly his "fundamental principles" of wider and more permanent application. In chapter one, "Freedom of Speech in Wartime," the author is concerned with the original meaning of the First Amendment to our Federal Constitution and its interpretation during the late war. Congress and courts must realize that the principle by which speech is classified as lawful or unlawful involves both temporary public safety and the eternal search for truth. The line of free speech must be drawn close to the point where words will give rise to unlawful acts. The first Amendment "forbids the punishment of words merely for their injurious tendencies." The book's second chapter bears the title "Opposition to the War with Germany." Eighty pages are packed with facts of keen interest. "The Masses Publishing Co. vs. Patten," "The Human Machinery of the Espionage Acts," "Censorship and Exile" are some of the section titles of this convincing discussion. "Undoubtedly some utterances should be suppressed," writes the author, "but we have censored and punished speech which was very far from direct and dangerous interference with the conduct of the war." "The chief responsibility rests upon the officials of the department of justice and the postoffice, and upon the judges who upheld and approved this distortion of law." This chapter concludes with the words: "In our efforts to silence those who advocated peace without victory we prevented at the very start that vigorous threshing out of fundamentals which might today have saved us a victory without peace." All of chapter three is given to a very illuminating account of persons who get twenty years in the penitentiary for publishing two leaflets which according to Justice Holmes "the defendants had as much right to publish as the government has to publish the Constitution of the United States now vainly invoked by them." Legislation against sedition and anarchy is considered unnecessary. Ordinary criminal law will cover the situation. The red problem cannot be solved by "seeing red." "The issue before us today," as Professor Chafee sees it, "is whether in a period of prosperity and tremendous demand for labor" we shall throw overboard American laws and successful American methods for the methods which Czarist Russia employed up to the day of her overthrow. The remainder of the book is devoted to this issue. A valuable bibliography covering each chapter has been added. There is an index of reported cases under the espionage acts of 1917 and 1918, other appendices and a good general index. Lawyers will find this volume reliable; laymen will be held by its simple style and common sense: it will help to Americanize both. (Harcourt, $3.50.)

Living Down a Bad Reputation *

WHAT a scandal was afoot when the persecutor turned preacher! "Is not this he that in Jerusalem made havoc of them that called upon this name? Has he not come hither to take Christians bound to the chief priests? Is this not a clever ruse to find out indirectly who adheres to the new faith? What business has this new follower to preach anyway?" These and many similar questions stirred the little community of Christians at Damascus. Paul had a very bad reputation. It was not easy for the impetuous murderer to become accepted in the new group. Nor was this all: the Jews, angered that their chief agent had deserted them, sought his life. How dauntless the convert was may be seen when we observe him declaring even in the synagogue that Jesus was the Son of God.

There is only one way to overcome a bad reputation and that is to stay where you are and live it down. Recently I have had to deal with a man who faces this precise situation. Naturally his temptation was to get far away and begin life all over again. He was not aware how easily and quickly one is followed by his wrong deeds. Scarcely does one take up his residence at the end of the earth but someone blows in who advertises his whole former history. Then one seems utterly undone, for in the home town there were certain tried and true friends who would see you through. "What you need is not a change of place but a change of self."

If you will notice, the example of Paul provides the secret for overcoming a bad reputation: intense devotion to duty. Not only right after his conversion but throughout his entire life he hurled himself with every ounce of his energy into the new life. That soon made him a place among the Christians. Often has this happened. Let the black soil that produced thorns give its strength to wheat—and what a crop! A man who has been very bad usually has the elements to become very good, when once the evil is overcome by good. The richest spot on the farm is the old fence row where the blackberry bushes used to luxuriate; some of the best men are those who had sinned desperately and repented sincerely, David for instance.

Do you recall Paul's formula? "Be ye therefore steadfast, abounding in the work of the Lord." There is no other way to be steadfast. Only by abounding in the work of the Lord do we tie ourselves to the cause of righteousness. All of the evil begins when we let up on the work of the church. I remember a ministerial student who went all to pieces while in college. Afterward, when he had repented and started in the right direction again, he confided to me that his wrongs began when his prayers stopped. He said, "I can tell you the very hour when I began to go wrong—the morning after I had omitted to say my prayers at night. It was the first time in all my life that I had retired without saying my prayers." You see his steadfastness had been broken. While abounding in work evil will not enter. While reading the scriptures, while praying, while calling upon the sick, while seeking to win a new convert, while teaching a Sunday-school class, while raising missionary money, while worshiping in the congregation, while assisting in some reform, while caring for some little child or aged person, while watching at the bedside of someone who is ill—in a word, while abounding in the work of the Lord, one is proof against evil.

How easily Paul could have been discouraged and utterly dejected! If he had been less a man than he was this would have happened; between the murderous threats of the Jews on the one side and the suspicions of the Christians on the other he could easily have fallen away. But Paul "abounded" in the work of the Lord. He preached with a mighty power, he toiled day and night, he supported himself by tent-making, he sought for new converts with a zeal, even exceeding that with which he formerly persecuted them. Very soon he demonstrated his sincerity and was not only accepted but welcomed as a burning champion of the new cause. He had lived down his reputation.

If Not a United Church—What?

By Peter Ainslie

THE first of a series of Handbooks presenting the proposals of a United Christendom. Dr. Ainslie, who has been a pioneer in the cause of unity, has given much thought and labor to attempting a solution of the difficulties which bar the progress of the movement. This volume deals with the necessity, growth and outlook of Christian unity, to which is added a copious appendix. The argument adduced is that if unity be not attained, the church inevitably faces an era of gradually weakening power. Dr. Ainslie writes vigorously, yet without heat or partisanship, and presents a cogent and lucid plea for the cause that must be answered.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

The Statisticians and the Paraphraser

As between the magazine writers and the church statisticians there is a never-ceasing warfare over the question, Is the church dying? It is assumed by all magazine writers that the church is on its last legs while the statisticians are ever proving that the church was never so vigorous. This antithesis is probably due to the habit of looking at the church in different ways. There is little doubt that the country over church audiences are smaller than at any time in recent years. Yet church statistics show that while population has increased in America seventy per cent in the past thirty years, the church membership of the country has increased a hundred per cent. The southern Baptists doubled their missionary giving last year and increased their membership by 275,000. Denominations seem to have their ebbs and flows, but the general tendency in thirty years has been upward. The automobile and the movie show are given the credit for the greater laxity in the matter of church attendance.

Yale Divinity School Holds Commencement

This year the ninety-ninth class of the Yale Divinity School graduated thirty-eight members of the class, representing many different denominations. Nine members of the class have chosen the foreign field as the future field of labor. The remainder of the class will be pastors of churches in various parts of the country. Nearly every year some of the hundred students leave their mother denomination to become Congregationalists though there is no propaganda to this end at Yale.

Disciples' Church Will Hold Open House

The World Convention of Christian Endeavor, which will be held in New York the first week in July, will bring thousands of young people to the city. Central Church of the Disciples, located at 142 W. 81st St., will hold open house to Disciples' delegates during the convention. The church will be open every day and evening to offer friendly aid and hospitality to the visitors of like faith. On Sunday morning, July 10, a sunrise prayermeeting for Disciples will be held in this church. Breakfast will be served free to the various delegates. Disciples delegates are invited to attend this church for the morning service.

Baptist Report on Educational Institutions

The Northern Baptist Convention received but did not adopt the report of their special committee which dealt with the subject of Baptist colleges and seminaries. The tone of this document may be judged in part by the following excerpt from the report: "More potent in creating divisions among us than anything that has been said in the classroom or in print so far has come under our notice is the spirit that has been exhibited by some of the teachers in our schools. Some men create an atmosphere that makes it impossible to trust them. Some use language which makes it impossible to respect them. No one has as yet attained such eminence in scholarship as to warrant his feeling that he is omniscient and so may sneer at those who differ with him as ignorant. And on the other hand no one is as yet so evidently the sole repository of divine revelation as to warrant his denouncing as infidels those who disagree with him. Some of the disciples of old thought that the right method of procedure with those who did not follow Christ as they did, was to call down fire from heaven to consume them. But that was not the method of Jesus Christ. He rebuked such disciples and told them that they did not know what manner of spirit they were of. And it still is true that only they who have the spirit of Christ are his. Lack of the spirit of Christ in dealing with those who differ with us, though they really have gone aside from the faith, is the worst of heresies. No doubt a teacher in any one of our schools who rejects the age long Baptist teaching that the Scriptures are our supreme rule of thought and life, or faith and conduct, ought to take himself off, and if he does not go of his own accord, we ought to use persuasive methods to assist him in going, yet it ought to be possible to do that without either side making a display of itself. Certainly crimination and recrimination are not appropriate in men all of whom profess devotion to Jesus Christ, and declare themselves loyal to his teaching." Rev. F. S. Sweete in his minority report said: "The rich Christian character of our teachers as a whole, their sacrificial devotion to the cause of Christian education, the many disciplined leaders they return to our churches year by year developed from the immature youth entrusted to their guidance—these are some of the good fruits, not from an evil tree but grown only on the good tree of a vital Christian faith. The majority report does not seem to me to affirm this vital loyalty to Christ on the part of our Baptist teachers in secondary schools, colleges and seminaries as clearly as the findings of the year demand."

Dr. Burton Will Go to China

Ernest DeWitt Burton, director of the University Libraries, and head of the department of New Testament and Early Christian Literature at the University of Chicago, has been granted a leave of absence for six months to act as chairman of a commission on Christian education in China. The commission, which is sent by the foreign missions conference of North America, is to make a thorough study of Christian education as it has been developed in China, and also make suggestions as to future educational policies. Professor Burton is already familiar with educational conditions in China, having been a member of the Oriental Educational Investigation Commission sent out several years ago by the University of Chicago. The commission will include five persons from the United States and one from England, and on the arrival of these six in China, six more will be added from that country. Of the latter six, three will be Chinese, and three American residents of that country. The enterprise is expected to

Dr. Faunce on Col. Harvey

THE speech of Col. Harvey in England in which he rejected the notion of American idealistic motives as a ground for our entering the world war has aroused a storm of protest on the part of American churchmen. Dr. Faunce in his baccalaureate address at Brown University recently said:

"We imagined that we were to have a treaty at Versailles that would redress all public wrongs, righteously adjust all boundaries, banish secrecy from diplomacy and unite all peoples in perpetual concord. And because we did not get that in three months we have been plunged into despair, and some men in high public places have denied that our dead soldiers ever had any world vision or any unselfish devotion.

"In view of one such utterance beyond the sea, it has been suggested that the inscription on our memorial gateway at Brown should be changed; that it should no longer be read: 'They gave their lives that freedom may endure,' but rather: 'They gave their lives because they were afraid not to fight.'

"All those 43, whose names are on that gateway, I knew personally. And while we recognize that no human being acts from one motive alone, I know those men went forth, not to save their skins, but to save America—and, more than that, to save the principle on which America is founded, to save liberty in both America and Europe from the brute force of autocracy and tyranny.

"If we cannot be noble today, heaven save us from denying that we were noble yesterday!

"At this particular crisis in human history, we must not turn back from democracy because of its abuses. We see how easily the mob becomes excited and we begin to ask if counting heads instead of weighing them is the final test of truth. Every possible argument may be brought against democracy except one—that something else has been proved to work better. So we must not turn back from liberty. The old Liberty bell today is cracked, and liberty itself has not so sweet a sound as once, because we have seen its distortions and perversions. The nations today are undergoing the painful process of disillusion."

have significance not only for the development of Christian institutions in China, but for the cultivation of friendly relations between the United States and oriental nations. The commission sails from Vancouver, August 18, and will be gone from the United States about six months.

Religious Education Spreads to Distant Parts

The religious education idea has come to be world-wide in its scope. In British Columbia there is a Religious Education Convention made up of representatives of different denominational groups. The convention this year elected Rev. W. R. Ely, pastor of Woodlawn Drive Christian church of Vancouver as president of the convention. Rev. H. Ireland of New Westminster was made secretary of the organization. The convention was held in an Episcopal church and in this movement Episcopal and non-Episcopal churchmen have mingled in the greatest cordiality in the study of the proper methods of educating a child in the knowledge of God and of the right way of life.

Hold a Banquet for the Student Group

First Christian Church of Springfield, Ill., carries out a fine idea in holding an annual banquet in honor of the student group of the church. This year there are twenty-seven young people taking educational courses beyond the high school. It is significant that from this strong old Disciples church only two of the twenty-seven young people attend their denominational colleges. Eight of the group are at the state university, while most of the remainder are at schools of other denominations. There are fifty-eight in the high school group, six of whom are in the graduating class of this year. At the banquet five short addresses were given by leading citizens of Springfield and the pastor, Rev. W. F. Rothenburger, spoke on "Educational Barriers Burned Away."

Dr. Merrill Speaks on Pulpit Liberty

If the manufacturers of Pittsburgh had set out to influence the ministers of the country to preach radical sermons on social topics, they could not have taken a better way than their recent efforts to boycott the Y. W. C. A. and the Federal Council. A number of ministers have spoken in every city. Dr. Fosdick says "the pulpit is not for sale." Dr. William Pierson Merrill, pastor of Brick Presbyterian church of New York, in an address recently delivered before the World Alliance for International Friendship said: "The church cannot afford to take orders from any outside group or class, or from any one except its divine head. To allow any men to mark off its field, or limit its scope, or declare its function, is intolerable. The church must fully and with all cheerfulness grant the right of any man or men to object to its words and acts, to criticize them with utmost freedom, to give or withhold support, to join the church or leave it, to attack or defend, as one may deem best. The church must be prepared to take the consequences, financial or other, of maintaining its independence, and asserting its proper concern in the affairs of the world. But for the church to alter by a hair's breadth its policies, or to restrict in the least its sense of the vital function in social matters because of the power of the purse applied, is spiritual treason."

Eureka College Gets a Conditional Gift

Eureka College has been granted a conditional gift of $135,000 from the General Education Board. The condition is that $265,000 additional endowment be raised. Like all colleges with inadequate endowment, Eureka college has been running a substantial deficit since the war, although its efficient administration has been able to keep its deficit amazingly low. The General Education Board has granted $7,000 a year for two years to help out on the deficit while the campaign endowment is being raised. This substantial aid from the General Education Board has other than financial value, for it indicates that in the judgment of that board Eureka College is doing work of a standard that should be encouraged.

English Boy Evangelist Has Successful Season Here

Styles change in popular evangelism as in everything else. One of the interesting figures among the popular evangelists working in the United States the past year was Charles Forbes Taylor, the English "boy evangelist." He has conducted revival services in Detroit, Brooklyn, Little Rock, Fort Worth, Texarkana, Waco, Abilene and El Paso. In each city large crowds have waited upon his ministry and in most of these cities tabernacles were built which were not large enough to accommodate the crowds. Mr. Taylor will spend the summer in London but will return to this country in the fall. The advance representative of Mr. Taylor is Rev. Charles L. Evarts, former advance representative of the Chapman-Alexander party.

State University Presidents Speak Out

The old-time talk of certain kinds of pious people about "godless state universities" is now passe in most communities, because every community has church leaders who were educated in these institutions, and who know the facts. Recently the Council of Church Boards of Education secured statements from the presidents of some of the leading state university presidents of the country. These statements are all that can be desired in the recognition of the principle that religion is a necessary part of the well-rounded life. Particularly noteworthy is the statement of President David Kinley of the University of Illinois, who says: "There is no complete education without religion. Since education, up to a certain point, at any rate,

Chicago Y. M. C. A. Attitude

THE ranks of the Christian Associations, like the ranks of the evangelical churches, are sadly divided over the attitude of religious organizations to industrial problems. Shall the church be satisfied with generalized statements without "teeth," or shall there be a definite espousal of certain methods, such for instance as arbitration? L. T. Crossman is executive secretary of the South Chicago department of the Chicago Young Men's Christian Association. He voices a point of view that is fairly characteristic of the Chicago Association group who may justly be regarded as conservatives on the industrial question. He says in a recent issue of the official bulletin of the Chicago Association:

"The National Association of Industrial Engineers, formed about a year ago, embodied the Golden Rule in its policy, and has something like a score of special committees working on hours and wages, labor and labor turnover, employees' representation and many other problems of employment. Many others could be mentioned, not overlooking the trade unions, which in the spirit of fairness are endeavoring to arrive at a just basis of working relationships. These in addition to the hundred or more industries now in the United States which have employees' representation and are determining working standards and policies by the conference method. In view of the above, it would be folly for the Association Movement to attempt to enter this field, or by a series of resolutions declare what it believes ought to be the standards of work and working relationships. The great and fundamental service of the Association is to continue what it has and is already doing, namely, speak forth a clear note as to brotherhood and service, in the spirit of love for all men, and to increasingly exert itself for the creation of that type of character among all parties of industry which will bring about the practice of the Golden Rule in the great economic realm."

General Secretary L. Wilbur Messer says: "The Young Men's Christian Association, in the judgment of the writer, should not be entangled in the discussions which are being carried on at this time by various church, religious and social agencies. Such organizations, doubtless in good faith, are seeking to establish ideals for the social and industrial betterment of industrial workers. Let these organizations pursue their studies and reach their deliverances, assuming the entire responsibility for their utterances and policies. The Associations have not become a party to creedal, and denominational or political rivalries, although repeated effort has been made to secure the Association endorsement and influence in support of one side or the other in such disputes. Ultra conservative or radical religious leaders, unattached religious or social agitators, or partisan political speakers have not and should not be welcome on Association platforms."

is primarily the development of character, and since character is after all the training in moral standards, and since training in moral standards depends upon religious beliefs, it follows that religious training is a necessary part of a complete education. Since the state university cannot under the constitution and laws, provide the religious training necessary to a complete and well rounded education, it must be provided in some other way."

Noted Pauline Scholar Will Visit America

Sir William Ramsay is everywhere known in the ranks of new testament students as a foremost authority upon the life of labors of St. Paul. He has done original research work in the lands visited by St. Paul and made many discoveries which confirm the credibility of the new testament records. Because of an interruption in his research work due to political conditions, he will visit the United States this coming year and lecture in many colleges and universities. Thus thousands of Americans who have read his books will have opportunity to look into his face.

Cincinnati Disciples Have a City Secretary

In one after another of the larger cities the Disciples denomination is being organized to provide missionary supervision. The latest city to come into this class is one of the oldest Disciple centers in the country, Cincinnati. The Cincinnati Christian Missionary Society recently called to their city Rev. W. D. Ward, who has in recent years been a traveling secretary of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society. Mr. Ward will settle with the young Oakley church and bring it up to self-support, and then move on to another mission center. This policy has been pursued in Kansas City, the strongest city in the country for Disciples. Mr. Ward is a graduate of Hiram College and of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago. He has held pastorates at Evanston, Ill., Rockford, Ill., Newark, O., New Philadelphia, O., and other cities.

Dr. Kelman Visits Orient Again

Dr. John Kelman, pastor of Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church of New York, will visit the orient again this summer. He has a daughter in the missionary service in Japan. Mrs. Kelman will not accompany her husband this summer, but will spend her vacation season in Scotland. The supply ministers for Fifth Avenue church during Dr. Kelman's absence include: Bishop Luther B. Wilson, Dr. John Timothy Stone, Dean Charles R. Brown and Dr. Robert E. Speer.

Lord's Day Alliance Thrives on Opposition

A year ago the Lord's Day Alliance was hardly known even in evangelical circles. Today it is known throughout the nation, even though it has been represented as the agency through which "blue laws" were to be fastened upon us all. The organization has in reality held to a moderate position with regard to the keeping of Sunday, and a recent pronouncement indicates the spirit of the Alliance. It is hoped to fill Sundays with good work, after the day has been made an idler's day by the false policy of many evangelical groups. It is only by the substitution of activities in behalf of the kingdom of God that wrong activities can be driven out.

Three Million People Carry a New Testament

Some years ago Mrs. Charles Alexander, wife of the late well known singing evangelist, launched a movement to get people to carry pocket New Testaments. The idea has spread widely over the nation. Three million people are now under pledge to carry the New Testament and to read a chapter from it daily. In one town in Iowa recently six thousand new members joined the New Testament League.

Chicago Church Federation Organizes Hundreds of Churches

Protestant forces in Chicago are coordinating their work in a closer way continually through the efforts of the Chicago Church Federation Council. Fourteen denominations with six hundred constituent churches find fellowship through this organization. The activities of the council are represented by twelve departments: Advisory, Church and Industry, Comity, Evangelism, Political Action, Public Institutions, Publicity, Religious Education and Community Federations, Social and Civic Relations, State Constitution, and World Friendship. Twenty-two public institutions have Protestant ministers through the work of the federation.

Federal Council Week at Chautauqua

THE final week of the season of lectures and studies at Old Chautauqua in New York state is usually devoted to special conferences for ministers and other Christian workers. This year, in addition to other attractive features, the final week, beginning Sunday, August 21, is to be devoted to some special phases of Christian cooperation under the general auspices of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. A preliminary conference will be held on Sunday afternoon, conducted by Dr. Willett of the Chicago office of the council.

Monday, August 22, will be Christian Education Day, and addresses will be made by Prof. B. S. Winchester, secretary of the Federal Council's Commission on Christian Education, and by Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, general secretary of the Federal Council, who will speak on "The Story of the Federal Council" and "Ideals and Methods of the Federal Council."

Tuesday, August 23, will be Church Federation Day. Dr. Roy B. Guild, secretary of the Commission on Church Councils, will speak on "Community Conquest by Cooperating Churches," and will conduct a conference on federation problems. It is expected that a number of the secretaries of local federations will be present and participate in the program.

Wednesday, August 24, will be devoted to Cooperative Evangelism, and Dr. C. L. Goodell, secretary of the Federal Council's Commission on Evangelism, will speak on "The Evangel of Today" and "Personal Evangelism."

Thursday, August 25, the general theme will be Social Christianity, and the address will be given by Rev. F. Ernest Johnson, research secretary of the Federal Council's Commission on Social Service. He will speak on such themes as "What Is Social Christianity?" and "How the Research Department Operates."

Friday, August 26, will be devoted to International Christian Cooperation. Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, secretary of the Federal Council's Commission on the Relations with the Orient, will speak on "Japan, a Challenge or a Menace," and "The United States and Her Neighbors."

The addresses and conferences are particularly adapted to the needs of ministers and lay members of the churches who are studying the problems of the time, especially in their cooperative aspect. This, together with the platform lectures of the week, will make an especially attractive program for those who can visit Chautauqua at that time.

A Summer University Course at Small Expense

THOUSANDS of ministers—as well as laymen—are endeavoring to keep abreast of these rapidly moving times by spending half the summer at some of the universities. This is a wise plan. But some cannot do this. University courses are expensive and six weeks is a long period to be away from one's work. Why not pursue a home study course? Going to the university, you would have perhaps three or four courses of lectures and studies. This would cost you perhaps $200. If you must stay at home, you can feast upon a dozen courses from such men as Dr. John H. Hutton and Dean Inge of England, and Prof. Albert Parker Fitch and Bishop McConnell of America. And the cost to you will be only about $20.00. In other words, buy the right books, read and study.

Here is a selection of great books for your consideration:

Dr. Lyman Abbott of The Outlook
says of Lloyd C. Douglas'

Wanted—A Congregation

"Mr. Douglas's volume is not a story with a moral, but a moral in a story. A minister who is preaching to a small and eminently respectable congregation in a large church is invited to a birthday dinner with a college classmate; meets there three successful men—a manufacturer, a doctor, and an editor; is inspired with a new spirit of energy, enterprise and initiative, and goes home to put into his business the spirit which they put into theirs and to employ much the same sort of methods. It is a good book for ministers to read, because a spirit of energy, enterprise, and initiative is a good spirit for ministers to acquire. But to imitate the Rev. Dr. Preston Blue's methods and expect from the methods the Rev. Preston Blue's success would be a great mistake. Mere imitation rarely achieves a great success, and never in any form of industry which requires spiritual power. And methods which are employed by one minister in one community with good results may, when employed by a minister of a different temperament and in a different community, be fatal to results. I commend the book for inspiration but not for imitation."

Princess Salome

A Tale of the Days of Camel-Bells

By DR. BURRIS JENKINS

As a writer of fiction, Dr. Burris Jenkins, of Kansas City, is as yet scarcely known, but as a minister of the Disciples of Christ, as a publisher, as author of "THE PROTESTANT," and as a man of many and varied activities, his name is familiar to thousands. To his many achievements he has now added "PRINCESS SALOME," a powerful novel of the days of Christ. A masterpiece of descriptive fiction and a message of tremendous significance that seems almost inspired in its broad and human conception of Christianity. It searches the very inner recesses of the soul and turns the eye of the reader inward upon himself. George A. Miller, President of the International Convention of Disciples of Christ, says of "PRINCESS SALOME": "It will produce faith and love in many cold and indifferent hearts and lives."

This is but one of many messages of praise received from various sources. $2.00 plus 12c postage.

The Missionary Outlook in the Light of the War

By the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook

THIS COMMITTEE included such men of vision as Robert E. Speer and William Adams Brown. The increased significance and urgency of the missionary enterprise, embodying as it does our noblest ideals in the World War; the changed outlook in every mission field; the new light thrown on missionary policies and principles—the discussion of these subjects by outstanding experts gives to the volume authority and inspiring power.

Charles Clayton Morrison,

Editor The Christian Century, says:

"In this great book I see Christian missions as a science, the science of the kingdom of God. Nothing human is foreign to it. The present mighty currents of internationalism flow directly into its categories. The vast enterprises upon which our political statesmen have embarked in these post-war days cannot be carried out by any mere secular power. Until the Christian religion accepts these world undertakings as its own undertaking and pours its energy and grace into them they cannot be consummated. This is the thesis of the book I hold in my hand. It will feed and broaden and vitalize the minds of churchmen. I do not see how a minister, especially, or a Christian leader in any capacity can get on without the inspiration of such a vision as this book is sure to give to everyone who reads it."

By Kirby Page

The Sword or The Cross?

From "The Nation" (New York)

"In his searching little volume, "The Sword or the Cross," Mr. Page presents with force and truth the extreme position against war which must in our opinion be taken by everybody who would be a sincere and loyal follower of the teachings of Jesus. Undoubtedly this book would not have been allowed to circulate during the war, which is but another proof of the fact that all wars constitute in themselves a denial of Jesus and everything that he stood for. Mr. Page does not hesitate to accept the logical consequences of his position. Thus he declares in answer to the question whether war is justifiable as a means of preserving political liberty that 'the following of Jesus Christ is infinitely more important than the maintenance of political liberty.' Had the Bolsheviks but had the vision to see this at Brest-Litovsk, had they but refused to fight and also to sign the shameless German demands, and thus to resist the German evil, their whole status in the world, and probably their future, would be entirely different. We wish for Mr. Page's little volume what is, alas! an impossible wish, that it be placed in the hands of every school child in this allegedly Christian nation. It would do a world of good and be a powerful weapon in the fight which is now on to save humanity from being exterminated by the very science of warfare which it has lately devised, it being today a problem whether war shall go or civilization perish. Not the least of Mr. Page's service is his final disposition of those phrases of Jesus which, together with the episode of the money-changers in the temple, are so blasphemously cited by the believers in mass-murder to make it appear that Jesus condoned what would have made all his teachings merely ghastly hypocrisy."

Conservative Administration Makes Liberal Moves

AT the very time that the radical press was printing criticisms of President Harding for his failures, the newspapers announce the achievement of several things of distinctly liberal import by the administration. The state of war with Germany has been discontinued by congressional action, and with the approval of the President. The foolish deadlock inherited from a previous administration is ended. The invitation to the great powers to sit in the early autumn on the question of disarmament is a great liberal achievement. The President has gone farther than any thought he would dare to go. He has opened up the whole question of armaments, and not simply that of navies. Meanwhile the negotiations with Mexico are proceeding satisfactorily. If the state department has made some conditions that are humiliating to Mexico the way for a peaceful understanding between the two countries is still open. The bugaboo of war with Japan is ended, of course, if the disarmament congress is able to define a policy for the East as President Harding suggests. At this congress China will be represented as an independent power, and there is a strong probability of justice being done. Probably the act requiring the most political courage on the part of the President is his announced opposition to the bonus for able-bodied soldiers. Here was an opportunity to have purchased the political allegiance of the coming generation of young men. That the greater good of the nation has prevailed over counsels of political opportunism is a matter for congratulation. In political theory the President may be conservative, but it is better to have a conservative President who does a lot of liberal things than to have a liberal President who does a lot of conservative things. While these important issues are pending the President of the United States should have the support of the religious forces of the nation in behalf of the peaceful settlement of international questions.

Some Suggested Cabinet Changes

THERE are features of the present organization of the President's cabinet that might well be changed. New interests are demanding recognition. Only recently commerce and labor have insisted on a place at the President's council table. Today education is asking for similar recognition, and public sentiment is demanding that the appeal be heard. Suggestions have recently been made that there should be a department having administrative charge of all the American possessions inhabited by the non-assimilable races, and of relations with dependent peoples. If such a department is created, it is suggested that it include supervision of the Philippines, Cuba, Hawaii, Porto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands, the Panama Canal Zone, the republic of Panama, and all other overseas dependent or semi-dependent regions. It would not be surprising if a department of publicity were projected, to have oversight of matters of public information and to provide means of publicity for the nation at large. There can be little doubt that there should be some reliable national publication, weekly or monthly in character, that should provide information of a non-partisan and authoritative sort for all who care to secure it. The Congressional Record publishes the proceedings of congress, but its contents are neither non-partisan nor authoritative, consisting, as they do, of speeches made in the house or senate. There is a place for a national publication of a strictly reliable character that shall provide the public with desirable information on all important matters in which the government has means of information inaccessible to the ordinary newspaper. Most of all, there is need that the army and navy departments be consolidated. It is an anachronism that in a government as far advanced in civilization as our own, two of the dozen portfolios should be devoted to destructive interests. The whole spirit of the times is toward the reduction of armaments rather than governmental promotion of military and naval interests. Such changes as these would interpret the ideals of the nation far more adequately than does the present structure of the President's cabinet.

Religious Democracies That Are Not Democratic

THOSE denominations that talk about democracy in this country seem to have the most difficulty in realizing their democratic ideals. Congregationalists, Disciples, and Baptists have national conventions to which the delegate pays his own expenses. For this reason these meetings are always more or less sectional in character. The Baptists have secured the facts about their recent convention in Des Moines. Of the 10,066 churches, not over 1,500 were represented, and perhaps as few as 750, according to the Baptist. Of the 2,189 delegates, 1,009 came from the middle west states of Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota and Illinois. At every convention there is talk of sectional influence upon the vote of the convention. Disciples conventions can be located by the vote of a committee independent of convention action. The officials have it in their power to choose just what sectional influence they wish to bring to bear in any given year. The Presbyterians have a much smaller national body. Some think it is less democratic than the mass conventions of the Disciples and Baptists, but it is really more so. Every Presbyterian is taxed a few cents each year to pay the expenses of the men who sit in General Assembly to consider denominational business. By reason of this system no commissioner is detained at home for any economic reason. The church draws a proportionate representation from all sections, and it matters little where General Assembly meets. It is always fairly representative of the opinion of the rank and file of the denomination. From which it may be deduced that machinery does not always imply tyranny nor does the lack of machinery always connote democracy. Those denominations that have in the past years allowed themselves to be governed by the noise and fury of the galleries at national convention have no kind of democracy of which one may boast.

Sermons For Sale At Bargain Prices

FOUR dollars down and eight dollars a month will secure fifty good sermons a year, declares the circular of one of our sermon factories. It is cheaper to buy an outfit of sermons than to buy a power washing machine. This is called the movement for better sermons. What an inestimable aid this would have been for Isaiah! Had he lived in this age of modern conveniences, he might have had the reputation of a great orator without taking any time away from golf. Sermons like these would have saved Micah from making some of those extreme utterances about the abuse of wealth. Jeremiah need never have been so unpopular if he had only known where to secure some of these nice little sermons just thirty minutes long, newly written and typed on one side of the paper. Of course where a preacher moves once a year he need have only one set. The average preacher would need only two sets which he could work off on each town where he went. With such a convenience Martin Luther might have given more time to family chores. John Wesley itinerated so much that he might have gotten on for a considerable time with one of the trial sermons which are furnished for the bargain price of two dollars. The sermon factory is the legitimate product of the short course education for the preacher. The man with a high school education or less who gives one year to his preparation to preach to intelligent people is not able to interest anybody with his crude cerebrations. His only hope of continuance is to be a pastoral caller, a booster and the reader of somebody else's sermons which he imagines a dotting audience will think are his very own. The result is a minister with a blunt conscience, and a congregation that hears a generalized message fitted to any village in the United States, but lacking any local "punch" for Jonesville. As these sermon factories multiply, there is need of some plain speech about them. It is a shame to a religious journal to advertise them, and a scandal to the church to keep ministers who ever patronize them.

Wet Parade Is a "Dud"

THE wets had been planning for weeks to throw a bomb into the camp of the drys. A parade was promoted which was promised to be a monster protest of hundreds of thousands of people. Signatures were secured from over two hundred thousand persons promising to march in the parade. The New York World, which has devoted its columns to the furtherance of the cause of the nullification of the prohibition amendment, admits that the Fourth of July wet parade was a farce. The bomb placed under the eighteenth amendment is a "dud." The Anti-Saloon League employed an auditing firm to count the people in the parade. The figures of this firm were given to the press, and were honestly transmitted to the public. Less than fifteen thousand people marched. About eighty per cent of them were foreigners, and probably the same proportion were middle-aged people. On the same day the Irish got up a parade in behalf of Irish Freedom. Though numbering but a relatively small percentage of the population of their city, the Irish were able to bring into the line of march over thirty thousand people. People will march in behalf of freedom, but there is no such insistent demand for booze that any considerable number will march through the heat in behalf of beer and wine. It had been expected that the wet parade would be the first gun fired in a campaign to nominate a wet mayor for New York, and eventually to launch a national movement in favor of nullification. It is clear that fifteen thousand people in a population of six millions will never be able to force their will upon the nation, especially in view of the fact that many of them are not voters. The feature of the parade that excited most comment was the display of a picture, da Vinci's "Last Supper," with an inscription demanding the right to use wine with the daily meals. This use of a sacred picture for the purpose of securing indulgence of carnal appetites proved a little too strong even for the stomach of the hard New Yorkers. The marchers carrying the picture were hissed.

"Main Street"

In London

MR. SINCLAIR LEWIS, accompanied by his wife, is now in London, where he is an interesting figure, owing to the success of his story of "Main Street." The editor of the British Weekly asked him to what he attributed the success of his story, and he replied that America is now beginning again to take an interest in her own life, especially the problem of living a decently bright and varied life in lonely country towns of about three thousand inhabitants. This is more difficult, he said, in America than in England, because our country is so large and such towns are further apart. When asked about the church in Gopher Prairie, he said that in such communities the churches had great power—one would hardly infer it from the story—but that they were losing it steadily by excessive sectarianism. In little towns, he added, there are representatives of almost every denomination, with meager resources and handfuls in attendance at the services. He expressed himself as most favorable to Christian union. In fact, the editor of the Weekly says, "One could see that 'Main Street' is an exposition in a guarded way of his own deepest beliefs." No doubt; but it is a pity that he chose the distorted vision of a neurotic woman through which to portray his "deepest beliefs"; the more because it gives English readers, so few of whom know anything of America, a very imperfect picture of town life in the middle west.

Perfunctory Religion

THE oath administered in a court of law is one of the reminders of the day when church and state were united. The oath invokes the name of God in covenant relation. Yet the administration of this oath, once a solemn religious proceeding, has in general degenerated into a very formal and meaningless procedure. A Chicago court recently displayed a sign which read as follows: "The oath: The man who takes an oath enters into covenant with God that he will act faithfully and testify truthfully in the case in which he is sworn." It was found that the sign made an impression upon the prospective witness. A marriage ceremony is a religious service. The Roman Catholics call it a sacrament. Some irreverent Protestants go through it under circumstances that destroy all its gravity and dignity. A big country wedding hardly waits for the last amen of the service before the charivari begins. There are even churches which permit mock wedding ceremonies as a means of revenue. Thus a religious ceremony involving all the instincts of awe and fine feeling becomes a sorry farce. The organ prelude and postlude in our Sunday worship are designed to be a call to worship and a fitting finale to the solemn act of communion with God. In many churches they are only a convenient device for drowning conversation. The prayermeeting talk and prayer may have originally voiced true aspirations and ideals. As the prayermeeting becomes conventionalized, these offerings of a contrite spirit are like the faded flowers left overlong on the altar. If religion is to be genuine it must ever be renewed from within. We cannot live upon any dead past. The sanctity of some other age or some other occasion will not be enough for the present hour. For this reason it were better to have no oath in a court of law, as our Quaker friends urge, than to have one devoid of its moral meaning. Even a prayermeeting would better be abandoned than to cumber the ground as the breeder of hypocrisies. It can save its life only by continual self-renewal.

Christ Weeps

Over the City

NO more pathetic passage is to be found in the gospels than that in which the Master stops on his triumphal entry to Jerusalem to weep over the doomed city. His words are immortal: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often I would have gathered thy children together as a hen gathered her chickens under her wings, but ye would not." The survey of the city begun by the Interchurch World Movement proceeded far enough to indicate that there is the same occasion for sorrowing over the city of today. A wonderful change is in process which is but dimly appreciated by the people of the cities themselves, much less by the people of the rural sections. One-tenth of all the people of the United States live in New York, Chicago and San Francisco. Most of the western states have less population than does the city of Chicago. In 1880, twenty-nine per cent of the population was urban. Now over half of the people of the United States live in urban communities. In cities of from twenty-five to fifty thousand population we find the largest percentage of church membership, 50.3 per cent. In rural sections and in larger cities the percentage is less. In cities of over three hundred thousand it is 47 per cent. The figures for Protestantism in large cities are even more discouraging. While the cities of 25,000 have a Protestant membership representing 28.1 per cent of the total population, in cities over 300,000 the membership is 10.2 per cent. Protestantism, while still a strong force in the smaller cities, is weakening in the rural sections and in the large cities. Divorce statistics indicate that the family is weakening in the big cities just as the church is. Protestantism must take these facts soberly into account. The apostle Paul regarded the city as the strategic center. He was essentially a missionary to the large cities of the provinces he visited, leaving rural evangelism to be carried on from city centers. In America Protestantism has followed a strategy quite the reverse.

Sadhu Sundar Singh

"The religion that only comes to us from external scriptures never becomes our own; our only tie with it is that of habit. To gain religion within is man's life-long adventure. In the extremity of suffering must it be born; on his life blood it must live; and then, whether or not it brings him happiness, the man's journey shall end in the joy of fulfillment."

THESE words of Tagore return to mind as one reads the story of Sadhu Sundar Singh, the Indian Christian mystic whose visit to England recently made such a stir. Anywhere he is a figure to attract attention. Tall, erect, with black hair and beard, light olive complexion, soft dark eyes, with calm mien and bearing, even apart from robe and turban, he looks as if he had stepped straight out of the Bible. It is said that a servant maid reported to her mistress when he was at the door, "There's someone wants to see you, ma'am. I can't make anything of his name. But he looks as if he might be Jesus Christ."

The Sundar, as has been said, is an Indian, whose life, since his conversion has been given up to the service of his Master with an abandon and a joy which recall St. Francis of Assisi. He has wandered as a holy man, without any possessions beyond the clothes he wears, his New Testament and a blanket, from one end of India to the other, preaching Christ to his countrymen as none but an Indian can do. He has been on missionary journeys to Tibet—a land closed to Christian missionaries—where he suffered horrible persecution, and was condemned to death. He has also preached in Ceylon and China. The note of his gospel is a joyous fellowship with the living Christ, and his air is of one on an errand, not unwillingly, but triumphantly, as a messenger of the best tidings. No figure today is so much like the early Christians; and he knows nothing of "the lost radiance of religion," of which Dr. Jacks speaks.

Already there is a biography of the Sundar, by Arthur Parker, and an elaborate study of his mind and message by Canon Streeter and A. J. Appasamy. The reason for interest in his career is that he is a great present-day mystic, a practical mystic "the intensity of whose religious experience is precisely what impels him to practical service." He recalls the shining figures that went singing through the world in the middle ages, and a study of his life throws a flood of light on such saints as St. Francis and St. Paul. With him mysticism is no vague pantheism, but a personal consecration of life, thought and devotion to Jesus Christ. He is an Indian interpreter of the gospel to Indians, and as a man of the east he is able to help the western mind to appreciate much that it does not understand, or has forgotten, in its own eastern faith. Parable and analogy are native to his speech, as they were to Jesus. About seventy of his parables are given by Canon Streeter—all of them are beautiful, and some of them wonderfully apposite—and all are drawn from old and simple and lovable things of everyday life. How simply he tells his faith and experience:

Christ is my Savior. He is my life. He is everything to me in heaven and earth. Once while traveling in a sandy region I was tired and thirsty. Standing on the top of a mound I looked for water. The sight of a lake at a distance brought joy to me, for now I hoped to quench my thirst. I walked toward it for a long time, but I could never reach it. Afterwards I found out that it was a mirage. . . . In like manner I was wandering about the world in search of the water of life. The things of this world—wealth, position, honor, luxury—looked like a lake by drinking whose waters I hoped to quench my thirst. But I could never find a drop of water to quench my spiritual thirst. I was dying of thirst. When my spiritual eyes were opened I saw the rivers of living water flowing from His pierced side. I drank of it and was satisfied. His presence gave me peace, no matter in what circumstances I am placed. Amidst persecution I have found joy. In prison he was there.

Like that other great Christo-centric mystic, the Apostle Paul, when the Sundar speaks of Christ, he thinks not so much of the Jesus of history as of the Eternal Christ, the image of the invisible God. "There are those who speak of Christ as the supreme mystic, what would you say to that?" he was asked. He replied: "That is the tendency of those who are not inclined to accept the divinity of Christ. Christ is not the supreme mystic; he is the Master of mystics, the Savior of mystics." It is a little remarkable that the Sundar has arrived by spiritual intuition and experience at a position closely akin to that held by men of liberal-evangelical faith. The idea of Christ as a proposition has no place in his preaching, says Canon Streeter. "The meaning of the atonement and the blood that washes away our sins is that we are grafted into Christ, I in him and he in me." Thus by spiritual insight he penetrates that devastating misunderstanding of Pauline phraseology which has done such incalculable mischief to the church, and grasps the reality which the apostle proclaimed. He is no ascetic, nor does he habitually fast. Yet to him visions are granted, and they bring him refreshment and clearness of insight into the things of faith.

Several questions are suggested by this fascinating figure from the mystical territory of the east, where the great religions, including our own, were born. Why should a great, saintly Christian mystic be so startling an apparition in modern Christianity? Have we lost the mystical note, which has been the distinction and grace of the church in all its great ages? Has the church no longer the power to produce saints of simple, profound, creative experience? Is the church bankrupt of its most precious treasure? We argue and analyze, and develop a frightful lingo about the psychology of religious experience, but what about the experience itself? Much ado is made about the social meaning of Christianity—and rightly so—but where is the power to make it effective, if such a figure as the Sundar is so exceptional as to be a curiosity among us? Even if we apply religion to social problems, as we talk so much of doing, there will be little result unless it has more power than it has now!

One thing is certain, as a writer in the New York Evening Post has pointed out. Far short as philosophy may fall of explaining it, or psychology of analyzing it, or the new poetic fledglings of believing it—since they think there can be no such things as feathers because their own little souls are yet bare of them—mysticism must be reckoned with as a persistent, creative, illuminating force in human life, sending forth its flames of aspiration from the dark soul of the primitive savage, from the God-intoxicated mind of the mediæval mystic, from the art-inspired soul of a Schiller—the first to propose a philosophical scheme based upon the æsthetic faculty—or a William Blake, a Phillips Brooks, or a Sundar Singh, and finally coming into its own in the more profound of modern thinkers.

Are Women's Styles Immoral?

THERE has been much comment of late upon the changed standards of dress and behavior prevailing among the young people of American communities. Some of these comments are extremely pessimistic. They call attention to the increasing freedom and irresponsibility of conduct displayed by young men and women. It is said that feminine attire is deliberately contrived to advertise sex and suggest unwholesome ideas; that the older notions of seclusion and protection for girls have quite passed away; that young men and women regulate their own conduct without either parental counsel or concern; that the reading of sensational literature and the attendance upon questionable plays and moving picture dramas is so commonplace as to excite comment and disapproval no longer; that smoking is almost as frequently observed among women as men, and that the enactment of the prohibitory law has appeared to stimulate the use of intoxicants in many groups of the socially ambitious and aware.

It is probable that the facts which illustrate these statements are easily obtainable. Every community of any considerable size can furnish them. The past five years have witnessed rapid and startling changes in accepted, or at least tolerated, forms of behavior. It is natural that the war should be held responsible for no small portion of this new manifestation of the spirit of adventure. Great numbers of young men and women were given opportunities for wide freedom of conduct, in which the question of moral ideals was less involved than that of service and efficiency. In the great majority of instances public service did not impair personal integrity. To an astonishing degree the young women of America maintained the ideals of dignity and modesty in trying conditions, and in circumstances where the temptation to compromise with traditional delicacy of manners must have been very great.

None the less the effects of all this new sense of freedom and self-direction are very evident in both the young manhood and the young womanhood of the present time. Is the tendency downward? Is the social behavior of the time sinister in its significance? Are the moral values accumulated through generations at the expense of so much effort and solicitude being thrown away with a spendthrift wastefulness that threatens moral bankruptcy for the next generation? It is a problem not easy of solution, and there are convinced advocates on both sides. But we are far from persuaded that the pessimist has the last word.

Every period of adjustment following war is a time of unrest and of shifting standards. This is one of the heavy costs of war, nearly all of whose by-products are evil and only evil. But war is not the only cause of the new spirit. Knowledge is much more widely diffused than ever before. Subjects that were once tabu in polite society are discussed with a freedom which is both stimulating and disturbing. Woman's entrance into political, industrial and commercial life has given her a sense of independence and self-assertion which separates her widely from the mothers and daughters of a former generation. In this new capacity she begins to regulate her affairs with astonishing awareness in regard to dress, social conduct, sex life and many other forms of behavior. And for the most part it must be confessed that she manages it, even at a very early age, with great insight and ability.

The garments of women are far and away more sensible and healthful than ever before. They leave the body a freedom and access to fresh air which only the sensibly habited women of the orient can approach. As for the exposure of limb and outline, that is a matter of custom to which the public soon becomes habituated. The exposure of arms, shoulders and limbs is by no means to be regarded as a sign of moral laxity. Few people are in doubt as to whether the lightness and abbreviation of clothing observable in a particular woman are in the interest of free movement and comfort or are an advertisement of sex. It is the conduct and bearing of a girl or woman that determines the impression she makes, and not the style of her apparel.

Every generation has had its ideas of dress propriety, and generally any modification of or departure from the custom of the time is regarded with apprehension by the censors of morality. Women's dresses a century ago were absurdly long, inflated and cumbersome. In comparison with them the scanty and abbreviated skirts of the present mode seem to some immodest. But the older style permitted an exposure of shoulder and bosom which even the present so-called extreme style would exclude. A few years ago there came in for a time the fashion of thin, transparent skirts, which at first were affected by a few extremists in the smart sets, but soon became very common. At first there was an outcry of outraged decency, but soon no one thought anything more of the matter. Custom had staled any sensational values the style presented.

The women of the orient are as modest after their manner as any in the west. Yet they exhibit such startling variations from the conventions of the west as to seem quite indifferent to the exposure of the body. In many instances, particularly among Mohammedans, there is the most scrupulous care taken to conceal the face, while the rest of the person is a matter of indifference. One has seen women wade out into the shore waters of the Sea of Galilee to fill their water jars, carefully adjusting their yashmuks, or veils, to prevent their features from being seen, and at the same moment lifting all their lower garments waist high to avoid getting them wet. And passers-by, habituated to the sight, hardly turned their heads to look. It is a matter of custom, and morals have little to do with dress when once the ideas of freedom and health have the right of way. The women who bathe in the holy waters of the Ganges at Benares, baring their bodies to wash their flesh and their garments in the sacred stream, take no thought of any immodest conduct, nor do the throngs of their fellow worshippers. Our western women will not follow these customs made common by a different climate. But they will use the same good sense in adapting their clothing to the ends of health and comfort, and only the evil-minded will be aware.

On one side of the life of the younger generation there is crying need for amendment. That is in the relations of parents to children. The old autocracy of parental discipline is gone, and happily gone. Few parents have either the knowledge or the discretion to rule their children in the manner once thought necessary. And the evil results of too lavish a use of authority in the earlier days were as conspicuous as the opposite evils of abandoned responsibility too often seen today. What is needed is neither the martinet sort of discipline practiced a generation ago, nor the lapse of all direction too much in evidence now. It is desirable rather that the relations of parent and child shall be those of comradeship and confidence. This is much more difficult than either of the extremes. But it is the only ground for the deeper sense of respect and obedience which a new and very wonderful generation of children is learning to accord to fathers and mothers who understand and sympathize.

For there is just such a generation of children and young people now on the way to maturity. They are given large freedom by their parents, but at the same time they recognize the standards of manners and morals of which they have been made aware by tactful instruction and by inspiring example. They enjoy the diversions which are abundant and wholesome. They are unafraid in the presence of crises of conduct that might prove disastrous to neglected or scolded youth. Between them and their parents there is mutual respect and confidence. They are the honor of the social order and the hope of the future. They are not trying to experiment on the margins of propriety, but are alert to discover where their educational advantages and their social liberty may be made of greatest service to the institutions and groups with which they find themselves connected. In such young people, neither Puritans nor moral spendthrifts, lies the hope of the future.

Division Scandal Threatens China Missions

FOR a good many years the China missionaries have not seen eye to eye theologically. This has made no difference in fellowship, for the sense of an overwhelming problem served to unify them to meet the needs of the largest nation in the world. It is only in the past year that fellowship has been broken. Now there are in the Protestant camp of China two distinct groups. One emphasizes the second coming of our Lord and feels that the immanence of this event makes unnecessary many of the items of educational and philanthropic work. The other either does not believe in the second coming, or feels that the Christian's duty is to be busy at his work, no matter what the immediate future may bring.

The premillennialists have come into group consciousness through the visit the past year of Dr. Griffith-Thomas of Toronto and Mr. Charles Trumbull, editor of the Sunday School Times. These gentlemen made a tour of China to proclaim to the missionaries the immanence of the Lord's coming. A "Bible Union" was formed of those holding the premillennial faith, and by implication those outside the Bible Union do not believe the Bible. About two-thirds of the missionaries are outside this organization. The missionaries in the Bible Union are largely those of the China Inland Mission and of the Christian and Missionary Alliance, neither of them denominational organizations. Naturally the missionaries of the Seventh Day Adventists are in the Bible Union. Probably not five per cent of the missionaries of the great evangelical bodies have united with the Bible Union, though there are some who may sympathize with the premillennial view of the Bible. While those who hold to the social gospel are willing to fraternize with all Christians and to co-operate with them in all good work, the premillennialists, taking their cue from American leaders, are developing the spirit of exclusiveness, and withdraw themselves from the company of their brethren. The Chinese witness the scandal of division among the Christian forces and naturally they feel that the Christian religion is not the religion for China if it is not even able to hold in fraternity a group of ardently religious people at work at the same task in a distant land. This weakening of the Christian forces in the face of new hazards in Chinese life makes the future of missionary effort in China problematical, even though we have been feeling until recently that this was the most promising field in all the world.

Students are returning to China from the various civilized nations of the world. Large numbers of these are going back with the report that the educated classes in western countries are above Christianity, and that the church has but little influence upon the life of the people. Some Christian students are returning with a different assessment of the facts. There is every tendency, however, for the Chinese nation to follow the leaders who bring a materialistic philosophy from the west. In addition to the influence of these students, there is widespread resentment against the aggressions of Christian nations on the territorial integrity of China. Nearly every one of the larger nations of the west have some kind of territorial concession. The Chinese will never be happy until China is once more a land for the Chinese.

With the missionary problem in China becoming more difficult by reason of the changing attitude of the Chinese themselves, the tragedy of the divisive movement within the Christian group is the more marked. With devotees traveling over China, spending ten minutes between trains to declare, "Jesus is coming," the intelligent Chinamen may be expected to mock. He has no background in his thinking for a catastrophic second coming. The denominational leaders may continue to get up big drives as a means of unifying the Christian forces, but what the Christian church of today needs more than anything else is some honest thinking on fundamentals.

W. E. Orchard

Eighth Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

"TELL you what it is. That parson is city-bred, a town man down to the roots of him. If he'd got the sea and the hills in his soul, or the great wide spaces, and if he heard the cry of the wind above the rattle of your beastly old streets, he'd not say much about the things that seem big to him now, and he'd not know how to say enough about some things he gets rid of in five minutes!"

After such manner a man from the far back Bush of Australia, who had lived in the great, lonely silences until he had been stripped of all conventionality, but confirmed in the worship and fear of God, spoke of Dr. Orchard in his Enfield days. The man from the Bush never went to church—did not care a hang about it, he said—and at first he was shocked by the sermon, as no anæmic sermon-taster knows how to be shocked. But he soon realized the profound reverence and sincerity of the preacher, despite a seeming flippancy and a love of shocking people, from which he has never recovered. There was a point in the thrust; but it is also true that if Dr. Orchard had the wave in his heart and the cry of the wind in his soul, he would have less to give the restless, nervous, jostled city folk to whom he ministers, and which makes him easily the most picturesque and outstanding figure in the Free Church pulpit of London.

"NEW THEOLOGY"

In the stormy days of the New Theology discussion, hardly an echo of which remains, Dr. Orchard stood with R. J. Campbell, albeit with an accent, emphasis and point of view all his own. By virtue alike of temperament and experience both were wandering stars, each in his own orbit, but Orchard was the abler of the two, having a more incisive intellect as well as a finer literary quality. His early thesis upon "Modern Theories of Sin" revealed a man with whom to reckon, at once provocative and provoking in thought, as fearless in criticism as he was fruitful in constructive insight. Many still think that some of the best work he has ever done was as confident and counsellor of souls astray, torn between sorrow and revolt, whereof we read in "Problems and Perplexities"—one of the best books of its kind ever written. Indeed, he is reported to have said that it was in dealing with the difficulties of others that he discovered the inadequacy, if not bankruptcy, of the New Theology, and a need for something deeper, more drastic, more real. Hence his "trek back to Christ," as he described it, wherein he abandoned the position then held, or rather went beyond it towards a Free Catholicism. The closing pages of the little book gave a hint of this tendency:

The true Church is that organism which continues the ministry of Jesus Christ, and is the body of God's increasing incarnation. At present no organization can be identified with that organism. . . . But it does not follow that the present institution can never become the church of God. It will probably grow worse before it grows better. It will have to face reform or extinction. . . . It is impossible to predict the character of the next generation. But there will probably be a change in the very idea of the church, and it is more than likely that the conflicting ideals of Catholicism and Protestantism will disappear and give rise to a fresh synthesis. . . . The church will then be truly catholic, for it will embrace every type: lowly, like the Lord, the servant rather than the mistress, the learner even more than the teacher. Surely all within the church must hear the warning sounds. They come not from the defiant world; the world heeds us not; nor from some scornful ambassador of the gates of hell. That sound is the church's Lord, knocking, without!

Even in his liberal days Dr. Orchard was a liberalist with a difference; as far removed from an arid rationalism as from the dilettante whose theology is a confection of rose-water sentiment. For him Christianity was dynamite, not jam, a stroke of lightning, not a stick of candy. He held that liberalism meant that a man was free to be a Christian, not that he holds his Christianity lightly or loosely; that he has the same charity toward the past as toward the future, and is as willing to listen to St. Bernard as to Henri Bergson. Otherwise, he said, our boasted liberalism is only sound and bluster, signifying nothing more than narrowness and vanity. He thought the liberal pulpit rejected certain dogmas about Christ, because it wanted Christ himself brought nearer to us—with the demand which he knew would plague him with an unsatisfied passion to be more like him. He imagined that liberals were discontented with the dogmas of atonement and salvation because they were against an easy gospel—that is, they were willing to stand naked before the Awful Holiness, seeking "purity rather than peace," as Newman made his motto. In short, if he was anxious for religion to be liberal, he was far more concerned that liberalism should be religious in a radical, creative, deep-going fashion, issuing in heroic moral action. As a result he found himself an orthodox heretic among liberals and a liberal heretic among the orthodox; and that is where he stands today.

MESSAGE MORE IMPORTANT THAN LABEL

No matter; it is far more important to understand Dr. Orchard and his message than it is to try to classify him in one category or another, much less to paste a label on his cassock. At the King's Weigh House in London, as in his earlier ministry in Enfield, he attracts an eclectic audience from all over the city, drawn equally by his shattering criticisms of the older views of theology and the positive message which no utterance of his ever lacks—but still made by a grace of personality and an authentic spiritual genius which mark him as a God-illuminated preacher. Not a few insist that the rarest power of Dr. Orchard is his gift of prayer, as revealed in his golden little book, "The Temple," which has done so much to help men of the modern mind to walk once more the quiet way to the Place of Hearing. Brief, tender, wistful, heart-probing, its prayers are like those paving stones one finds in unexpected places on the Yorkshire moors, marking a broken and half-forgotten path over the heather toward an ancient shrine of faith, Whitby Abbey, uplifted on its stately headland above the northern sea. It is a modern devotional classic, the like of which it would be hard to name, unless it be "Spoken Words of Prayer and Praise," by Tipple, whose prayers are lyrics of the love of God and the beauty of his world, sun-bright and attuned to the songs of birds, albeit not lacking in sympathy for the struggle and tragedy of life. In my London Diary I find the following memory of my first service at the King's Weigh House, the Sunday evening before I returned to my work at the City Temple in 1917.

May 12th:—Went to King's Weigh House Church today—made famous by Dr. Binney—and heard W. E. Orchard preach. He is an extraordinary preacher, of vital mind, of authentic insight, of challenging personality. From an advanced liberal position he has swung toward the Free Catholicism, and by an elaborate use of symbols is seeking to lead men by the sacramental approach to the mystical experience and the social expression of religion. Some attend for the service, some for the sermon, and together they make an influential following. The sermon had to do with the vision of Isaiah in the temple—a favorite theme in these days when so many things are shaken—and seldom have I heard a preacher more searching, more aglow with the divine passion. He does not simply kindle the imagination; he gives one a vivid sense of reality. He has a dangerous gift of humor, which sometimes sharpens into satire, but he uses it as a whip of cords to drive sham and unreality out of the temple. He said that preaching in our day is bad, and that in the Anglican church "it is really worse than necessary!" Much ado is now made about reordination, and he thought that it is not enough for the bishop to lay his hands on a preacher; the servant-girl and the tram-driver ought also to add their consecration. With the lift of God in his face he cried: "You need Christ, and I can give him to you!" Surely that is the ultimate grace and glory of the pulpit—the living Christ mediated to men. It recalled the oft repeated record in the Journal of Wesley, in respect of the companies to whom he preached: "I gave them Christ." It was more than an offer; it was a sacrament of communication.

LONDON'S MOST IMPELLING PREACHER

Such an entry gives no details of the picture, no account of the service with its strange blend of mediævalism and modernity, no description of the man who is the most impelling preacher in London, as he is often the most perplexing and irritating. A tiny, wisp of a man, with tow hair and searching blue eyes, if in the pulpit he looks like an ascetic, in private he is the most joyous of comrades and the best story teller in England. At first the service, with its quick changes of artistic vestments, suggests a kindergarten parade of ecclesiastical millinery—in which Leviticus is substituted for Galatians, and the crucifix for the cross—until one has read his remarkable sermon on "Color in Religion," and knows what he means by it. Behind him in the pulpit hangs a crucifix, and he often seems to appeal to it beseeching the Master to speak through him the living word. For sheer intellectual power, for keenness of spiritual insight—its authority marred, at times, by priestly assumption—he is as unique in his appeal as he is inimitable in his oratory. His brilliant asides, swift and sharp as a rapier-thrust, with enough slang in them to make them spicy, would not survive revision in print, but they are tellingly effective.

When, however, we get beyond his humor, his satire, his gadfly criticism—which entitle him to be called the Bernard Shaw of Nonconformity—we find ourselves face to face with something that grips and pierces, and will not let us go. It is not of the intellect merely; it is a passion for souls which softens the sharpest edges of his thought and irradiates even his most cutting sarcasm. As another has written with true insight:

At the heart of his theology is a Christ who, feeling the urgency of the divine will upon him, and yielding himself up with the utmost singleness of purpose and the most complete self-abandonment to the impulse of Saviourhood latent in every man, obtained that "Name that is above every name," whereby all men must be saved. Suddenly a note of passion creeps into the clear, sympathetic voice, bringing us up against something really great and searching, and all the minor irritations are forgotten. Suddenly the preacher grips reality with naked hands and all side issues sink below the surface. He is speaking of the reality of the soul, of sin, of the human will, of God, of Christ. Terrible in some moods is his unsparing surrender to truth, his incorruptible attitude towards reality. He refuses to eat the bread of compromise, spurns all cheap pragmatisms, scorns to debase religion into a mere means of human happiness. He does not palter with the irony, the exactions, the crushing sternness of the love of God; he does not trick himself or others into believing that Jesus can be loved with immunity. His Christ is the Christ whose words fling fire on the earth, whose touch leaves wounds, whose cross shatters our little providential theories and tempts us to cry out in our passionate hours that it is a cruel and bitter thing to be loved of God. Men who have so learnt Christ have a Herod-sword within their hearts, and by an inalienable birthright belong to the spiritual aristocracy. If such a man is a preacher, especially if he is a born preacher like Dr. Orchard, he will fling fire among men and live to see it kindle.

DR. ORCHARD DURING THE WAR

From the first day of the Great War to the last, Dr. Orchard stood in his pulpit and pointed to the crucifix, at once a prophet of indignation and a priest of pity. He preached no interim ethics. If he was called a pacifist it did not matter; he refused to lower the Christian ideal an inch. Insistently, consistently, with passionate and surrendering conviction he bore magnificent and ceaseless witness against all war. His criticism was merciless, his sarcasm withering, and he spared no one however high in office. Through it all one felt an infinite heartache, as of one who was himself crucified by the agony of it all. Returning one day from Scotland, in a railway carriage I heard one British officer say to another: "I say, old chap, it's a beastly business, this war. It tears me in two. Over here we sing Peace on Earth, and out there the killing of boys goes on. When I get so fed up I can't stand it any longer, I go to a little chapel in Duke Street, where a chap named Orchard blows the whole blooming business up. All I can do is to swear, but he gets it said. It's ripping to hear him do it." Had Dr. Orchard exercised such a ministry in New York, no doubt he would have landed in jail, so much greater is the freedom enjoyed in England. In my diary are a number of entries about him and I venture to transcribe another:

May 10th, 1918:—What the Free Catholicism may turn out to be remains to be disclosed: so far it is more clever and critical than constructive. W. E. Orchard is its Bernard Shaw, and W. G. Peck its Chesterton. At first it was thought to be only a protest against the ungracious barrenness of Nonconformist worship, in behalf of rhythm, color, and symbolism. But it is more than that. It seeks to unite personal religious experience with its corporate and symbolical expression, thus joining two things hitherto held apart. As between Anglicans and Nonconformists it discovers the higher unity of things which do not differ, and that is a distinct advance. For, if we are ever to have Christian union, it must be by comprehension, not by compromise. It ought to be possible for those who emphasize individual experience of religious reality to unite with those who seek the corporate fellowship of believers. Together they may approach the largeness of Christ, in whom there is room for every type of experience and expression. Also, by interpreting and extending the sacramental principle, and at the same time disinfecting it of magic and superstition, the Free Catholicism may give new sanction and inspiration to creative social endeavor. For years it has been observed how many ultra High Churchmen—for example, Bishop Gore, one of the noblest characters in modern Christianity—have been leaders in the social interpretation and application of Christianity. Perhaps, at last, we shall learn that it was not the church, but humanity, with which Jesus identified himself when he said, "This is my body broken for you." There is still further light to break forth from Christian truth, and let us hope that the Free Catholicism will help us to see and follow it. The great thing about Christianity is that no one can tell what it will do next.

Perhaps this entry may help some of those who misunderstand Dr. Orchard to see the kind of Catholicism of which he is a prophet and a pioneer. Some imagine that by Catholicism he means the Roman Church, but that is neither free nor catholic. No one knows better than Dr. Orchard that Rome, as it now is, would crush him as quickly, as contemptuously, as she did Tyrrell, and with a tragedy far more ghastly than that of Newman. For while he has much that reminds one of Newman, he is a free spirit, and he knows the way to Emmaus as Newman never did. Others think that his Catholicism is merely esthetic and temperamental, a sentimental attachment to some antique survival, like a fondness for Gothic architecture or a new version of the Mass. Far from it. He would, no doubt, restore much, if not all, of the old Catholic system, but without the spirit of anathema, exclusion, and compulsion, uniting the cultus of Christianity with its creed, and interpreting both in terms of eternal truth and modern need. Thus his vision is far wider, more comprehensive, more revolutionary than his critics are aware. Recently he said: "Some of you have been reassured about me lately that I am not going over to Rome, after all. I am not so sure. I may! But why are you not afraid that I may join the Salvation Army? Because equally I may! What I hate are the middle ways."

"FREE CATHOLICISM"

No; the Free Catholicism is far more Catholic than the Roman Church, and it is freer than the Free Churches. It is a rediscovery of the comprehensiveness of Christianity, a living experience of the universality of Christ, as much at home with the Inner Light of the Quaker as with the Real Presence. But it joins depth with breadth, and finds in the old Christian dogmas not metaphysical abstractions, but dynamic forces for the creation of new men and a new social order, linking mystical vision with social passion, and freedom with fellowship. One has only to read the sermons of Dr. Orchard, who follows the old elaborate homiletic method—what the English call "the three-deck sermon"—to discover how profoundly radical the Free Catholicism is both as to personal experience and social regeneration. For the two are inseparable in his thought, as witness such sermons as "How the Cross Reconstructs Personality," and "Christian Dogma and Social Revolution." Here is vital preaching, as ancient as it is modern, aglow with insight and passion and prophecy; the voice of one who has the genius of a pathfinder, and the courage to make experiments, knowing that as of old Jesus "made as though he would have gone further," so, today, he beckons us toward his own largeness. In a striking sermon entitled "The New Catholicism," he says:

This then is the New Catholicism. At present it is no more than a dream in the hearts of a few, rather misty and vague perhaps, yet able to make every waking hour full of unrest for its realization. With others it is only a dumb craving for they know not what, a discontent with things as they are. It has yet to outline its policy and fight its battles; and before it can conquer, there are prejudices to overcome, fears to dispel, false conclusions to disprove. Yet it holds the field. Denominationalism can no longer count upon the old-time loyalties. Neither Protestantism nor Romanism can ever do anything but stand over against one another, hostile and suspicious. There can be no reconciliation until they are gathered into one really Catholic Church. . . . Such hopes can only be realized as we get back to the catholicity of Christ's character and teaching. It is following names instead of Christ that has ruined us all. It is the attempt to employ worldly power instead of the wisdom of the Cross. It is a false scholarship that has given us a divided Christ. Only as we discover the One Catholic Christ shall we be able to build the One Catholic Church.

If in this appreciation the emphasis has been laid as much upon the message as upon the messenger, it is because the Minister of the King's Weigh House stands before us a shining and challenging figure, at once a rebuke and a portent. With the spiritual radicalism of his Master, he puts to scorn our comfortable conventionalism, our plausible expediences, our Pickwickian endeavors after Christian unity, no less than our compromising cowardice in the presence of the organized brutality of modern industrial and political life. When one thinks of the tragedy of a divided, distracted, ineffective church—a mere huddle of sects, each clinging to its own little dialect—set over against the federated iniquity of the world, one thanks God for a prophet-priest like Dr. Orchard; as much for his teasing humor, his tormenting satire, and his tantalizing, waspish criticism, as for his radiant insight and eloquence. Let him wear his gorgeous vestments and use the ancient symbols and litanies of faith, if by any means he can help to bring back the visions that make the church the sacramental incarnation of Christ. Frail, fearless, fascinating, across the tumbling seas I can still see him as he stood at his high altar, having poured out his heart in protest against the collective suicide of war, making the gesture of the Cross in benediction—as if to point us, in parable as well as precept, to the living Christ whose anointed messenger he is.

The Church and Its Bible

By W. J. Lhamon

THE church of the first century was without any canon, or Bible, except the Old Testament. The church of the second century began to have in addition to the Old Testament the New Testament. The church of the third century became conscious of a body of sacred writings other than the Old Testament. It was not till the fourth century that the greatest of the Greek preachers could say, "He who cannot buy a complete Bible ought at least to purchase a New Testament."

Literature springs out of life. History is written subsequent to events. The church came first and the New Testament sprang out of her bosom. One may safely say that during a hundred and fifty years the church was and the New Testament, considered as a sacred canon, was not. The book did not create the church; the church created the book.

This creation was a process, half incidental, half under the urge of circumstances. It is only in the light of subsequent events, the glow of the centuries, that we can see the process to have been a providential one. The "most beautiful book in the world," the third gospel, was written by Luke, the companion of Paul, quite incidentally as a message of exuberant faith to his friend Theophilus. The author could have had no idea of adding a precious unit to a sacred canon. Similar statements pertain to the other gospels. Each had its incidental call, its individual history, and its special, local, timely message. Paul's letters were called out as naturally, yet as incidentally, as a pastor's sermons or a college president's chapel talks. Paul could not have dreamed that his letter to the Galatians, or to the Romans, or his correspondence with the Corinthians, would become features of a sacred canon to stand through a thousand or ten thousand years. There is proof on the face of his letters that he anticipated nothing of the kind. When he refers to "the holy scriptures," as in his exhortation to Timothy, he means the Old Testament. And this is what Jesus meant when he warned the hardened Pharisees to "search the scriptures."

CHURCH CAME BEFORE BIBLE

This simple fact, namely, that the church created the book, and not the book the church, and the further fact that the creation was a process covering, broadly speaking, the first two centuries of the Christian era,—these facts have tremendous bearings.

The early church was not the church of a book, and the Christian religion was not originally the religion of a book. In this respect Christianity is in striking contrast with the Judaism of the days of Jesus and with the religion of Mahomet centuries later. Originally Christianity was just simply devotion to the person of Jesus, a devotion guided, filled, and in every way conditioned by the Holy Spirit. Early Christianity was not devotion to a book, or reliance on a book, or the affirmation of the infallibility and finality of a body of sacred writings. Its actions were not conditioned by chapter and verse citations, and its final appeal was not to "the Book" in matters of doctrine and polity.

The appeal of the early church was to the apostles and first elders as long as they lived; to such elders or leaders as had been companions of the apostles after the apostles had passed away; still later, to those who could say "I have seen and heard such and such a one, a companion of Paul, or Peter, or John."

About the middle of the second century these companions of the apostles, and companions of companions of the apostles passed away. As they did so the church began to seek out authoritative documents. If a writing could be traced to an apostle, or to the companion of an apostle, it was held to be of value and reliance was placed on it. Thus the first gospel was traced to Matthew the publican, wholly or in part; the second gospel, to Mark the companion of Peter; the third, to Luke the companion of Paul; and the fourth, to John the beloved disciple. The writings of Paul began to be gathered and treasured. A little book was found and kept that proceeded from James the brother of Jesus, and one by Jude. The book of Revelation had a long, hard time getting itself into the canon; it was supposed to have been written by John, but there were doubts about its authorship.

Thus the canon grew. And its growth was stimulated by force of circumstances. Persecutions and the rise of false doctrines made the defense of the faith compulsory, and under the exigencies of the times the apostolic documents became more and more precious in the eyes of the believers. A halo of the past gathered round them and there grew up a doctrine of inspiration relative to them, and they were placed on a level with the Old Testament. There were some who perceived, indeed, that these apostolic documents were of more direct value for Gentile Christians than the Old Testament writings, and thus it came to pass that in the fourth century Chrysostom, as quoted above, could say, "He who cannot buy a complete Bible ought at least to purchase a New Testament." This striking bit of pulpit exhortation may be taken as a landmark in the history and triumph of the New Testament canon. The appeal of the middle-second century church to the apostolic writings was not to their inspiration or to their finality or their infallibility, but simply to their reliability as coming directly or indirectly from the apostles. The teachings of the books were accepted as reliable because the source was reliable. The waters were pure because the fountain was pure.

THE SEAT OF INFALLIBILITY

It was not till the time of the Reformation that the Bible, Old and New Testaments, was looked upon as mechanically inspired, infallible and final. The Roman Catholic councils found the seat of infallibility in the church. The Protestant leaders felt the need of an opposing standard of infallibility, and found it in the Bible. It seemed not to occur to either of the contending parties to challenge the claim of infallibility itself. The Protestant movement would have been on a far safer basis today and might have been much further advanced had it challenged the Roman Catholic claim on the one hand, and on the other asserted the impossibility of any infallible standard and denied the need of one. We have come to the time when we must deny this claim, whether in Roman Catholic or Protestant ranks, and must also free ourselves from the hypothesis of the need of such a standard. An infallible standard presupposes infallible interpreters of it. It presupposes an infallible message to infallible recipients, men or institutions. But such men and such institutions do not exist. The Roman Catholic Church is as preposterous as it is logical in meeting the issue squarely and announcing its infallibility when it speaks "ex cathedra" in the person of the pope. It is equally logical and equally preposterous for any first class biblical scholar or any eighth grade pulpit tyro to assert his infallibility as an interpreter of an infallible Bible. We live in a growing world, not an infallible one. Our best ethical and spiritual thought is an approximation to ideals that are still beyond us, and our best conduct halts awkwardly on the road to perfection.

The ancient church, heeding the voices of apostles and companions of apostles, harkening to the echoes of the Savior's simple messages of love and life, was a unit. In its unity it conquered the Roman Empire. But see the tangle into which we have gotten ourselves by our hypothesis of infallibility, our dogmatism, and our unloveliness! Between two and three hundred sects of us, each claiming the validation of the same infallible book, each tacitly claiming infallibility in its juggling of texts to prove itself right, and too many of us "red in tooth and claw" to tear asunder those who have honestly seen other light than ours.

SCIENCE OF INTERPRETATION

The interpretation of the Bible is a science quite as much as chemistry or botany or engineering. If the untrained man would read it as the ancient Christians did, that is, simply for its ethical and spiritual guidance, simply as one of the ways of leading to Christ, all might be well. But when the untrained man goes to the Bible for infallible dicta on which to build a creed or a sect trouble begins. He invariably plays the role of the carpenter rather than the interpreter. He selects texts as the carpenter selects boards in a lumber yard. He cuts and splices without regard to context, historical setting or literary form. In this way the most flagrant isms are built, conflicting dogmas are backed by infallible credentials, and the Bible is discredited in the eyes of intelligent people.

There is no possibility of the union of Christians so long as the Bible, and more especially the New Testament, functions as an infallible standard on the one hand, and on the other the untrained sectarian interpreter passes his interpretations of it over on an unsuspecting public as an infallible coin. Such religious malpractice results in division, pride of sect, bigotry and aloofness. There is a hardness about the hypothesis of infallibility that does not belong to the graciously human side of real Christianity. Infallibility, if there were such a thing, would be remote from life, so remote as to be inaccessible. Popular belief in the book as infallible yet shrouded in mystery and in need of explanation has opened the door of opportunity to the sectarian dogmatist, the fanatic, the misleader, the religious mountebank preying on the credulity of ancient and modern "sheep without a shepherd." The delectable city of Christian union does not lie at the end of such a hypothetical road kept by guides the more dogmatic the more ignorant they are.

THE INCIPIENT CHURCH

The New Testament writings grew by a natural human process out of the life of the church during the years from 50 A. D. to about 100 A. D. The church was in its incipency and the New Testament is in large part the history of its incipency. Its function was the function of every great literature springing out of great movements. It was and is the presentation of the history and poetry of the movement, of its truth and emotion, of its ideals and power. The New Testament is great in proportion as primitive Christianity was great, divine as it was divine, human as it was human, and inspired as it was inspired. It is and was, therefore, mainly if not wholly, a first century production, the incipient offspring of an incipient movement, the divine-human offspring of a divine-human movement. Centuries later it became a canon, a "rule of the books," a divinely infallible and inflexible commitment, a static thing, a finality, with chapters and verses for doctrines and dogmas, with fixed ordinances, and rigid politics, and prescribed rituals, a thing absolutely hard and cold, like sand and cement hardened into concrete and reenforced with "rods of iron." Legislative and doctrinal functions were imposed on it that the living writers of the living church, the growing writers of the growing church, never could have imagined.

The process of canonization of the New Testament became thus, instead of the unspeakable blessing that it should have been, a lamentable perversion. Where love really reigns laws have been imposed; where emotion and inspiration and poetry prevail cold and hard and heartless dogmas have come in; the place of the Christlike God, the Father of Jesus, has been usurped by the Old Testament monarch God, or a Greek metaphysical One of Three, or worse still if possible, a Roman Caesar God bristling with foreordination and terrible with armies and thunderbolts. The simple, fraternal society of the early church reflected in the New Testament has been elaborated here into a hierarchy, such as the Roman Catholic, and depressed there into a congregationalism and individualism scarcely short of anarchy, and for both sorts abundant texts have been found.

BIBLE'S CHIEF FUNCTION

Somehow or other the New Testament must be taken away from all special pleaders and given back to the humble-minded man of God who seeks in it nothing but the way of childhood and brotherhood, childhood toward God, and brotherhood toward man. Its first and foremost function is to help us on the way to the love of God and the love of man. In that resides Christ's own summary of the law and the prophets. "Except ye become as this little child ye shall by no means enter into the kingdom of heaven." The child, the man, the plowman, the lumberman, the banker, the doctor, who finds with the help of the New Testament "the far Father in the close, sweet Son," has found enough.

Having found God the Father of Jesus there; having found Jesus the brother of man there; having found man the brother of man there; having found there the sermon on the mount and the golden rule; having learned the lessons of the Samaritan, and of the father of the prodigal; having adopted the sisters of Lazarus as his own sisters, and made the mother of Jesus his own mother—the child-like man who has found and learned and done all this has found and learned and done enough.

To be a child of the Father of Jesus and a brother of all the brothers of Jesus is the social ideal of the New Testament. It is the unifying, coordinating force of the New Testament. This must be what the Master had in mind when he prayed that "they all might be one." Surely he could not have thought of sacraments and rituals and philosophies and dogmas and church politics and hierarchies and historic episcopates and the deliverances of councils as functioning in the answer to such a prayer.

ESSENTIALS AND NON-ESSENTIALS

If the New Testament is our best and most precious literary help in the way of reaching the Master, and if the whole spirit and life of the Master has integrating effect; if Jesus lived and loved and died and arose from the grave to create and promote a fraternal "socius" among men under the Fatherhood of God—his God, then whatever militates against such integration of mankind should be frankly confessed as inexpedient and non-essential. And nothing but what is essential should be pressed as a basis of union, or as a factor in a basis of union.

Examples of the misdirection indicated above lie all along the historic highway of the church. They range from the most fantastic deliveries of hopelessly illiterate leaders to the sonorous dogmas of equally hopeless ecclesiastics. One should not shrink from the logic of his own position. The writer is a member of the church of Disciples. He may, therefore, without offense, it is hoped, make a concrete case of his own body of believers.

The Disciples movement began as a plea for the union of all Christians in Christ. As the basis of such union the leaders in the movement bravely proposed the creed of the first Christians and the first church, namely, that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. They advocated and allowed freedom of opinion relative to the various historical formulas of faith. Allowing such freedom it was assumed to be as clear as a mathematical axiom that all Christians could unite in Christ. Working on this basis during about two generations the numerical growth of the Disciples was phenomenal, and the leaven of their advocacy found its way into the whole "lump" of American Christianity.

MAKING A CREED OF THE BOOK

But in an evil day they mistook the function of the New Testament, as indicated above. They made the mistake that hundreds of other denominations have made. They turned from the sublime and sufficient creed of Christ and made a creed of the "the Book." Legalists, literalists and sacramentalists sprang up among them. A considerable wing of them became a church of the "the Book," as though it were not sufficient to be simply the children of God, and brothers of Jesus. They sought New Testament warrants, "chapter and verse," for minute and inconsequential forms of worship, such as the use of instrumental music. They opposed the organization of philanthropic and missionary societies, and of delegate representation in conventions because there was no "chapter and verse" for such things. Out of this unwarranted and unscriptural legalism has come a cleavage. Over two hundred thousand Disciples have disclaimed fellowship with the main body. In practice these Disciples have made opposition to instrumental music in church worship, and opposition to missionary societies, tests of fellowship, and virtually they have added their contentions as clauses to the creed. Beneath this unfortunate cleavage lies the hypothesis of the final and infallible book with final and infallible legislation for the thousand-fold minutiae of churchly life.

Sacramentalism in the matter of immersion-baptism is creating widespread perturbation if indeed it does not threaten to force another cleavage among the Disciples, and the root of the difficulty is in this same mistaken view of the New Testament and its functions. Certain Disciples missionaries in China, India and Africa have been reported as receiving into fellowship certain immersed native Christians from other bodies of believers. The Disciples are a unit in the belief that immersion was, as Dr. Philip Schaff said, "the original, normal form of baptism," and they are a unit in the practice of immersion in the case of primary obedience, though there is a growing practice among the churches of America similar to that reported from the mission field. For the conditions confronting Disciples missionaries today there is no New Testament precedent, or any direct New Testament instruction whatever. There could not be since the New Testament writers had no such conditions with which to deal. But the more legally minded and sacramentally minded branch of the body has demanded that the said missionaries be called to account, and that they be required to conform to the traditional practice of the Disciples at home or be dismissed from service.

AN INFALLIBLE HUMAN CREED

If the matter is pressed the missionaries, who undoubtedly believe with all their hearts in Jesus Christ, will be asked to add, in substance: "And I believe with all my heart in the traditional practice of a majority of the churches of Disciples, infallibly based on their infallible interpretation of the infallible book." Practically this is the situation. It is perfectly clear that the international convention of Disciples in passing the resolution in St. Louis last October calling for such confession on the part of its missionaries departed from its original basis of fellowship and faith. It exalted its practice into a dogma and a test of fellowship by which it proposes to fetter the freedom and lower the dignity of its missionaries. With the St. Louis resolution spread on its minutes the Disciples stand before the religious world as another example of a people starting right and ending wrong, starting simply as believers in Christ, and ending as believers in their own infallibility. By this action the Disciples have invalidated their plea for union on the basis which, to Thomas Campbell and his early coworkers, seemed entirely scriptural and sufficient, namely, faith in and loyalty to the Lord Jesus Christ.

It is not easy to abandon or revise the thought and practice of hundreds of years, but when these have proved inefficient and mischievous there should be a brave effort in the way of correction. The first step in the way of such correction is the emancipation of the church from a mediæval, dogmatic and legalistic use of the Bible as a whole, and more especially of the New Testament. Such emancipation will open the way for the restoration of the church of the Pauline age, that miraculous, new creation of our Lord, founded on faith and love, infused by faith and love, conditioned by faith and love, and doing those things which faith and love prompted. The function of "the word written," its first and highest function, is to lead us on beyond itself to "the Word made flesh," that we may "behold his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."

CORRESPONDENCE

Reducing Christianity to Nonsense

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your correspondent, Mr. Chas. E. Petty, takes issue with me in regard to the quintessential teachings of Jesus and the proper definition of Christian. I am aware that the overwhelming majority of the so-called Christians agree with Mr. Petty. His views are far more comfortable than mine, but they will not bear analysis. I confess to a strong prejudice in favor of clear thinking and precise expression. In old-fashioned, trick diplomacy words are used to conceal thought, but in religious and ethical literature words should be used to express ideas most accurately and exactly. Mr. Petty reminds us that Jesus was an oriental and fond of colorful, rhetorical and exaggerated language. This is true so far as his parables and imagery are concerned. But it is not true and cannot be true with reference to perfectly plain and explicit injunctions and commandments.

We are entitled, says Mr. Petty, to "interpret" the sayings of Jesus as reported in the four Gospels. Yes, when interpretation is necessary. But nullification is reprehensible even in legal decisions. When Jesus said, Resist not evil, and, moreover, pointedly contrasted his commandment with the cruel and vindictive provisions of the Old Testament, he meant exactly what he said. He did not mean that after you have admonished a brother several times you may thrash him within an inch of his life, if he persists in evil doing, or imprison him, or hang him. He did not believe in punishment and did believe in the restraining and healing influence of passive, moral resistance, or physical nonresistance, to evil.

Those who cannot follow him in this respect are not Christians in regard to that issue. They have every right to refuse to follow Jesus in that or any other respect, but it is idle and foolish in them to pretend that they do follow him, or to nullify his commandment by flagrant misinterpretation.

To say that Jesus' way is not the way of our cold, scientific, hard-headed western world is to say, indirectly, that Christianity is an impossible religion for modern western and progressive peoples. This is what Nietzsche and his disciples do say. They say that Christianity is sentimental mush, "slave religion" and "slave morality."

I turn with interest to Mr. Petty's description of the Christian—for I cannot call it definition. He writes: "The spirit of Jesus, the general outlook he entertained of the relationship the race holds to God, the work we have in hand for humanity are quite enough for us to have to make us Christian in theory." Well, the spirit of Jesus is to be found bodied forth in his injunctions and essential teachings—he said so himself. God he regarded as the Father of all mankind, and the work we have in hand for humanity, again, is the work prescribed and ordered in the teachings and sayings of Jesus. There is simply no wriggling out of this conclusion. Either the teachings of Jesus are realizable, or they are not. Either the average human being can accept them and practice them, or he cannot. I said nothing in my letter about "theoretical" Christianity. You might as well speak of theoretical food, or theoretical raiment, or theoretical houses. Religion is something to live by, or it is a set of hollow and meaningless formulas.

I cannot agree with Mr. Petty that it is better to call a man a bad Christian than to state the literal fact that he is not a Christian at all. The world is outgrowing solemn hypocrisy and humbug. Men and women who accept essential Christianity and practice it, or do their utmost to practice it in a non-Christian state and society, are Christians. All the others have no right and no claim to the name Christian. If they would rather be called one per cent Christians, or "bad Christians," many will humor them. Some will not. I am one of the latter. I urge them to summon a little courage and candor and to admit that they are unable to accept Christianity. They may be good citizens, desirable friends, pleasant neighbors, but Christians they are not.

Social Christianity Must Prevail

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I want to express my great satisfaction on reading your splendid editorial in your issue of June 30, entitled "The Church and the Neutral Zone." If that view of the mission of Christ's church does not prevail the Church is doomed to impotency. But it will prevail, for Christ reigns and is working in the minds of his followers, and the church must commit itself unreservedly to his great program for the regeneration of our social and industrial order, as well as to the spiritual welfare of mankind. God bless The Christian Century in its great work.

British Table Talk

A Superficial Calm

London, July, 1921.

THE other day, being on the top of a bus, I heard a voice with an American intonation asking which of the buildings we were passing was the Mansion House. Upon this, we began a long chat of great interest, to me at least. The American proved to be a Canadian doctor who has spent much time in the United States and was familiar both with east and west. Two things had struck him forcibly: One, the drinking habits which still persist here and seemed to him a survival from a dark past. Upon prohibition he had not the smallest doubt; it was in his judgment a great and salutary reform. The other, the curious calm of a country which was passing through a grave industrial crisis. The calm is here, but it is not certain that it is a good sign. There is the calm of faith and there is the calm which goes with decay and death. It may be that we are quiet because we are sure that we have great reserves upon which we can call, and that all will be well. It may be that we are calm because we do not know how serious is our sickness. It was a solemn word of Isaiah to his people, "My people go into captivity and they know it not." Probably there are both kinds of calm at the present moment in this nation. On the surface they seem alike, but they are as far apart as life and death.

Collier of Manchester

When a church, moved by a living faith, boldly enters upon new paths of service, it is certain that the necessary leaders will not be wanting. The Wesleyan Methodist church has shown audacity in the building of its central missions. These without doubt make a demand for ministers with certain gifts, with powers of organization as well as a popular appeal in their preaching. There was wanted a host of men and women with something of the popular preacher and something of the Gordon Selfridge in their make-up. These were needed and they were found. It would not be hard to name a score of such men who have led these enterprises: Hugh Price Hughes, Wiseman G. Jackson, Benson, Bisseker, Aldom French Gautrey and many others whose work is well known and approved. But it may be taken for granted that all these men would declare that the greatest of their order was Collier of Manchester. He was the first of them, for as long ago as 1885 he began the life work which now death has ended. The Manchester Mission was an achievement of which any church would be proud. Every year it was Collier's way to start at least one new departure in service. Around him he had gathered a body of gifted workers. He knew how to select his staff and how to part graciously with any who did not get into his work. It seemed to the outsider a very big organization, but it was built and sustained upon a most diligent and continuous care for its individual members. It was anything but impersonal. This is one of the secrets of either a mission or a church. The individual member must not be lost in the crowd. It should be a Christian axiom, but it is sometimes forgotten. Collier and his workers kept in touch with the individual soul; that made the mission sound. He was honored by the conference of his own church, but he had an ever greater honor from his own people in Manchester, and especially from the poor and the forgotten. It was my privilege to speak with him only once, and that was at a social party where some music was being given. He was pleasant and kindly in his bearing to a young minister, but during the music he seemed far away in the heart of Manchester. Such men only do their life work by making it their one concern.

Will Crooks, too, is dead. The tribute paid to this working man of Poplar was one worthy of a king. A man like that raises the question whether many reformers do not lose much through their lack of humanity and the honor that goes with it. Will Crooks won his way to all hearts, partly because he loved human beings and never lost sight of them in the pursuit of

"causes," and partly because he knew how to make men laugh. It is a pity that chronology did not suffer Will Crooks to know Charles Dickens. Crooks would have been a man after the novelist's own heart. He would have said, "I wish I had thought of him."

Washington in St. Paul's

It will not be necessary to recount what must be familiar news to the readers of The Christian Century that a bust of George Washington has been given to us and most gratefully placed within the crypt of St. Paul's. The gift was a happy and gracious inspiration which came to the American members of the Sulgrave Institution. And now among our honored dead will be the name of the great soldier and statesman who fought our fathers in a cause which was not only the cause of America, but no less our own. Washington by his fight against us won freedom for us no less than for America. It is often given to "The Times" to say the true word and to say it in noble accents. Let these words stand as the master-thought of our people:

"The simple ceremony at St. Paul's must stir the hearts and the imaginations of all who speak our tongue throughout the world. England and America met under the noblest dome since Michael Angelo's to honor the first President of the great Republic beyond the ocean and the gallant dead who, in the hour of our direst need, came home to give their lives for his cause and for ours. Those of them who are with us sleep in no strange soil."

The World Their Parish

Once a year the representatives of most of the British Missionary Societies meet for counsel at Swanwick. Among them there is, as I have shown before, a striking and effective committee and the program to which they will address themselves at these meetings (June 15 and 17) is a most varied one. If a missionary enthusiast of a generation ago were to come back, he would be surprised and even staggered by the interests of the modern statesmen. The scout movement, the use of the cinema, the study of moral hygiene, the publication of "Outward Bound," that excellent monthly magazine, and a host of other things in the reports and on the agenda suggest that the missionary societies in carrying the gospel into all the world have found themselves involved in a scene of extraordinary and bewildering variety, in a human scene to which there are a thousand approaches. The conference is not public, nor are its sessions reported, but it is known that its serious attention must be given to the problem of education, as it is provided by the societies in non-Christian countries. Now that governments are more and more taking up this work, there are serious questions to be faced. The standards in many schools must be raised. The question of a "conscience clause" must be faced and settled. The very word has associations for us in the memory of old unhappy educational wrangles. In India there is a demand, how widespread it is hard to tell, that students in mission schools and colleges should be exempted, if their parents wish it, from religious teaching. Upon this issue the missionaries are not of one mind. Some are willing to grant the "conscience clause"; others, rather than grant it, would forfeit all government assistance. Upon this there is certain to be a full discussion. Upon other matters, such as labor in East Africa, the conference will deliberate, but it must not be overlooked that such questions of application arise out of deep spiritual concern, and all through the work of such a conference there will be a recognition of the all-important business which is committed to its trust—the business of the kingdom of God. But if anyone were to seek for the circles in which the kingdom of God in the breadth of its reign is most eagerly hailed and loved, he would find the thing he sought among the missionary enthusiasts.

Church Life in Summer

There is a lull in many church activities from June till late in September. It should not be a lull without meaning and value. There is time for review and consideration. When we are in the thick of our winter's work, we may lose the fine proportions. "We learn to skate in summer and to swim in winter." There is indeed great wisdom in the right use of the pause. Christ knew how to use it. It was not in Galilee that the great confession of Simon Peter was made, but in the parts of Cæsarea Philippi. Nor should the church of Christ neglect the healing to be found in nature. There is at least one newspaper in this country which will always be true to the great ideals of human life: that is "The Children's Newspaper." Under the heading, "Into the Quiet Places," this wise and interesting journal had words the other day to which others besides rulers and senators might give heed:

"We believe that there awaits us at the end of our journey through this world a glory greater yet; but if when it comes we find that Heaven is like a summer day by a babbling brook, or in some mead aglow with buttercups, or in a garden on a Kent hilltop, we shall be satisfied. To those who rule so much of our lives on earth, who make our laws and make our wars; to those who stir up trouble; to those who keep alive the hate that does more harm to those who cherish it than it can ever do to those who suffer it—to all these we would say: Get ye apart into the quiet places, and learn the lesson that on every wind is blown."

Notes and Observations

Dr. David is to be the Bishop of Edmundsbury and Ipswich. This is a wise appointment on many grounds. Dr. David has been a great head master. In the attempt to give a new direction to religious education, he has taken a leading part. He is a man from whose character and wisdom much will be expected. One by one the ranks of the bishops are being strengthened by the men to whom the student world has learned to look with trust and affection and hope. Woods of Peterborough, Temple of Manchester, now David of Ipswich, are men who have not failed to keep the next generation in hail. They are, moreover, men whose knowledge of free churchmen is not second-hand. They are in close fellowship with many who are not Anglicans; this fact, too, will help.

The Regent's Park Baptist Church, of which Rev. F. C. Spurr is the minister, must close its doors. This is not because its work is done or its ministry is unheeded. Mr. Spurr is a singularly living and interesting preacher and the church has a place still in the life of London, but the lease has fallen in and the Crown as ground landlord demands a rent of 950 pounds and a premium of 600 pounds. This is legal, but it seems none the less folly for the nation to exact its pound of flesh from religious society whose only purpose is to supply the very thing without which the nation will perish. There are other economies which might be tried first.

The Salvation Army has been in session with a great muster of its people from all over the world. It is an international power not to be despised in the councils of the world. It was cheering to see in London the familiar uniform with "l'armée du salut" for the legend. In the chronology of the army published in its year book, there are these two entries: "1844 Catherine Mumford, converted, William Booth, converted." In 1921 the Army called into service by these two apostles has its warriors in seventy-two countries and publishes eighty periodicals which are read from east to west. The sun never sets upon that Army.

The Rotary Club idea has taken root here and we now have clubs in London and Manchester, in Dublin and Belfast, and there are already over 4,000 members. They may do much to keep alive the only true ideal of business life, that a man's first concern is to render service to the community and not merely to himself.

"The younger generation," says Dr. A. Herbert Gray, "ask us almost with one voice that the churches should lower their dogmatic threshold, but they are entirely willing that the churches should greatly heighten their moral threshold."

BOOKS

CHILDREN BY CHANCE OR BY CHOICE, by William Hawley Smith. The author of this courageous volume made himself famous a quarter of a century ago with his "Evolution of Dodd." He advocates just what the title states in this book. Man has applied choice, through knowledge and reason and the discovery of science, to every other human interest, why not to the reproduction of the species? The wise and well-to-do almost universally control the number of children they have—why not put the same knowledge scientifically into the hands of the ignorant and poor who are so much less able to support large families and so much less capable of educating their children? There would be a great moral gain in bringing children into the world through rational choice instead of through animal instinct merely; it would take a load off the already overburdened mothers who have too many to care for. The author believes it would raise sex to a higher level, save much family irritation that comes through fear of wives who dread another baby's coming, children thrice blessed through a rational planning for their advent. He finds in sex, as in every other natural appetite, something more than mere gratification; just as the eye blesses with love of beauty, and the ear with appreciation of sweet sound and the taste with all that surrounds the social board, so sex should bless that "affectional" side of our spiritual natures which, like the other senses, contribute to the "human plus," i. e. that which elevates us above our animal natures. In other words he asks 'why keep sex on the physical level when every other sense is elevated to the æsthetic and spiritual'? This he believes a rationalization of it out of "children by chance" to "children by choice." (Gorham).

THE GOSPEL AND THE PLOW, by Sam Higginbottom. "As interesting as a novel" would not adequately describe this personal account of the work of the best known missionary in all India. The masses in India live on three cents per day apiece and debt is omnipresent. What hope is there for education, democracy or social progress under such economic conditions? Mr. Higginbottom thinks it a Christian thing to teach them how to make two bodies of wheat grow where one grew before and to thus elevate a nation from poverty into a chance to live. His path has not been all roses, but he knows how to handle the thorns. His story is great as biography as well as a source book in a civilizing process and a study in the use of social methods in missionary work. (Macmillan).

CHURCH FINANCE AND SOCIAL ETHICS, by Bishop Francis J. McConnell. It would be as sensible to try to stamp out typhoid by treating individual sufferers as to cure society's ills by simply inducing men to join the church. There are social wrongs that engulf men and it is the church's business to stamp out all such evil. Such evil is usually commercialized, therefore the system that profits must be attacked. But it is not all so definitely divorced from legitimate business that it can be isolated. Thus profit makers often protest attack upon impinging evils. It is the church's business to make the ethical differentiations. Big business may offer "tainted" money and demand silence, but little business differs from big only in size; it is therefore essentially a question of business ethics and pulpit freedom. As the church increases her investments and her income through great "drives" she must define her policy as an employer, investor and spender. Will she join ordinary business in its ethics or become a model to it? Yesterday business controlled law making, today it seeks to control public opinion. The church's function is that of controlling public opinion with an enlightened good-conscience; no other evangelism is effective. It is freer today than is the press with its dependence upon advertising, but it faces the question of obligation to carry out a donor's will when it accepts his money. It must stand for conscience and freedom and keep its prophetic voice and must therefore scrutinize all conditions upon which gifts are made. This may compel it to turn from dependence upon great sums from a few to great numbers of small sums through the cultivation of stewardship and the every-member canvass, but that will be a better way. Bishop McConnell writes with his usual logic and clarity in this latest of his many excellent books. (Macmillan).

THE NEGRO MIGRANT IN PITTSBURGH, by Abraham Epstein. What is happening to the negro as a social being as he comes North in increasing numbers, leaving the little farms in the South for the cities in the North? Mr. Epstein made a study in the industrial centers of Pittsburgh. He found them living in tenements and rooming houses, moving often, crowded into one room family quarters or several boarders in a single room, and still more coming. His wage increased and also his hours, his illness and his delinquency. As ever greater numbers come North they bring more problems than those of race friction—they become strike-breakers, tend downward toward crime and increase bad living conditions. This is not because they come North but because they come into industrial cities. The farm and the open country is the best place to work out negro redemption. THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

IN the study of great men we sometimes overlook the function of some seemingly lesser man, without whom the great man would not have attained his proud position. Several years had elapsed since the dazzling and sudden conversion of Paul. There is rather vague evidence that Paul spent several months in Arabia, brooding, thinking his way into the new situation, even as Jesus did during his temptations in the wilderness. After this he went to Jerusalem where he was treated coldly by the apostolic college. This experience caused him to withdraw into himself, to evolve his own gospel and to speak rather bitterly, as in Galatians, of his treatment in Jerusalem. There can be no doubt but that the great apostles gave him the cold shoulder. It was part of his penalty for having been a persecutor of the church. One does not recover from sins in a minute and the penalties last for long. You can see that Paul's career seemed blocked by his Jerusalem experience. He therefore went back to his old home in Tarsus and our scant knowledge of those days would lead us to believe that he was earnestly endeavoring to win converts to his new faith, with how much success we do not know. This period of Paul's life was a critical one; he felt isolated, lonely. The early persecutions drove the Christians who had been centering about the Holy City as far as Phœnicia and Asia Minor. Quite a group came to Antioch and set about building up a congregation. Jerusalem wished to aid this struggling group and Barnabas went up to cheer them on their way. Barnabas was a fine spirit. He was generous, first of all. When he gave himself to the Lord he threw in all of his wealth. Body and soul he was dedicated to the new Way. We think of him as a mild, good man. You would say that he would never set the world on fire and yet it was he who found and brought the flaming torch that did set the world ablaze. We can understand this better when we recall that he was a man of faith. Quiet and steady, not easily excited over good fortune nor quickly cast down by misfortune, trusting solidly in God and believing the teachings of Jesus with perfect faith, he was just the man to see a great future in Antioch and to believe that Paul would make a successful leader for this new church away from Jerusalem. However, we must not infer that this quiet man was powerless in securing new converts. Perhaps he was not a great preacher. His sermons were not eloquent with the oratory of an Apollos, but there was the man behind the message and the people were drawn to him and they were made to believe that he was right. "Much people was added unto the Lord"—that is a mighty tribute to this gentle, generous, faithful man.

The biggest thing that Barnabas ever did was to re-discover Paul. He knew something of this fire-brand. He had faith in him. As he saw the vast opportunity to build up a strong church in Antioch, his mind turned to Paul. He believed that Paul had the fervor and the experience to stir that city from center to circumference. It took bravery to go after Paul, for the church at Jerusalem had very fixed ideas, as we know. It took bigness of soul to go after Paul, for Barnabas might easily have made himself the bishop of Antioch and have held the city in the palm of his hand. It took largeness of vision to go after Paul and only a man who could see what the possibilities of Antioch were would have undertaken that journey. But Barnabas brought Paul to Antioch and Paul performed wonders there. But we must not get away from our central idea here. It would be natural to follow Paul now and forget the quiet man who was responsible for all this work. Thus it is that many who seem last shall be first when the real values are computed. This lesson ought to be dedicated to Barnabas—the man who found another man. Andrew did that. It is a great thing to find a man and bring him to Jesus. After all, what can be more important than with a gentle heart and a true soul to find another man and bring him into relation to Our Lord? We have the Order of St. Andrew, why not have the Order of St. Barnabas?

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Dr. Fosdick Strong for World Peace

The Christian pulpit is speaking out with ever greater boldness these days in the matter of world peace. Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick in the First Presbyterian church of New York recently delivered an outspoken address on war and civilization. He asserted that the two cannot long travel together. He said in part: "The church, all too feebly recognizing the irreconcilable conflict between war and the spirit of Jesus, has, for all that, at her best been endeavoring to restrain war, to abolish its worst barbarities, to limit its area, and to bring, where it could, the truce of God. Before 1914 some kinds of war had been done away—religious wars, for example, that during so many centuries devastated Europe. Throughout the nineteenth century there was a growing apprehension about the crisis toward which humanity was drifting. During the first fifty years of the nineteenth century practically nothing was said about arbitration treaties. During the first ten years of the twentieth century ninety-six international arbitration treaties were signed. And before that fateful day of August, 1914, the Hague peace conferences had been desperately endeavoring to trim the claws of war with rules and regulations that might protect the wounded and noncombatants and limit the methods of killing. All of these things have proved to be futile enough in practical effect, yet they are valuable as prophecy. They indicate that humanity for a long time has dimly perceived what now we are fools if we do not clearly see: that war and civilization are diametrically opposed; that we can have one or the other, but not for very long can we have both."

Reformed Jews Create a Tractarian Literature

While the Christians are forming societies to bring Christian truth to the Jews, the Reformed Jewish leaders are creating a tractarian literature to bring the truths of Judaism to their Gentile neighbors. The Union of American Hebrew Congregations and the Central Conference of American Rabbis are responsible for the new movement. Dr. H. G. Enelow, rabbi of Temple Amanu-El of New York City, has written a very lucid tract on "What Do Jews Believe?" This tract makes a denial of a number of Christian doctrines such as the Trinity, a personal Messiah, a personal devil, original sin, heaven and hell. The positive message of reformed Judaism is well summed up by Dr. Enelow in the following words: "Such in brief are the Jewish beliefs. The Unity and Holiness of God, the goodness of the world, the divine nature and immortality of the human soul, and the possibility of its communion with God, the consecration of human life; these ideas are the foundation on which Judaism was builded. Moreover, we believe in the election of Israel as a means to an end, the end being the diffusion of those ideas among all men and the ultimate reform of human life in accord with them. Whenever this has come true, it will mean the kingdom of God on earth, the fulfillment of Israel's highest ideal."

Ministers Hit Back at Colonel Harvey

The ministers of the country resent Colonel Harvey's recent speech in London in which he repudiates any idea of American idealism in connection with the world war. From the point of view of the ministers, this speech is entirely out of accord with thousands of Americans who made patriotic offerings in behalf of liberty and civilization. Among those who have taken the American ambassador at the Court of St. James to task is Rev. J. J. Castleberry of Walnut Hills Christian church, Cincinnati. In a sermon reported at length in the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune, he says: "What, then, is the soul of America—her unique sense of mission, her dominant passion, the lines along which she must achieve her destiny? In a word, the soul of America is discovered in her exalted idealism. It is her honor and keen sensitiveness to right and wrong; it is her passion for justice and fair play; it is her hot hate of despotism and courage in smiting evil wherever found; it is her conviction that right makes might and that principle is more powerful than armies and navies. America is the most idealistic nation on earth, and, Colonel Harvey to the contrary, we went into the world war not to save ourselves, but for the sake of an ideal. Our distinguished ambassador misconceives America's attitude and misinterprets her spirit. It is unjust to the memory of Quentin Roosevelt, along with thousands of other brave American boys who sleep in France today, to attribute their action either to self-seeking or fear. It was the passion of freedom and righteousness burning in their breasts which led them to heroic sacrifice and death. Yes, destroy idealism in America, and despite our brilliant achievements and prosperity, the nation is doomed."

Evangelism Receives Renewed Emphasis

The great Protestant denominations are winning converts once more and most of them report for the Easter season this year the greatest ingathering in the history of the organizations. The Federal Council Commission on Evangelism has gathered statistics from most of the denominations and has also made inquiry with regard to their methods. In the latter there seems to be a growing diversity. The Northern Baptist Convention has put a superintendent of evangelism into eleven states. It is the hope to extend this supervision to every state in which the convention operates. The Easter ingathering of this denomination was 150,000. In the Southern Baptist church (which now calls itself the National Baptist church) the emphasis has been upon pastoral evangelism. It is estimated that during the year 200,000 accessions have been made to the churches. The "Christian denomination" which has headquarters at Dayton, Ohio, and which has in recent years reported a continually decreasing membership, reports a net gain in membership of ten per cent. The Congregational churches have a plan of parish evangelism which has been accepted by a majority of churches. More people have joined this group of churches than in any previous year of its history. The superintendent of evangelism among the Disciples of Christ is responsible for the statement that the greatest evangelistic results in the history of the denomination have been secured during the past year. Many Disciples churches still use the revivalistic method, but there is a growing emphasis on personal work. The Methodist Episcopal church has been training personal workers. The net increase in membership for the last reported year was 182,338. In the Methodist Episcopal church South where emphasis has been laid on rural evangelism 279,000 members have been received into the churches. The Presbyterian church has been sending pastors to churches other than their own for evangelistic service. The church reported an increase in membership for the past year of 124,000. Southern Presbyterians rejoice in the largest gain in their history. United Presbyterians have laid the emphasis upon the family altar and prayer. They have received 10,356 new members. The Episcopal church has a committee on the holding of missions. There is a very eager spirit in this church as regards recruiting.

Tenth Anniversary of Minister Celebrated

The anniversary of a minister's service is not often interpreted by the press as a significant community event. But the editor of the Atlanta Georgian, one of the strongest papers of the south, makes long editorial comment upon the completion of ten years' service in Atlanta by Dr. L. O. Bricker, pastor of First Christian church. He speaks these words of tribute at the conclusion of a full column editorial. "And there are no limits to our future improvement—thanks to our inborn love of what is right and to the steady influence of education—and men of God like L. O. Bricker. And so, if, in setting forth to consider the happy incident of the tenth anniversary of Doctor Bricker as a pastor in Atlanta, you have been led this Saturday evening to contemplate some of the thoughts Doctor Bricker has engendered in the mind of one who has come to know him and to love him, then this Saturday evening journey perhaps has been worth while. Every Atlantan will wish for Doctor Bricker happy returns of this blessed anniversary. May he continue long among us, to encourage us, with the sweetness of his presence and through his fine personality, to the bright, cheerful and happy view of life, which somehow always seems so appealing and powerful for good."

Knight of Columbus Will Spend a Million

The Knights of Columbus are arranging to spend a million dollars during the coming year in behalf of the education of former service men. The educational enthusiasm is spreading throughout the Roman Catholic church. Some departments of a new university will be opened at Chicago in September. The buildings just outside the city at Techny are being rushed to completion for use in the early autumn.

Canadian Presbyterians Honor Noted Novelist

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian church of Canada met at Toronto this year. Dr. C. W. Gordon, the noted novelist, known better as Ralph Connor, was elected moderator. There is a membership in Canada of 350,000 and these had a congregational income last year of six million dollars, which is a fifteen per cent increase over the income of the previous year. One of the important decisions arrived at was to establish a minimum salary for the ministry, which was fixed at $1,800 per year.

Mexican Churches in United States a Success

The rapid increase in Mexican immigration to the United States has been a challenge to the home mission societies of every denomination. The Disciples have a flourishing Mexican church at Kansas City. Three Presbyterian churches have been organized among these people with a total membership of 506. Of this number 126 are tithers, a very adequate test of the extent of their devotion to their newly-found church. The three Presbyterian churches have made a gain in membership the past year of a little over seventeen per cent, indicating their evangelical quality.

Lutherans Embarrassed with Too Many Seminaries

The United Lutheran church finds that following the union of its constituent denominations it has too many theological seminaries. There are two in Chicago, and twelve in the entire country. It is proposed that some consolidations take place. The official journal, the Lutheran, is gravely concerned over seminaries that have independent boards of trustees, and by implication heretical professors. It is believed that only by direct control over the seminaries by the church can they be saved from the inroads of any modernistic position.

Presbyterians Grow in Chicago

Metropolitan churches are hard to build but the Presbyterians seem to have discovered the secret in Chicago. They admitted last year 3,185 new members on examination to their 104 churches. The presbytery composed of Chicago and suburbs now has 40,362 members, the largest in the history of the presbytery. The Sunday schools enrol 33,878, which is a gain of 1,767 over the previous year. Congregational expenses amounted to $896,878, a large gain over the previous year.

Better Relations Between the Races

In Richmond, Va., at the recent meeting of the Women's Missionary Council of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, the report of the commission on race relationships was received with vivid interest. An appropriation of $5,000 was made to defray the expenses of the commission in arousing interest among the women of their church in behalf of colored women and children; and in cooperating with other white organizations, with negroes and with interracial committees throughout the south to better conditions for the race.

From Sunday School Teacher to Missionary

Miss Anna M. Bille, after graduating from Leland Stanford University, went to Honolulu to teach in the government schools there. Becoming interested in a Chinese Sunday school connected with a Disciples church she became known as one of the most successful of the Chinese teachers of the islands. Her interest in her religious work grew until she volunteered for missionary work in China. She sailed recently from her island home to go to Nantungchow, where she will teach in a college. She carried with her many tokens of love from the Honolulu church.

New Plan for Communion Followed

In Disciples churches the practice of weekly communion prevails, as in Episcopal churches. It has been the almost invariable practice to celebrate the holy communion in connection with the morning service. East End church in Pittsburgh has in its membership a substantial number of workmen who cannot attend the morning service, and consequently never have opportunity to share in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. For these an occasional evening service

Christian Endeavor Holds Great Convention

THE convention of the world Christian Endeavor organization held in New York was enthusiastic in spite of the heat and other adverse conditions. The reports of the activities for the past two years show a continued advance on the part of the organization. Edward P. Gates, the general secretary, issued a report which was bristling with facts and which will entirely confute those doubters who have asserted that the movement has seen its best days. Mr. Gates said: "Christian Endeavor is growing. Nine thousand two hundred and thirty-eight new Christian Endeavor societies have been organized in the past two years. Losses in societies and membership due to war conditions have been more than made up. There are more Christian Endeavor societies today throughout the world than ever before in the history of the movement. The total Christian Endeavor membership is larger. Christian Endeavor is represented in more denominations than ever before. More nations are included in our world-wide fellowship."

As the veteran president, Dr. F. E. Clark, grows in age he grows in the hearts of the young people. He gave a presidential address which reviewed the tried and true methods of the organization. Having completed this task he sounded the keynote for the coming years. He emphasized the following lines of activity:

"First. The better grading of our societies, so that wherever possible there shall be Junior, Intermediate, Senior societies and Alumni Councils.

"Second. Closer and more vital relations with pastor, church, and denomination promoted by the pastor's active membership, wherever possible, by the pastor's closing five minutes in the prayer meeting; by a pastor's use of committees and members who shall be at his beck and call for any service; by an Alumni Council in every church, composed of Endeavor graduates and older friends. Let this closer relationship also be promoted by increased emphasis on attendance on church services; by cooperation in denominational and local church plans which our pledge demands, including denominational history and doctrines; by leadership training classes; and by efforts to obtain recruits for life work or part time Christian service. Our efficiency chart will admirably record our efforts to reach these goals.

"Third. Let our third goal be more emphasis upon religion in the home. Let us magnify Christian standards within the home; let us embody Christian principles in our conduct and service within the home; let us through Bible study, prayer, the family altar, etc., help make the home an agency of constructive Christian training.

"Fourth and last, but not least, more emphasis on personal stewardship, remembering that 'stewardship' is a word of very wide import, and relates to our duties, to our community and our country, as well as to God. Here are two searching questions that stewardship involves:

"Is your society faithful to the four ages which it may influence

"Is it faithful to our principles of testimony, proportionate giving, service, church loyalty, Christian citizenship and fellowship?

"There is a significant verse in one of the epistles of Peter speaking of the disciples as 'stewards of the manifold grace of God.' That is just what a Christian Endeavor society is. It is a steward of manifold grace."

is arranged when the communion table is set. At these quiet evening services no effort is made to secure an unusual attendance, but only those who truly desire to participate in the communion.

Union Theological College Has a Good Class

The commencement day of Union Theological College of Chicago on June 6 was a happy day for all friends of the institution. Several of the forty students received the degree of bachelor of theology, this being the first year this degree has been granted. The institution is designed to take students for the ministry with only a high school education and give them a combination of the liberal arts and theological disciplines. The theological instruction is modern. Most of the undergraduate institutions teach antiquated views of the Bible and Christian doctrine. The school was founded five years ago, and, as its name suggests, it is hoped to make it a school with an interdenominational constituency, though it is using the buildings formerly owned by the Chicago Theological Seminary of the Congregationalists. The board of trustees is headed by Dr. W. E. Barton of Oak Park. Rev. J. A. Jenkins is president.

Ministers Gather at Union Seminary

Over a hundred ministers gathered at Union Seminary this year for a two weeks conference, beginning July 11. While many of these ministers are from New York and New England, some of them come from remote parts, one hailing from Wyoming. The opening session on Monday evening was addressed by Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin.

Disciples of Texas Wage a Losing Fight

Rev. H. E. Beckler, who is carrying on a campaign for educational endowment in Texas for the Disciples of Christ, is responsible for some very astonishing statistics. He asserts that 126 Disciples churches of Texas were closed, sold or abandoned last year. This is a twenty per cent loss. A few years ago there were 164,000 Disciples in Texas. This number has dwindled to 52,000. The lack of trained leadership is assigned as a reason for this situation. No doubt there are other contributing causes. The defection of the anti-organ people to form a separate denomination is one factor. Also the lack of organization and oversight among Disciples churches is a fatal weakness, especially in the carrying on of rural work under modern conditions.

Pastor Ends a Twenty-Year Service

Rev. George Whiteside, pastor of First United Presbyterian church of Evanston, Ill., is ending a twenty-year service in that city. He has accepted a call to United Presbyterian church of Thompsonville, Conn. Mr. Whiteside took a mission church twenty years ago and has made of it a self-supporting church significant in the life of the denomination. During the past year he attended the World Sunday School Convention in Japan, and later made an inspection of mission stations in the orient. Since that time he has been in much demand for missionary addresses.

Chicago Disciples Kept Busy in Summertime

Chicago Disciples are keeping up their activities in spite of the torrid summer. Dr. E. S. Ames continues in his pulpit at University church and speaks to audiences which tax the capacity of his building. Jackson Boulevard church is seeking a pastor with a succession of supply preachers in its pulpit. A number of churches are conducting vacation Bible schools with large enrollments. Among these are Douglas Park church, Monroe Street Federated church, Russian Mission and Austin church. The Disciples Club of Chicago has not been satisfied to be inactive during the summer months and on the evening of July 12 took three hundred people out on the lake for a moonlight excursion. The evening was informal, with the young people in the great majority in the crowd, though most of the ministers were there.

Ministers Hold a Retreat

The Protestant ministers of Findlay, O., recently held a retreat in First Methodist Church which proved to be of great edification to all who were present. Dr. James S. McGaw of Pittsburgh was secured to lead the program of the day. He is one of the secretaries of the National Reform Association. It was recognized by those present at the retreat that the life of the ministers these days is full of many details and there is need at times to get back to the fundamentals of the spiritual life. The crowning experience of the day was the celebration of the Lord's Supper. A few ministers present were bound by denominational

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffeine contained in each:

Black tea —1 cupful.....	1.54 gr.
(hot) (5 fl. oz.)
Green tea —1 glassful.....	2.02 gr.
(cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice)
Coca-Cola —1 drink, 8 fl. oz.....	.61 gr.
(prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup)

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

rule not to partake of the elements at a strange altar, but even these did not absent themselves. They were assured by the others that the bond of fellowship was by no means broken by these conscientious scruples. At the evening hour laymen of the city were invited in to dinner, and Dr. McGaw delivered an address on "What Christ Has for a Man."

Laymen Fill Pulpit During July

The Sunday evening service is being made attractive at Warren, Ohio, during the month of July by the use of laymen as the speakers at the Disciples church. A business man, an abstractor, an attorney and the superintendent of the public schools will speak on succeeding Sunday evenings. The business man has the suggestive topic: "Merchandise or Waste Paper—What Are You Here For?"

Hawaiian Pastor Secures Resignation of Big Official

The Hawaiian Islands present unique problems by reason of the diversity of the population. These islands have a large Japanese population which makes a vile native drink in spite of the eighteenth amendment. Recently it came to the attention of Rev. H. V. White, pastor of the Disciples church of Honolulu, that a prominent official was smuggling liquor to the shore from ocean liners. This man had once been apprehended by one of his own subordinates. The brave pastor gave his facts publicly in a sermon printed in a local paper, with the result that public opinion brought about the resignation of the officer. An Anti-Saloon League has been organized in the islands with five hundred members, and this organization will endeavor to secure respect for the laws of the United States.

Pastor Cannot Find Jobs for His People

Thousands are out of work in Pittsburgh and Rev. John Ray Ewers in a recent issue of his parish paper, "Progress," draws some conclusions with regard to the situation. He says: "A sure indication of hard times is to be found in the fact that men and women apply to the pastor for work. This only happens in periods of depression. He has tried earnestly to find positions but never has been so unsuccessful. Everyone replies, 'We have no work' or 'We are discharging people, not hiring them.' In one part of the city a young man told us that he saw, daily, groups of men, now out of work, devouring pieces of bread—it was all they had for a day. Not only in China and Armenia are people hungry—they are hungry in Pittsburgh."

Aged Bishop Revered by Episcopalians

Though in one of the less important dioceses of the country, Bishop Tuttle of St. Louis is now the ranking bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in point of service. He has consecrated 82 of 315 bishops of the church. He recently visited the city of Denver where he was welcomed by a band, a motor parade and a speech by the mayor. In his responses he gave reminiscences of a previous visit to that city fifty years ago. He landed in a stage coach with a rifle in his hand and knelt in thanksgiving to Almighty God for his safe journey from Nebraska. He is now so aged that many of the responsibilities which he formerly carried are delegated to others, but he still travels and speaks in various sections of the country, since he is the foremost of all the bishops of his communion, primus inter pares. Bishop Gailor of Tennessee, the bishop next in rank, has in recent years assumed many of the arduous duties that formerly devolved upon the noted ecclesiastic of Missouri.

Growing Missionary Spirit in Disciples Churches

The sending out of fifty new missionaries to foreign fields this autumn has been a challenge to a number of the Disciples churches. Third church of Indianapolis formerly had one "living link" missionary on the foreign field. They have recently voted to assume the support of three more at a cost of a thousand dollars a year each. Throughout the communion there has been a revival of interest in the foreign field through the aggressive program of the United Christian Missionary Society.

Churches Lead in Fourth of July Celebration

In many parts of the country Fourth of July is degenerating into a carnival day. The commercialized amusement interests take advantage of the day for the purpose of making large earnings. The local leadership is often lacking for a community celebration of the great patriotic holiday. At Williamsburg, Va., this year the churches took the initiative in arranging a good old-fashioned Fourth of July celebration with music and addresses. Rev. James A. Crain, executive secretary of the Norfolk Church Federation, spoke. Later in the afternoon there were competitive games for the young people of the community.

Dr. Mudge Accepts Office of Stated Clerk

At the time of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church at Winona Lake, Dr. Lewis Seymour Mudge had not definitely accepted the office of stated clerk of the assembly to which he had been elected. It is now announced that he will accept the office, and will begin his duties some time in the course of the coming year. He is pastor of a large church and justice to this congregation demands that due consideration be given to its welfare.

Travel Around the World With New Testaments

Rev. George T. B. Davis is spending three years traveling around the world in the interest of the Pocket New Testament League. His organization put him under this commission some time ago. In the autumn he will sail for Sydney, Australia. In his party will be Miss Bertha Beebe, Dr. George C. Cossar and Mrs. E. A. R. Davis. The organization has the task of pledging Christians to carry a pocket new testament and the books are supplied. Dr. Cossar is an enthusiastic worker in the movement and he has already sent out over 700,000 copies of the gospels in various languages.

Congregational National Council

(By Our Own Correspondent)

THE professional pessimist and the ecclesiastical calamity critic found no satisfaction in the Congregational National Council just held at Los Angeles. It faced frankly the problems common to all denominations and fearlessly planned for the duties ahead. The forward steps taken in the organization of the Congregational World Movement two years ago at Grand Rapids were conserved by a more compact alignment. A notable spirit of unity and determined purpose prevailed. It was a big achievement to take more than 300 delegates across the desert, in the midsummer heat, during the vacation period, so far away from the geographical center of Congregationalism. "The City of the Angels" was like the promised land! Having a population of 11,000 in 1880; over 100,000 in 1900; and 611,000 in 1920; getting its waters through the longest conduit in America, 258 miles in length, and large enough to supply water for two million people; having 3425 manufacturing establishments with a monthly payroll of $11,000,000; the center of the world's "movie" industry; Los Angeles is a miracle of nature and of human achievement. It furnished a magnificent setting for a great spiritual vision.

The program of the Council was built upon the idea of "the spirit of Christ organizing the world," in every department of its life. It found its inspiration in the words of heroic Thomas Chalmers: "Nothing is too good to hope for, which the divine goodness has promised, and nothing is impossible which God has asked the church to perform." The stated reports showed substantial progress on the program since the meeting two years ago. Over two millions of dollars more have been raised during the last year than in any preceding year for missionary, educational and benevolent purposes, within the denomination. This brings the per capita giving of $1.72 in 1910 up to $3.38 in 1920. The net gain in church membership was over 10,000 last year; in Sunday school membership over 15,000. The evangelistic note has been widely sounded and but for the unusually large loss of over 60,000 members through death, dismissal and revision of the roll, the net gain would have been still more striking. The Congregational World

Movement has been very successful. For administrative reasons it was merged with the Commission on Missions and the latter doubled in membership. This was one outstanding action of the Council. This commission will continue to carry on the C. W. M. plans; to coordinate the work of the denomination, its boards and societies; and seek to further the highest spiritual progress and efficiency. Intense interest centered in the election of a new general secretary to succeed the late lamented Dr. Hubert C. Herring. Dr. Patton, of the entertaining church, and Dr. Charles Emerson Burton, of New York, the secretary of the Church Extension Board, were nominated. Under the rule requiring a two-thirds vote to elect, Dr. Burton was chosen on the first ballot. He has had testing experience as a pastor, secretary and administrator, is widely acquainted in his own and other denominations, and possesses the confidence of the churches. He brings to his new work a modesty, an experience, an ability and a spiritual passion which promise fruitful leadership. After thirty-four years' active connection with The Congregationalist, as associate editor and editor-in-chief, Dr. Howard A. Bridgman has resigned to enter educational work. He has served with conspicuous success during a remarkable era in religious journalism, through which he has been "finely loyal to the church, irenic and suggestive in editorial comment, keen in insight, comprehensive in interest, catholic in sympathy, happy in style, clear in statement, and a wise interpreter of contemporaneous social and religious movements." The council chose as its moderator a man well versed in its business, an authority on polity, a preacher of power, an author of note, the Rev. W. E. Barton, D.D., of Oak Park, Illinois, also known as Safed the Sage. The new chairman of the Commission on Missions will be Dr. Rockwell H. Potter of Hartford.

Another outstanding action of the council was the establishment of the Congregational Foundation for Education. Congregationalism has always been prolific in founding and furthering educational institutions and the trail of Pilgrim ideals across the continent is marked by scores of schools and colleges. A goodly number have exercised their heritage of independency and accept no denominational supervision, acknowledge no church relationship; but there are left at least forty colleges, in which the denomination now has a direct stake because of their history. It was the urgent need of three of these institutions which furnished large leverage in raising the emergency fund last year. There has been a growing feeling that the churches must not only boast of their colleges but boost them. The problem of Christian education is the concern of all the churches. The missionary colleges can amply justify their claims for support upon their record in furnishing leaders; the larger colleges also need help. The new Foundation will seek to aid both. The funds will come, in 1921-2, largely from the apportionment raised by the churches. After 1922 the eighteen trustees will seek to raise $500,000 annually to be used in furtherance of Christian education. A president of outstanding ability will be chosen as the executive officer and will give all his time to the work of the Foundation, the headquarters of which will be in Chicago. An adequate endowment, running ultimately into millions, will be sought at such time and in such way as the trustees may determine. It is hoped that large gifts will come to the Foundation from individual givers and that it will be generously remembered in bequests. All work of the education society which has to do directly with institutions will be turned over to the Foundation as rapidly as possible. The study conducted by the College Survey Commission, President King chairman, which led to the establishment of the Foundation, is a classic presentation of conditions now confronting all Christian colleges and will doubtless be examined frequently by other denominations. It must bring cheer to many devoted friends of Christian education who can now feel that a distinct forward step has been taken in recognizing and aiding church schools.

The council gave much attention to the question of securing recruits for the ministry. Lay delegates attended a seven o'clock breakfast to discuss the matter and adopted ringing resolutions. These, with resolutions from the floor, led to the appointment of a strong commission with Dr. Ernest Bourner Allen, of Illinois, as chairman, which was authorized to unite with the education society in securing a director who should coordinate the efforts of all the church agencies now seeking to recruit men or women for Christian service, and to carry on a vigorous and comprehensive campaign for leaders. The sum of $15,000 was authorized for this work. The efficient laymen's commission on the status of the ministry will continue its work of endeavoring to increase ministers' salaries, and also cooperate with the new commission. The council affirmed its deep interest in "the sane, practicable and promising proposals of the American Council on Organic Union" of all churches and voted to submit these proposals to Congregational churches at their next district and state meetings so as to secure definite action upon them before July, 1922. Representatives were appointed to the 1923 Conference of all churches on Life and Work and provision made for the denomination's quota for the support of the Federal Council of Churches. Resolutions were adopted commending the Near East relief work and appealing to President Harding to use the good offices of the government in protecting the Armenians; also strong representations in favor of world disarmament; concerning the prohibition of the opium traffic; favoring the Sterling bill restricting immigration and the establishment of a permanent commission to control and direct immigration; declaring the "conviction that in contests between labor and capital whenever either party is striving for a position from which to dictate terms to the other, such effort is contrary to the spirit of Christ"; encouraging the appointment of representative interracial committees to allay friction among races, reconcile extremists, and promote mutual helpfulness; urging the federal government to recognize the responsibility in relation to the public schools by passing the Towner-Sterling bill; and expressing the loss suffered by Congregational churches in the death of Dr. Gunsaulus.

Five Indispensable Books

Recommended by the Editor of The Christian Century

The Outline of History

By H. G. WELLS

Here is the history, not of kings and their wars and land-thefts, but of ages and races and nations. It is truly democratic. It is of greater value to the average man than a whole library of bulky histories of individual nations. Buy this book and save money on encyclopedias!

IN EIGHT BOOKS

The first three books, on "The Making of Our World," "The Making of Man," and "The Dawn of History" are veritable gold-mines of science, and the last book, on "The Next Stage in History" will appeal to all prophetic-minded people.

Two Volumes, $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.

What and Where is God?

By RICHARD LARUE SWAIN.

Of this book the Editor of The Christian Century says: "I could wish that every perturbed mind might read this book. It would put a new face on nature, on history, on providence, on prayer, on the future life. Aye, and the possession of a deep conviction as to the reality of God would put new radiance upon the face of the reader himself."

Boards, $1.50, plus 14 cents postage.

The Missionary Outlook in the Light of the War

By ROBERT E. SPEER, WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN and others.

These great leaders indicate that the way out for the distracted world is not by the League of Nations alone, but also by the way of Christian missions. Any minister who would deprive himself of this most timely and prophetic survey would be courting failure for himself in his chosen work of carrying on the tasks which the Master began.

Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?

By ALBERT PARKER FITCH.

Can the church survive? Dr. Fitch holds that that will depend upon the extent of her faith. The day has come for dropping a liberal apologetic for scholastic Christianity; for trying to define ancient phrases which once carried an open and ingenuous meaning; for reading twentieth century sophistries into good third century metaphysics.

80 cents, plus 6 cents postage.

Wanted—A Congregation

By LLOYD S. DOUGLAS.

Not merely a book of methods of the how to fill the pews sort, but a book filled with inspiration for the troubled preacher, and replete with suggestions for practical promotion of the work of the church. Dr. Douglas is one of the most lucid writers, but he is more: he is a man who has succeeded admirably in conducting the work and worship in his own great church in a spirit of devotion, and also with remarkable popular success.

Education is the Remedy

THE disturbance in the ranks of the larger evangelical denominations is fraught with peril. The constructive work of the church has been slowed up by the controversy carried on by premillennialists and obscurantists. The conservative element in these bodies believe in division and preach it. They are opposed to the universities and fight them continuously. The missionary and benevolent organizations have few cordial friends in the group. The Baptists are the latest of the evangelical bodies to hold a convention under the embarrassment of noisy disturbers, and the leaders in this denomination seem to have arrived at some important decisions. They hold that the pussyfooting program of distracting denominational attention with "drives" and pathetic appeals should be abandoned and an honest effort made to educate church people in the realities of religion. The cure for premillennialism is sound thinking about the Bible. Millions all over the land will come into the churches when they are assured that the church is not an obscurantist fossil. The idea that truth should be put under a bushel instead of on a candlestick is quite contrary to the example of the great saints of all history. Jesus did not keep quiet about things on which he differed from his Jewish brethren, or the world would have had no Saviour. Paul did not hold his peace in the synagogues for fear of unpleasantness, else there would have been no church. Suppose some one had counselled Martin Luther about holding his variant opinions as his private possession. There would have been no Reformation. If the modern Christian is to avoid captiousness on one hand, he is not to go into unholy compromises on the other. If the modern minister believes in the practice of Christian union, let no fear of secretaries and bishops keep him from saying so. If any man has found new light in Holy Scriptures, let him declare it. Our conservative brethren have claimed free speech and they are entitled to it. If modern minded men are equally free, the resulting discussions will soon lead the church out of her embarrassments.

Discussion on Church-Going

PERENNIALY the discussion of the alleged decline of the church goes on in the magazine press. The latest is a discussion in the Outlook in which Andrew Ten Eyck alleges that church-going is very much on the decline, while Dr. Howard A. Bridgman, editor of the Congregationalist, presents an optimistic statement with regard to church progress. Something of the very indefinite nature of the evidence presented by the man pessimistic about the church may be gathered from Mr. Eyck's statements. He says: "Recently I was in a community of 2,000 people in Maryland. There were six churches there, Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, Protestant Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian and Catholic. Not one of these churches had a self-supporting-sized congregation, I was told. I asked the church officer how they paid the minister. 'Oh,' said he, 'the bank pays him, and then when the notes come due, the bank gets after us and we have a fair or an entertainment to raise the money.'" It is upon scattered incidents of this sort that conclusions are reached, not the conclusion which the facts would seem to exhibit to the experienced student, but the impression gained by a journalist not much used to the ways of churches. It is probably true on the other hand that Dr. Bridgman is over-optimistic. He quotes statistics and shows that the churches continue to grow faster than the population. He tells of churches where the people cannot be accommodated for sittings most of the year. Dr. Lyman Abbott rightly raises the question whether we are not too much concerned about the church and too little about religion. The church can prosper only as the church is true to Christ and his gospel. The study of the church today is carried on too much in mathematical terms, and too little in terms of spiritual values. The Christian battle line is a wavering one with advances here and retreats yonder. The great missionary movement, and the unity movements among Christians speak of spiritual victories. The division, reactionism and apathy in many communities tell quite another story.

Birthday Illusions of Mortal Mind

ACCORDING to our mundane reckoning, July 16 was the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Mary Baker Eddy, the founder of Christian Science. But our Christian Science friends will not have it so, because, they say, birthdays are a delusion of mortal mind, which will be good news to many who would like to forget their birthdays. For the same reason protest is made against pilgrimages to the grave of Mrs. Eddy, on the ground that it is a tacit recognition of the fact of death. Whatever we may think of a faith, or philosophy, which dissolves all our mortal life into an illusion, in the oriental manner, the date is occasion for thought about an interesting movement. When Mrs. Eddy passed away in 1910, the number of her followers in this country was estimated to be 125,000; no figures of its membership today are available, except that it has 1,800 churches. The driving force behind this remarkable development, since the publication of "Science and Health," in 1875, may be said to be the quest of physical well-being by spiritual means, in a civilization of increasing complexity and of exacting demands upon body and spirit. In a day of nerves such a cult finds vogue, especially in an age which in so many ways emphasizes the power of mind over matter, and for much good it has done in inducing health, serenity, and optimism we may be grateful—though the kind of optimism it evokes may be open to query. Much of its success is due to an able and energetic propaganda employed from the first, and to a most efficient proselytism. Also, its ecclesiasticism—iron-bound and self-perpetuating—is no small part of its strength. Lately it has been much in the courts, and there are tokens of disunion in its ranks; but it promises to persist among the religious forces of the modern world.

Paganism Still Lurks in America

A LARGE question mark has been written by most intelligent interpreters of religion over the tradition that America is a Christian nation. It is increasingly felt that there is, alas, no Christian nation in the world, and never has been. Making a nation Christian is seen to be a much more thorough-going task than was once believed. That most nations have moved in the direction of the Christian ideal when once they have perceived it, is the faith of nearly every clear-eyed observer. But candor compels us to admit that in America there is still much of paganism. One finds queer bits of the most cruel superstition like that of the Penitentes in New Mexico where once a year an Indian is nailed on the cross and kept there for two hours as a part of the observance of Good Friday. Missionaries assert that this practice is still continued secretly in spite of the efforts of the government to root out the practice. Up and down the western coast one can find the temples of alien religions, mostly of the orient, where strange ritualistic cults challenge the sway of Christianity. Since the war there has been a great growth of spiritualism. Even if one admits that some very intelligent and educated people hold to Spiritualism in a tentative way and in the scientific spirit of investigation, one must confess that the popular practice of mediums is but a recrudescence of some of the most ancient superstitions of the race. The bald and heartless materialism of large numbers of people in the presence of the misery of the world is another evidence of the failure of Christianity to convert America to the point of view of Jesus. The task of home missions needs reinterpretation in face of the facts of strange religious belief, and of unbelief, that one finds on every hand. A home missionary society in the past has advanced the cause of its sect in competition with all other sects. Only recently through the activities of the Home Missions Council has a somewhat broader survey of the home mission task been conceived. Eventually it must be conceived by the home mission leaders that making America Christian must engage larger spiritual resources than are now employed and more diverse agencies.

Scandals in the High Schools

IT would seem that more than the usual number of scandals in high schools have developed during the past year. The result has been a large awakening of interest among high school principals on the subject of sex education. An investigation has been carried on recently for the purpose of ascertaining just how many schools now have this instruction. From Maine to California the reports have come in, and while they are not complete it would seem that already one-fifth of the high schools handle the subject in some way. In some cases the instruction falls under the rubric of hygiene, but when rightly given it should go much farther than this. Sex instruction rightly belongs with biology. When taught by an instructor who himself has the right attitude, the life process may be interpreted reverently. Much of the poetry and romance of life are connected with this theme, but on the other hand life's deepest degradations and irreverence are also connected with it. The alley interpretation of sex is a great lie. It is all that most children ever get. Many a man's chivalry for women will always be tainted with impurity for the simple reason that his first instruction in sex came from the wrong place. While some churchmen are debating what is to be the church's next great crusade in the field of personal morality following the victory over the saloon, good counsel should be forthcoming. Some would take up the fight against cigarettes. But this would seem like an effort to kill a mouse with a cannon. Is there a worse enemy of the human race than sex perversion? Must not the fight for clean thoughts and clean lives be won by educational programs and by moral and spiritual instruction? Fundamentally the burden of sex instruction rests upon the home and the parents. The idea of loading on public school teachers every parental function is one of the great abuses of the day. But some one must educate the parents in their duty. The church might organize classes for sex instruction in the Sunday school, but this would be to invade the realm of the home. It is the business of the church to teach the parents how to teach one of life's great lessons.

The Story of She-Tau-Qua

BRIGHT, racy, gossipy is "The Story of Chautauqua," by Jesse L. Hurlbut, telling the story of an institution so completely American that it could hardly have grown in any other country. Indeed, it is so typical of the America of the '80's, with its eager, confident, buoyant optimism, that it could hardly have developed in any other period of our history. Founded by Lewis Miller and Bishop Vincent, it was intended to be a popular university, and as such did good work for many years, until it was caught in the amusement craze. For a time there was a slump, and Gunsaulus—one of the princes of its platform—used to tell, with humorous exaggeration, how he competed with trained dogs and an "educated pig." However, from this low estate it has recovered, and is now one of the greatest popular forums in the world, having reached 13,000,000 people in 1920, as we learn from a most revealing article in a recent issue of World's Work. It goes into almost every nook and corner of the English-speaking world, from Canada to New Zealand, and the roll call of its "stars" reads like a directory of celebrities from the political, academic and clerical world. Next year it is to be introduced into England and Scotland, with what results it will be interesting to observe. It is significant that this vast movement is in the hands of capable, Christian-minded men, who have a fine sense of responsibility, who seek to use to the full its incredible power for good. Even the drabness of Gopher Prairie was relieved, for one week, by the coming of the chautauqua.

"A Metabiological Pentateuch"

BERNARD SHAW has played a nasty trick on H. G. Wells. As all of us knew, after reading "The Salvaging of Civilization," Wells is engaged in writing a new Bible, having gotten the idea from Upton Sinclair, who forgot to give Komensky credit for it. It was to be published, no doubt, like his Outline of History, with pictures, on the instalment plan. Alas, Shaw has cut in ahead, and, as the "iconographer of the religion of his time," in violation of patent rights, has published "a Bible of Creative Evolution." At least he issues a Pentateuch, which turns out to be a Revelation also. For, beginning 4004 B.C., it runs "as far as thought can reach," or, to be exact, 31,920 A.D. In a long preface, to write which the book is an excuse, and which reads like a predigested Einstein, with an admixture of fourth dimension speculation, he confesses that he is secretly convinced that he is a Great Thinker with a Message for the Younger Generation, and that his ideas have only to be rammed into a sufficient number of skulls to save the world. The new Pentateuch is orthodox in one particular; it is a stand-up fight with the Darwinians, who are the servants of the Serpent. In other respects the revelation is disappointing, in that it unveils the universe as an enormous theater where one long Shaw play—perhaps this one, which is well nigh eternal—is being acted forever and ever! The prospect is terrifying. The punishment would exceed the constitutional limit, but for the final blissful dream of man shedding one organ after another, the foot, the hand, the head, until he becomes pure spirit—and so escapes. For this relief much thanks. As a joke-book "Back to Methuselah" is a success; as a Bible it is a bore.

Making the Public Library Effective

THE liveliest theme at the meeting of the American Library Association at Swampscott, Mass., recently, was the subject of library publicity. Most communities have acted as if all that is necessary to make a library is a nice building and a collection of books. But the fifteen hundred librarians who met in convention believe that books have to be "sold" to the people. Most of us read a book only on the recommendation of a friend. When a volume continues to be talked about in our presence we begin to feel that intellectual respectability demands of us a knowledge of that book. It is publicity that makes certain books the vogue, and the lack of publicity has sometimes buried for a whole generation a literary treasure destined to prove of enormous value in a later period. Among the allies of the church are to be found few better friends of the church than the librarians. The thoughtful and intellectual attitude that is begotten by an acquaintance with the world's best literature is the very soil in which religion may be planted. The librarians are beginning to realize that they must find a closer bond of sympathy with the church, and live ministers are seeking to co-operate with the library. If the church bulletins in a given city will call attention to the great and urgent books now appearing these books will be made popular throughout the whole city. The church should send its workers increasingly to the public library. The Sunday school worker will find pedagogy, psychology and Bible study manuals there. The missionary group will find the books they need. Many pastors of meager resources must find their spiritual pabulum in the library. This makes the community library rank significantly among those forces that work for the building up of the kingdom of God.

Sun Yat Sen at the Front in China

DR. SUN YAT SEN is by all odds the most interesting man in all China. In season and out of season he has stood for true democracy in China against conservatives and militarists, sometimes at the expense of his life. During the war the military party gained the upper hand and China joined the allies. The constitutional parliament of China has recently elected Sun Yat Sen, veteran reformer that he is, as president. The parliament holds the city of Canton, while the militaristic government is located in the ancient capital at Peking. The importance of Peking in the thoughts of the ignorant is large, of course, but the educated class in China grows continually. Newspapers all over the empire are making the people intelligent with regard to the facts of government. The government of Sun Yat Sen is now asking recognition at the hands of the leading civilized nations of the world. The calling of the Washington disarmament congress with the question of the orient lying at the heart of the discussion is an epoch making fact. Chinese liberals blame the citizens of the United States for bringing the military party into power. If the rights of the Chinese are being invaded by the party in power, there is opportunity at the coming international discussions to remedy that. China will either go forward to complete democracy or will be partitioned by the powers. Its civilization is too ancient to be overridden by upstart civilizations from the west, and partition would only mean a long drawn out struggle in which blood would flow and which would at last align the orient against the occident. All those things that the Christian conscience is interested in are better conserved under a democracy. Under the presidency of Sun Yat Sen China would have schools, and the missionaries would have free course in their philanthropic ministries. Under arrogant militarism this would not be the case. In no single year has fate held in her hand so much for China as in this present year. The destiny of one-fourth of the world's people will be in the hands of the diplomats.

"The Lost Spirituality of Politics!"

THE new editor of the Century Magazine strikes a fine and high note in his editorials, as in his public addresses. He feels that something noble, something spiritual, is lacking in our present leadership, and that unless we recapture what Morris called "the glimmer of the open light" we cannot find a way out of the blind alley into which we have wandered. To describe this lost power one turns to an essay entitled "The Spiritual Quality," by E. S. Martin, editor of "Life," and reads these golden words, which explain the dearth of leadership today: "What is the spiritual quality? It is not piety in the common sense; it is not necessarily religiousness; but though it may be consistent with any kind of religion I do not understand how it can be consistent with none. It is consistent with money-getting and with indifference to money; with ambition and with modesty; with great powers and with lesser ones, but hardly with stupidity, for it is itself a quality of intelligence. Let us call it a grasp of certain great truths, the knowledge of which is revealed to some babes and denied to some learned; which comes more by conduct than by study, and more perhaps by breeding and the grace of God than either. Emerson had it. Lincoln had it. McKinley had it, and the shrewd Hanna recognized it in him. Able men lacking or losing this quality cease to be able to inspire, and fail of leadership."

The Congregationalists at Los Angeles

UNLIKE the national gatherings of the less democratic denominations such as the Baptists and Disciples, the National Council of Congregational Churches which convened the first week of July in Los Angeles, was not diverted from nor interrupted in the orderly and deliberate consideration of its business. With less than 500 delegates, representing the associations of Congregational churches the country over, it was quite improbable that certain influences which have been disturbing other communions should find field for their operation. Yet it is only in recent years that Congregationalism has undertaken earnestly to organize itself on the principle of democracy. The historic independency of the local church has given way in the past decade to the principle of interdependency, which is the only principle on which group action can be taken in a democratic fashion. Since organizing the National Council, the independent churches of Congregationalism have found themselves in possession of a technique through which the common will of their communion can express itself almost as satisfactorily as the common will of the Presbyterian communion expresses itself through its General Assembly. The mass gatherings, largely sectional and unrepresentative in character, of the less democratic denominations lay themselves open to manipulation by forces which are much less clamant in the presence of a truly democratic convention.

This fact perhaps, more than any other single consideration, accounts for the sharp contrast between the excited mass meetings held by Disciples and Baptists on one hand, and the more deliberate assemblies of Presbyterians, Methodists and Congregationalists on the other. It is not that one gathering is large and another small. The difference between the two types of convention is not essentially a matter of numbers. It is a question of authority, importance, responsibility and adequacy. A mere popular gathering of Presbyterians in these times would have proved as congenial a field for the activities of reactionaries and premillennialists as, for example, the recent Baptist convention held in Des Moines, or any of the General Conventions of Disciples held during the past several years. But in the atmosphere of a truly representative body of delegates whose sense of responsibility to their constituents is keen, the self-appointed saviors of a denomination's orthodoxy are under certain inhibitions of prudence and courtesy which they do not feel in an undemocratic mass meeting.

There are cross-currents of progress and reaction among Congregationalists, just as among Baptists and Disciples, but the tension of these opposing forces did not find so brash an expression at Los Angeles as at Des Moines. The Congregational fellowship is by no means immune from disturbance over millennialism. Not a few of its local churches have been disrupted by the activities of that strange group. Yet no one suggested that there should be held a "Fundamentalist Conference," or a "Restoration Congress," or any rump gathering in connection with the National Council at Los Angeles. The explanation simply is that everybody felt that the council was really representative of the whole denomination, while everybody at Des Moines and St. Louis knew that the gatherings held in those cities by Baptists and Disciples respectively were not in any adequate sense representative of the churches in whose name they came together.

A democratic denomination whose national convention is selected in a democratic fashion, therefore, has opportunity not only to deal in a grave and orderly fashion with its own inner problems, but its utterances on the great problems common to all Christian people in our time carry a weight and a significance beyond that attached to the utterances of any less representative convention. At Los Angeles, the three outstanding questions of the modern church received constructive and authoritative treatment. We may say that these three questions were: Christian unity, the social gospel and religious education. Upon each of these Congregationalism, as represented in its National Council, spoke no uncertain word. In his address of welcome, Dr. Carl S. Patton, pastor of the entertaining church, a man well known throughout the denomination, and a strong tower of liberal-evangelical religion on the Pacific coast, referred to the older type of local independency as dead. Asserting the full force of the Congregational ideal of liberty, Dr. Patton declared that with the safeguarding of the rights of individual conscience and speech, Congregationalists must seek an ever larger form of fellowship and cooperation with Christians of many names in order to make more effective their own efforts on behalf of the kingdom of God. The ringing applause that greeted this utterance left no doubt as to the sentiments of the council on this point, while the discussions and resolutions later gave practical effect to this sentiment.

In spite of Presbyterian cold feet with respect to their own proposal—the Philadelphia plan—looking toward organic unity, these Congregationalists voted to submit this plan to Congregational churches at their next district and state meetings, so as to secure definite action upon it before July, 1922. In their so far lonely loyalty to the only practicable plan of organic unity that is now before the churches, Congregationalists are acting consistently with their history and character which has always been more forward than that of any other body in desiring to see denominationalism, including their own denomination, swallowed up in the larger unity of the church of Christ.

There was an interesting ripple of excitement over the discussion of the proposed concordat with the Episcopal church. A resolution was up, providing for the continuance of the commission appointed two years ago to discuss the implications of the concordat with a similar commission of Episcopalians. Rev. Mr. Ainsworth, a delegate from Massachusetts, read from "The Living Church" the report of an address delivered by Bishop Manning in which the bishop had asserted that Congregationalists had expressed a readiness to accept Episcopalian ordination and certain other things which seemed to imply a full surrender of Congregational principles. In view of such an interpretation of Congregational courtesy, which the speaker thought preposterous, he moved a resolution calling for the complete abandonment of all discussions between these two bodies. His resolution was lost, and the proposal to continue the work of the commission on Christian unity prevailed. It was felt by many that the too sanguine and unwarranted statements of Bishop Manning should not be allowed to hinder the continued counsels of Christian men seeking to understand one another and to find a common basis of union. The spirit of the council with respect to this whole matter of Christian unity was undoubtedly that of Dr. Patton's address—to welcome every measure of larger fellowship and closer organization that does not weaken or imperil the liberty of Christian discipleship and Christian ministry. The opinion was freely expressed that the average Congregational minister had about as much liberty as he could successfully make use of.

The social note was sounded over and over again. Its most thrilling expression was probably in the address by Dean Charles R. Brown of Yale on "The Challenge of the Ministry to the Coming Age." Dean Brown's address was a clear and challenging assertion of the demands that arise from the fact that the most important elements in society and industry are the souls of men. He plainly declared that the time is coming when men must be given more voice in determining the conditions under which they shall work, and a larger share in the control and management of industry, for the simple reason that they are men, not machines, and not a commodity. On the basis of Bishop Ussher's chronology, Dean Brown calculated the amount of money in wages which Adam, working for $100 a day would have received if he had worked seven days a week from creation until now. He showed that Adam's total savings for that period, allowing a reasonable amount for living expenses, would leave him not so well off as Cornelius Vanderbilt. The future, said Dean Brown, will recoil from the inequity of a social system which allows such contrasts of fortune to obtain. Without in any way questioning the ethics of the methods by which any railroad millionaire had gained his wealth, Dean Brown declared that the day was coming when society would set itself to consider whether such fortunes should not rightfully go to railroad employes, to farmers and to the public in lower freight rates, and to passengers in lower fares.

In Dean Brown's address there was not the slightest indication of any tendency to alter the clear utterances of the church with regard to social issues because of any threat or criticism from conservative quarters or from the monied interests. Nor was there in discussions in the council any evidence that such events as have occurred in connection with the Y. W. C. A. in Pittsburgh were having the slightest influence upon the attitude and decisions of the church. Again and again the principle was expressed that the church must find its social program in the teaching of Christ regarding the nature and rights of the human soul. The relation of human souls at work in industry must take precedence over every other aspect of the industrial system. Religion must not be adapted to the demands of the industrial system, but the industrial system must be reformed and adapted to the teaching of Christ. When reference was made to the claim of Mr. Charles M. Schwab that only men who had knowledge of steel had a right to say anything about conditions in steel, the counter-claim was made that experts in the things of the soul had a far greater right to be heard, because the souls of men, their happiness and their destinies, are indissolubly bound up with steel production. So far as the Congregationalists of America are any barometer, it is clear that there will be no recession in the determination of the church to continue its criticism of social and industrial conditions from the standpoint of their effect upon the lives and homes of the workers. It is not a dream of material comfort, but a vision of spiritual justice which prompts the church to demand that every man shall have a fair chance at the things which the soul of a man made in the image and likeness of God, should reasonably be given.

The most authoritative note on education was uttered by the retiring moderator of the Council, President Henry Churchill King, of Oberlin. Dr. King declared that the war had sadly disclosed the inadequacy of our educational standards and the ineffectiveness of our educational work. He advocated a new departure in denominational college support—the establishment of a Congregational Foundation for Education to which, instead of directly to the colleges themselves, gifts would be made, and that funds thus received be divided among the Congregational institutions in accordance with certain agreed upon principles and policies. The council later adopted this comprehensive plan and it is believed that before long the Foundation will have several million dollars to administer. Dr. King laid stress upon what he called the “insidious propaganda” with which American religion is honey-combed today, and asserted that only sane and adequate education could save the church from fads and literalistic delusions. A college education might not save a fool from being a fool, but on the whole the college and seminary were the mainstay of a stable and leaderlike ministry. Narrow and delusive cults and doctrines thrive by untrained and but partially educated interpreters of the gospel. In addition to the establishment of the Foundation, the council adopted resolutions committing the denomination to a great forward movement educationally. Every assurance was given that every institution, however small, whose existence is justified by its fruits in sound ideals and character, would receive the same consideration it has hitherto enjoyed. The smaller college found a strong champion in Dean Brown of Yale.

Conspicuous by their absence from the consideration of the Los Angeles meeting were the great money raising drives which have bulked so large in the last two biennial gatherings. This accounts, perhaps, for the lack of a certain enthusiasm which during and just after the war characterized most religious gatherings. But there were in this council many evidences of faith and courage, a great sense of present needs and responsibilities, and a stern determination to make Congregationalism effective in this day of need. The sessions were characterized by a temper of caution and an unwillingness to jump hastily at proposals even when they came with strong official backing. There was no sweeping emotion, but it was a fine spectacle to see a great company of men and women of free spirits launching upon the course of progress with a long stride. It would be well for American religion if in all our great church gatherings there could be sounded the strong, catholic, modern notes that Congregationalism sounded at Los Angeles with even more than characteristic power.

The Pigeons

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I STOOD upon the Platform of an Elevated Railway in a Great City. And there flew Pigeons around me, and they walked upon the Platform, close up to my Feet. And I said, This remindeth me of Venice, where I have fed the Pigeons of Saint Mark's, and I would even do so here.

And I looked about me, and I beheld a Box where there were Peanuts. And I dropped a Coin in the Slot, and I received some Peanuts in mine hand.

And I showed them unto Two Pigeons. And I laid them down upon the Platform. And the Two Pigeons flew both of them to eat the Peanuts.

But one of the Pigeons flew at the other one. And he took him with his Beak, by the feathers that grew upon the top of his head, and he Pulled him, and he Pecked him, and he Persecuted him shamefully. And the Peanuts were scattered and wasted, and many of them were thrown upon the Ground.

And when the Stronger Pigeon had Oppressed the Weaker Pigeon so that the Weaker one ceased to resist, then did the Stronger one fly back, and pick up what were left of the Peanuts. And there still were left more than were good for him, but he ate them, everyone. And the Weaker Pigeon came and drew near, and watched every Peck and Bite with Covetous Longing, yet came he not nigh enough to provoke the other one to leave his Peanuts and attack him.

And when all the Peanuts were gone, then did they both fly up upon the Railing, and they waited for some other man to come along and give them some more Peanuts.

And when I beheld all this, I said, Oh, ye foolish birds! How evil are your doings, for there had been enough for you both, and more than ye both could eat! Why did ye not eat both of you all that ye wanted, and then call in other Pigeons to consume what was left? For this had been for your profit, both of you, and for the profit of other Pigeons, and the encouragement of those who rejoice to provide Peanuts for Pigeons. And now, behold, it repenteth me that that which I intended for good should have become the occasion of strife, and I shall consider well before I waste more of my Hard-earned Cash on Peanuts for Pigeons that are so unworthy of my Generosity.

And I considered how men and nations use the gifts of God, and I wondered what God thinketh of us.

And I said, Oh, ye foolish Pigeons, will ye continue to be as foolish as men?

Rekindling Religious Enthusiasm

By Spenser B. Meeser

THE serious phenomenon of the Christian religion of the day is the passing of enthusiasm. It is not necessary to magnify this in the least degree, but simply to recognize frankly what many are feeling, and to state openly what all are, more or less, saying in secret. The lament is so common that there can be no risk in public recognition of it. This arises from the intellectual transition through which men are passing. They, who retain faith, are adjusting themselves to a new science, a new philosophy, a new politics, a new industrial condition, a new social theory, and a new civilization. From each of these departments have come contributions of fact and faith which are overwhelming. They necessarily change philosophies and sciences. They dispel ignorance, fill up gaps in knowledge, make many old doctrines untenable, and compel the abandonment of many theories and practices. Every religious theory is affected by them. They are irresistible in their influence on intelligent views of life, and the relations of life to God. In the adjustments necessarily following it is not surprising that some of the doctrines of Christianity should be changed in their emphasis, as well as in their statement.

These modifications are not the result of antagonistic criticism; they are interpretations which the friends of Christianity have adopted; and they represent the highest faith and the devoutest hopes of the close followers of the Master. The later theological thought is as reverent as the old; is as devout and as full of faith. In some senses it is even more devout, for it has given to the problem of the salvation of the race the highest learning, the noblest consecration, and an earnest care for the full truth, even when accused falsely by those who, a few years later, adopt its conclusions in full.

ABATED ZEAL FOR THE CHURCH

The church, for instance, does not arouse the zeal which once characterized its members, because many have come to see that the church is not the final thing in the mind and purpose of Christ. These have discovered that the kingdom of God was the goal of his effort. So long as men thought that the salvation of God was for a limited number of men, that he intended to save only a few, a remnant of the race, then it was easy to believe that the church was the goal of Jesus. What became of the world did not much matter; and it was the proper thing to think that God would soon destroy it. Linked with this was the idea that salvation was an escape from the penalty of a hell; and though not justified in the idea, men thought it mattered little what they did on the earth. Ethical considerations were considered as of secondary account; the serious comment on which is the formation of ethical societies outside of the church.

This doctrine of salvation as intended only for a few is, of course, not tenable under more intelligent exegesis and wider view of Christ's purpose. Thus the reason for the existence of the church seems to be lessened, or to be done away with altogether. While there is reason to rejoice in men's widening faith in the goodness of God, and in the breadth of his holy and benign purpose, it is to be regretted that men have lost sight of the function and indispensableness of the church in attaining the purposes of God and in spreading the gospel over the whole earth. It is scarcely just or wise, nor is it intellectually honest to overlook the fact that the church is needed for the perpetuation of the truths of the gospel, for the nurture of the people who accept those truths, and as an organized force to bring in the kingdom of God.

FATE OF THE HEATHEN

Over against a former enthusiasm in missionary endeavor is the paralyzing scepticism that the heathen will not be lost and that, in the wide wisdom and love of God, he will save the peoples whom we have been accustomed to think of as lost. "The heathen cannot perish" is the thought that has been silently influencing the people. Even where they have not been conscious of the fact, this idea has had its influence; and although universalism as a doctrine has not been accepted or avowed, the spirit of it has affected their minds.

Possibly it ought not, but practically it does, chill the enthusiasm of the church to think that perhaps the lost among the ignorant heathen will finally be restored to everlasting life; certainly it chills the enthusiasm which has fed its fires on the idea that the heathen who do not know of and receive the Lord Jesus Christ will be eternally lost. And so long as the churches continued to find the reason for their missionary zeal solely in that idea, or mainly in that idea, so long did this stream of doubt pour its flood over the fires, to extinguish them. Many are free to confess that they cannot explain what they feel that God, in his infinite mercy, will do for those who do not know Christ, and have not heard of the free forgiveness offered in Christ; but they do not seek their inspiration for missionary work in such a motive or idea. They hear the command of the Master. They see the misery of the life which the heathen now live. They know the joy and the peace of the present salvation. They can understand the infinite losses which those people now suffer and know what the gospel can do for them in the present time. These things are facts of the present hour, which need no argument and find no support in a questioned teaching. These facts inspire men's hearts, and make them profound believers in missions.

EVANGELISTIC ENTHUSIASM

In like manner it may be seen why there is so much of a real scepticism in the matter of the evangelistic efforts being put forth today. Some of it arises from the changed opinion with regard to what constitutes a conversion. The ideas of what is to be expected from the operation of the Spirit of God upon the soul have undergone a great change and emphasize other features of the spiritual experience than those which once received most attention. The old idea held up one type of experience, and was sceptical of any deviation from that type. What it recognized was itself worthy enough. What it called conversion was a spiritual change wrought in a moment of exultation when a man saw the beauty of Christ, and the moral ugliness of his own soul in comparison with the excellence of Jesus. The error consisted in the requirement that every soul should have precisely the same experience, in precisely the same way. That God operates on the heart of a man in a moment of time, and that such a man may change the whole course of his life by a choice and a decision in that moment, is quite possible. No intelligent and reverent man will deny it probably; but that God may and does choose to influence the spirit of the penitent and aspiring man through long periods of time and in a great variety of experiences, ought to be equally clear.

Further than this, such momentous change should carry with it some revolutionary ethical effect, from some additional moral power in the heart. There should be an evident inworking upon the conscience; and the tokens of a devout life are worth more, as an evidence of a spiritual change, than any merely emotional exultation. Men see that God expects that the renewed life shall be controlled by the principles and spirit of righteousness; and that therefore honesty and uprightness, with benevolent disposition are of greater moment, so far as the moral life is concerned, than any vague confession of a vaguer experience. But though this change of view has come to so many, the methods of the current evangelistic efforts are but little modified; and proceed, apparently, upon the basis of the idea that the one credible type of conversion to God, and the one true entrance upon the Christian life, is in the instant choice of Jesus Christ.

COMMERCIALISM AND SPIRITUALITY

Some have said that the commercialism of the day has been the chief reason for decline of enthusiasm and interest. Perhaps every one will realize that this is in a measure true. Others have said that unusual comfort and the attractiveness of the physical life, the very abundance of material possessions, has tended to decrease the interest in the spiritual life, and the future of the soul, thereby taking away the reasons for enthusiasm in religion. The Christian faith has been conceived as valuable chiefly for the future, rather than as a principle of conduct for the present, and has therefore lost some of its motive and interest. Others have intimated that they believe that the syndicating of the work of Christianity has to bear the responsibility for the present decline of individual interest. Still others insist that Christianity needs a new motive, a new ideal, a social ideal; having worn out, so to speak, the egoistic motive; the human conscience having itself gone beyond such a motive in moral ideals.

Probably commercialism is an effect, more than it is a cause of decline of interest. It is, in some degree, owing to the loss of the sense of the value of the spiritual and religious that the energies of men are so spent upon the material. An exaggerated sense of the value of things material is very likely to produce the spirit of commercialism. The way to treat it would seem to be such reconstruction, such rational reconstruction and attractive presentation of things spiritual and moral as that they shall once more appeal to conscience, to intelligence, and to the soul.

In order to overcome men's preoccupation and satisfaction with present material conditions, such as take away their interest in the values of the spiritual life, there must be wise display of the superior excellence of Christian aims and ends. It must be made clear that all our social life is penetrated with the ethical and spiritual, that morality is the centre and soul of all life as well as of all permanent satisfaction; and that the persistent and unescapable fact of life is the very God who is being ignored.

Christianity has known much of its development in relation to adverse conditions of the present life. Its doctrines have often been formed in an environment that was wholly hostile to the present life. They bear a kind of colloquial spirit, because they were directed at conditions which were not universal, and do not exist for many today. These doctrines must be modified and constructed to show the obligation and advantage, the imperativeness and beauty of Christianity, even when related to the happiest and most favorable conditions for the material and present life.

For the syndicating of Christian work it would seem that the only hope for the recovery of spiritual power is to be found in a return to the individual and personal responsibility, which would include the setting up again of the home altar, and all the forms of individual responsibility and service.

NEW MOTIVE AND AIM

For the burnt-out life and motive, the prostrate emotionalism,—that effect of the most amazing series of wonders in invention and progress the world has ever seen,—for this we need such a reconstruction of our ideas as shall do something like giving a new motive and a new aim for Christian effort. Religion has suffered, as have many other interests of life, from the magnificence of the age as a whole. This age's wonders pall on itself, for the very multitude of them makes them common, and almost commonplace.

A rational culture is the cure for all this; not a resort to sensational expedients, not a cheapening of holy ideas and services, by making them minister to the superficial interests of human life; not by an attempt toward a reaction, or by gathering larger masses of men and mightier orators; not by entering into competition with the interests of amusement and entertainment; not by further excesses of emotionalism; not by lowering the standards of righteousness.

There is needed a new motive, arising from a free apprehension of Christ's purpose. The people do not more than half believe some of the older doctrines, and are not susceptible to the power of the older motives. They must conceive Christianity freshly, and must have a motive based on these fresh conceptions, in order that motive and faith may have a common source and a common aim.

"Some great cause, God's new Messiah," is what is needed in this particular. There is lack of energizing motive. One dare scarcely more than suggest what he believes will yet seize the conscience and soul of men and become this energizing motive. We mean the doctrine of the constant and intimate relation which the life and teaching of Jesus have to the industrial, the economic and the social life of man; the so-called "Christian socialism;" the effort under the inspiration of Jesus to redeem the world, and make the environment contribute to the culture of the highest and holiest life. The fact is that the men whose enthusiasm is on the rise and unabating, whose motive seems virile, sinewy, and effective to the consecration of the whole life, are the men who are seeking this end, the redemption of society by the application of the laws and principles of Jesus. They have positive signs of vitality and creative enthusiasm; they, most of all, appear to be constructive in doctrine and practice.

REACTION IMPOSSIBLE

So far as the decline of enthusiasm has come from scepticism and the doubt of the doctrines which underlie our religion, and so far as the transitions and adaptations to new knowledge in every department have also had effect, the thing to do seems very clear. We are past the possibility of reaction, and must now reconstruct. The possibility of further drifting is not to be considered. We are past reaction because the present chaos in the church, the decline of enthusiasm and the movement from traditional standards, have been caused by things which are positive forces, not mere negations, not empty dissatisfactions, not mere tendencies to heresy; but positive contributions of truth. It is freshly discovered truth which has caused the change. There can be no reaction from the results of apprehending truth, but toward what is false; and no reaction from growth, but into stultification, and the betrayal of life. This movement has been vital and has been fed upon facts. There have been contributions of scientific fact, of historical truth, of exegetical study, of literary criticism, of social experience and of moral ideals. To react from the movement created by these facts and truths, from these experiences and ideals, would mean a relapse into the enthusiasm of ignorance.

There is the effect which scientific fact has had upon men. No one can read Genesis again with the enthusiasm of a believer in the old conception of creation. This is only an example of the general result which scientific truth has upon our understanding of the Bible. To seek a reaction here would mean to be untrue to the most accurate knowledge we have, and to repudiate intelligence.

CHANGING CONCEPTIONS

Psychological fact has affected our conceptions of the soul and of the influences that may rightly be brought to bear upon it. It has made a whole new revelation of God, which, unlike the canon of the Scripture, is not yet closed. Reverent and serious men have found truths which it would be folly to ignore, and which in practical effect they do not ignore. These truths have been changing men's thoughts about the culture of character, and the development of the Christian life, so that many cannot follow the lead of the church in some teachings and methods. To ask such men to return from the facts of psychology to the imperfect mental science of an age no less sincere than our own, but less informed, is to ask them to fling truth to the winds, and to repudiate their own intelligence.

Historical truth and literary criticism have brought changed views of the Bible. There cannot be a reaction from the influence of these facts, so far as they are facts, without putting discredit upon all historic evidence for the integrity of the Bible; which would mean the incredibility of the historic basis of a faith. One must follow the lead of truth or be lost in ignorance.

The church has been influenced to consider the social functions of the gospel by contact with changing economic conditions; and a deep sense of social obligation has come in a way to broaden the idea of and affect zeal in the old evangelism. To react from this social experience is to violate conscience and to ignore the leadings of God's light in contemporary history.

These are simply types of the causes of the change that we all perceive in the intellectual and religious life of the Christian people. The change arises in positive facts; reaction from fact means action toward what is false, or only partly true; and could never give normal or ethically valid enthusiasms.

RECONSTRUCTION NEEDED

What is needed in this doubting and transition period is not to seek a reaction, but a reconstruction on the broader basis of facts now in our possession. For one must consider what the action has been from which he seeks a reaction. To seek a return from the present thought and truth means that the things which have led to the present position in theology and religious faith, were false, and the influences malignant. It carries the presumption that the action has been from false motives, or was wholly ignorant; or that it was based on an insufficient ground; or that it was the erratic straying of incompetent minds, from which the great Guardian of the church was not able to keep his people. It assumes that, without controversy, the old mind and method were absolute truth, and the new conditions are the juvenile vagaries of sophomoric intellects.

Studios effort will be needed to reach a worthy and valid reconstruction, but there is no reason why God will not aid his church to attain it. Whatever enthusiasms are to be awakened can best be gained by a reconstruction rather than by a reaction. There is no use trying to rekindle the flame with the ashes of the logs that have burned out. The flame of holy devotion and love still glows in the hearts of Christ's people. If we put on the logs of reconstruction, although they may still be unseasoned, they at least have wood in them.

In the reconstruction thus suggested there are some serious problems; but it must be attempted in the faith that God will lead his church in the present, as he has in the past. A free soul in the people is needed, that they may not hesitate to think out the new duties and relations of the changed faith; or to commit themselves to the influences of facts which they cannot reject. A free church is needed which will permit the new life to express itself in new forms and services; and the sympathy of the leaders of thought in the church is needed to guide the people and to interpret the new facts which have influenced them. There must be new experience in the lines of truth thus revealed, and a free expression of this experience, so as to guide to and interpret the same experience in others. The church must seek a new conception of Christian piety, a new method of evangelization, a new hymnology, and a new literature and poetry of the inner life, to lift the soul into the higher aspirations of the reinterpreted Christianity. A change is involved in the whole environment of Christian life; and a reconstruction of ethics, on the basis of the newly revealed facts. Some one should endow, in some university, a chair of the inner life. For the influences have wrought their effect; and the changes have come, and these need guidance and interpretation.

A Bill of Rights for the Church

By William S. Mitchell

IT is probable that no utterance which the church has made in industrial matters has attracted more attention, nor suffered sharper criticism than the Report of the Interchurch Commission on the Steel Strike of 1919. There had preceded it other and numerous pronouncements by individual churches and communions and by such organizations as the Federal Council stating the attitude of the church in the matter of social and industrial relations but these were chiefly concerned with creed and not with deed. The strike report went further than the mere statement of a position. It dealt directly with the concrete facts of an industrial dispute. It is this which has occasioned the sharpness of protest and the bitterness of criticism. Even churchmen themselves have been divided in opinion concerning the wisdom or the right of such intrusion into the actual issues of industrial controversy. However it is likely that this report may prove a historic utterance in the new struggle of the church for moral power. It is the first definite and comprehensive declaration by any considerable portion of the Christian church in a particular industrial issue involving moral questions. It matters little that the church which spoke through it was not a united church, nor even a church agreed upon the issues involved in this particular dispute. The fact remains that the moral conscience of Christianity spoke here, positively, courageously, and with the consciousness of authority.

A NEW CONSCIOUSNESS

It is precisely this new consciousness on the part of the church which has aroused the deepest feeling of resentment in certain quarters bitterly critical of the report and of the agency which brought the commission making it into existence.

The modern world is not yet ready to accord to the church the unquestioned right to any such moral authority beyond the safe questions of theology and salvation. Far from recognizing this claim there is going on today, consciously or unconsciously, no one is able to definitely determine, a coming together of the most diverse and morally threatening forces of modern life, made one in sympathy by their common fear and resentment of this claim of the church. Rightfully or wrongfully, these forces, favoring a more liberal attitude toward certain mooted questions of the day and prompted by a more or less definitely personal, financial interest, have come to feel that the church is their common enemy. There is evidence that a widespread campaign is being secretly conducted aiming to discredit the church, its ministry and the recent moral victories largely won through its interest and advocacy. There is no need to disguise the fact that in this antagonism it is peculiarly our Protestant churches which are regarded as the foe. Something farther reaching is involved in this struggle than the mere settlement of a particular issue here, or there. The thing which is really at stake is whether the Christian church, as individual congregations or as churches of a community, or of a nation, have the right to assert the authority, not of an ecclesiasticism, or of a particular sect, but of the Christian conscience wherever there is reason to believe that the standards of Christian righteousness are being violated.

The real issue we are confronting is the right of the church to moral power.

TEMPORAL VERSUS MORAL POWER

The world has been familiar for centuries with the contention of a great division of the Christian church for its right to temporal power. It must be admitted that behind that contention there is more than the mere greed of an ecclesiasticism for power. This could not have sustained such a contention had there not been also a profound religious conviction as to the divine nature of this ecclesiasticism and the rightfulness of its claim. This contention is not settled yet. It is the wedge which lies at the bottom of the dividing abyss between Rome and other Christianity. May it not be that everything which is fundamental in the way of religious conviction in this contention, which we are certain can never be granted by the modern world, is really involved in this greater question of the church's moral power? May it not be that we are at the beginning of a new phase of a Christian contention even older than that of Rome, that of the church for its right to speak in the vast social and industrial issues of our day as the arbiter of the moral conscience? There are indications that this may be true.

Recently, weighing the report of the Interchurch Commission on the Steel Strike, a representative company of clergymen went on record declaring it to be the right and duty of the church to acquaint itself with any social or industrial situation where moral issues were at stake in which capital or labor, either separately or together, were involved. They further asserted the right of the church to preach and to teach those ideals of social and industrial justice which will prevent the misunderstandings and strife now so characteristic of our human relations. This sounds not unlike the announcement of a moral magna charta for the church in a time when the rights affirmed have been questioned both within and without its membership.

At first thought such a suggestion seems most strange in the light of the long history of the church and of its very assertion of this identical right. However we face a new age, with a new mood and new problems. We are scarcely yet awakened to the vast forces which are struggling in our present world for mastery, nor facing the sharp necessity for the entrance into this struggle of the moral conscience of Christianity. We frankly confess that the church did not speak out in the vast world struggle of the war as it should have done, that the assertion of the great moral issues involved was left largely to a single statesman and that, in the settlement of peace he was not sustained, as might have been expected, by the church with the insistence that these issues be kept preeminent. It is frankly recognized by leaders within and without the church that the final solutions for the stresses of our suffering world must be moral and religious, but how these moral solutions are to be brought about has been discreetly avoided. Let us acknowledge to our shame that the real reason for this silence has been the difficulty of our divided Christianity. No portion of the Christian church has had a right to speak save for itself.

Is not the real difficulty in our thought of the church the lingering ghost of the idea of power which founds itself upon organization and must express itself through some form of ecclesiasticism? Is the moral authority of the living God dependent upon the agreement of judicatories? Who possibly could grant this? If the moral power of organized Christianity is not in its moral conscience, wherever and however that conscience functions through the forms of human organization, then that power does not exist.

THE RIGHT TO SPEAK

The church through which God must speak to this age need not wait for the slow process of adjusting human prejudices and harmonizing all the countless differences theological, ecclesiastical and practical which forbid the unity of Christendom. If there be a moral conscience in Christianity the tiniest chapel of the cross roads has the right to speak in the authority of that conscience as the church of God. No power a united Christianity might acquire in a temporal way could enforce its moral utterance beyond the sheer power of its truth. Our battle is not for the rights of an institution but for the rights of that Christian conscience which is even now in process of adjusting its sensitive registering to the great problems of our hour. The problems of industrialism and economics, of nationalism and internationalism, which were largely academic even yesterday are dynamic today. If the Christian conscience is to guide these swiftly moving forces toward any goal which deserves to be called Christian it must speak under the compulsion of God whenever and wherever the moral issues are clouded.

It is this right to speak in such an hour which is at stake. A civilization which has come to treat the church, in its divided state, with comparative contempt, recognizes no such right. The materialistic forces of society confronted by the new moral determination on the part of the church are resolved that its opposition shall be broken. The evil and sinister powers which would prey at will upon our time recognize in the church their chief and most dangerous enemy. The conservatism of many and the subtle pressure of personal interest upon others array even the professed followers of the Lord of mercy and the God of righteousness against this conscience of the church. Truly we fight today against principalities and powers but the battle is for the life of the church and the life of the world.

A SILENT CHURCH

A church that is silent in this hour has either lost the power of a moral conscience or is so fearful and entangled that it cannot speak. We confess with shame that the church was silent during those great days of war. We resolved then that this should never occur again. We promised ourselves that we would profit by this failure, that never again, when great issues for humankind were on the stage should the church be chiefly a spectator. That hour has come. In this hour the rights of the church must be maintained, not because of the institution, but in defense of the right of religion to speak fearlessly and unhindered wherever moral issues are at stake. A world is rebuilding in this day. The foundations for a new era in human history are being laid. Humanity comes to a new order of relations between man and nations and races. The outcomes are crucial beyond description. The selfish, sinister powers are moving swiftly and unhesitatingly toward new social control. If it is possible to achieve it they will throttle every new hope mankind cherishes. In antagonism to them are other forces, deriving their strength from elemental passions awakened by the promise of new privileges; and yet, deep and primal as these passions are, the goal they seek is narrow and selfish and materialistic. The age needs Christ in it—Christ's vision and Christ's spirit and Christ's unselfishness. Only the church has the conscience to make clear what is of Christ and what of Anti-Christ in this new day.

Has not the hour come for the assertion in a far greater and more representative way of this fundamental moral right of the church which is so generally flouted today? Does not the church—not the Protestant church, nor the Roman church, nor the Eastern church, but that great, indivisible church of God which is the body of Christ wherever it exists—need a Bill of Rights today?

The Gospel of Industrial Reconciliation

BEFORE this article appears in The Christian Century the writer will be on the seas in company with Sherwood Eddy and a party of Americans whom he is taking to England for purposes of studying industrial conditions in that country. Mr. Eddy is paying the expenses of his guests from New York to England, not as a personal favor to the members of the party, but as a contribution to the various enterprises they represent in the work of industrial conciliation. Mr. Ben Cherrington has been in England for a month arranging itineraries and interviews, and will have all things ready for two months of strenuous activity and investigation, with some speaking on behalf of Anglo-American good will thrown in on week-ends. British labor policy is much more advanced than American labor policy. The fact that England is so entirely an industrial country brings her industrial reconstruction problems to a crisis in a way we do not and cannot experience.

From his missionary apostolate to students the world around Mr. Eddy has recently turned to a mission of industrial instruction and conciliation among American students, intellectuals and industrial leaders. He believes our situation in this matter is full of danger in its bearing upon the future of all Christian enterprises. It will undo very largely our message to the non-Christian world if present tendencies toward suspicion, hate and strife are allowed to bear their Upas fruit. Hence he turns to lend a hand at putting things right at home before resuming his missionary work abroad. Mr. Eddy feels that the America he represents and which so largely supports all missionary enterprise and so universally stands in the non-Christian mind for the best product of a Christian civilization must settle its industrial strife on a Christian basis or render futile the world-wide evangel of Christianity. The International Committee of the Y. M. C. A., which he has long represented, bids him godspeed in this work and he continues to act under their auspices in the undertaking. Not all "Y" leaders advocate operating solely in the so-called "zone of agreement."

The Zone of Agreement

Certain city secretaries of the Y. M. C. A. have of late been meeting the inflamed industrial situation by advocating the doctrine that their organization should operate only in a "zone of agreement." They say that the Y. M. and Y. W. C. A., the church, and all such religious organizations shall keep hands off the question of economic relationships involving any difference of opinion. They will serve both employer and employee, like a sort of religious Red Cross society, while the war between them goes on. They propose to abandon the gospel of reconciliation, to say nothing of the prophetic gospel which denounces injustice and wrong and undertakes an educational program to make public opinion acquainted with the facts. Certain church leaders are advocating the same neutral attitude, and a few men of wealth are attempting to check all contrary inclination by a withdrawal of their checks from the contribution box.

Let the reader think, if he can, of Amos or Isaiah or Jeremiah operating in a "zone of agreement!" Suppose Jesus had said to his disciples, We will get an understanding with the Pharisees and Herodians and then keep within the "zone of agreement"! What if Paul had kept strictly within such a zone between missionary Christians and the Judaizers! Fancy if you can how the book of James would read had that apostle of the social gospel written nothing and done nothing in his church at Jerusalem that went beyond a zone of neutral ethics agreed upon between his church and the rich men whose selfishness he so vigorously denounced. All these makers of the Bible and interpreters of our Christian principles might have saved their lives and builded up existing religious institutions, but they would never have given us the age-enduring books of the prophets or the New Testament and we would have had today neither church nor Y. M. C. A.

The Zone of Agreement Versus the Gospel of Reconciliation

It is not safe operation within a zone of agreement that puts the principles of Jesus into the solution of class wars and labor troubles, nor is there any scriptural warrant for that type of institutional insurance scheme. Christ taught a gospel of reconciliation applied in terms of justice, the purging of selfishness and a willingness of the strong to give more than they take. The "zone of agreement" theory would withdraw Christian men and institutions from the fray and let the combatants fight it out on the pagan ground of force and violence and cunning, standing by to bind up the wounds and give mere personal service to the combatants. Theoretically it would be that, but practically it would, in our time, make the church a silent and unprotesting servant of the rich and powerful because the laboring classes have already largely withdrawn from the church and would, under such a policy, do so quite all together.

I do not mean that the religious institution is to become partisan to either side; that it cannot do and apply its gospel of reconciliation. But I do mean that it must first seek the facts which bear upon the human factor involved and then fearlessly and benevolently apply justice and righteousness to that situation. There can be no reconciliation with wrong unredressed, nor in situations where justice is neither defined nor applied. Churches and "Y" Associations might for a time be builded and well supported, but the kingdom of God would not be found in them and the heart of the gospel—its reconciling mission—would be crushed out of it by such crass institutionalism. The gospel and mankind were not made for the church, but the church and all other religious institutions were made for them.

Fellowships of Reconciliation

Just because it is an industrial country, Britain has been pushed ahead by very force of circumstances into an advanced stage of the problem of the relationship between capital and labor. Both Lord Northcliffe and the labor leader, Mr. J. H. Thomas, said, upon the conclusion of trips to this country, that England was a generation ahead of us in the matter of industrial relationships. The question of the right of labor to join unions is, said Northcliffe, no longer denied or even debated there, and the man who evolved the Whitely industrial representation and shop committee schemes has been accepted by all parties as the speaker of the house of commons. Industrial democracy is evolving in England, and while there are frictions and threatenings in the process, all parties are agreed as to the direction it should go, if not as to its outcome. The friction and trouble is perhaps just now due more to vast unemployment, gross war profiteering and the after-the-war psychology of suspicion, violence of temper and readiness to adopt club tactics. When one knows all the elements involved, he cannot help wondering that there is available at all a stabilizing force to prevent a break into radicalism.

The outstanding British labor leaders are also outstanding Christian men. On the other side also there are a large number of conspicuous Christians. The attitude of such great employers as Lord Leverhulme, the Bradburies, the Rowntrees and many others are powerful conciliating forces. There is a great intellectual personnel represented by such thinkers as the Webbs and Messrs. Tawney, Cole, Lansbury, Hobson, Hobhouse and many others, who are devoting their best thinking to a guidance of industrial development toward readjustment. In the pulpits are found many outstanding prophets and apostles of a more Christian industrial order and of the gospel of reconciliation as a solution. We go to confer with them all, to study their minds and methods as well as the actual industrial situation, and to set up an understanding between ourselves and them and all other men who believe that the way up and out is through a fellowship of reconciliation that merges all class lines into a Christian brotherhood.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

London, July, 1921.

IT looks as if there is to be in the immediate future a lively interest in the Bible. Many signs point to this. On the one hand, there has been in London a conference on Creative Christianity. The speakers are said to have met to protest against what they deemed the erroneous teaching of Canon Barnes and Dean Inge and in general to put the case against the extreme "critics" of the Bible. It was widely noted that Lord Hugh Cecil, a high churchman, was taking the field with the evangelicals. The speakers do not appear to have denounced all "higher criticism," but they agreed that it was time a halt was called and the perils of the road down which the critics were leading us should be revealed. At the same time, as reported in my last letter, the Roman church is planning a school of Bible study at Cambridge. From the other side, Mr. H. G. Wells has been discussing the Bible and calling for a Bible which shall give to our modern life what the Bible of our fathers did for them. At least he admits the part that the Bible has played. No living society can do without a Bible—and he calls for a Bible still.

G. B. S. Joins In

Now Mr. G. Bernard Shaw in his "Back to Methuselah" joins in the fray, and with characteristic audacity makes a beginning with a Bible for creative evolution. "I abandon the legend of Don Juan," he declares, "with its erotic associations, and go back to the legend of the Garden of Eden." It would be a strange Bible if its books were at all like these five acts of G. B. S., nor would any Christian in his senses call in this writer as an ally. Indeed, no party in politics or religion would be safe for five minutes from his scornful wit. At the same time there is some significance in the choice of his latest themes, and reverent students of the Bible may find the book worth their reading even though it makes them angry. Eve, for example, is speaking of some of her sons and sons' sons:

"And there is Tubal," she says, "who made this wheel for me which has saved me so much labor. And there is Enoch, who walks on the hills and hears the Voice continually, and has given up his will to do the will of the Voice, and has some of the Voice's greatness. When they come, there is always some new wonder or some new hope; something to live for."

This is finely said, and if Mr. Bernard Shaw has no light given to him upon the things which mean most to the Christian heart, and even if upon these the light that is in him is darkness, at least he has seen some other things clearly, and told of them with wit and courage. None the less, great evangelist of his own gospel of the life force as he is, there is no likelihood that his Bible will bring hope and peace to mankind. Some indeed are waiting still for a more serious attempt to obey the wisdom of the New Testament, which is already ours, before we cry out for a new gospel.

Mr. Lloyd George Lectures the Church

Much debate has been caused by the prime minister's counsel to the churches. The report of his speech represented him as warning the churches to keep from questions such as the coal strike and Ireland, on the ground that these were political questions upon which the spokesmen of the churches had not the necessary data. It has been pointed out that the bishops are members of the house of lords and men of at least as high an educational standard as the average senator. Some at least have been unkind enough to cast doubts upon the knowledge even of statesmen. Nor has the opportunity been lost to show that under other conditions, upon questions which involved quite as much technical knowledge, the prime minister once looked to the churches for their word of support. The very subject which he instanced as within the compass of the church, temperance reform, was once, and not very long ago, ruled out of the range of church interests. Members of churches were once warned by similar advisers not to touch the question of factory reform. Unhappily, they listened too readily, but they were not the greater for that reason. In every age, the church is forbidden by some of its friends from giving its testimony upon questions of living interest. They make it a safe archæological society. When the church obeys, it tends to become the tame chaplain of vested interests.

Premier Does the Church a Good Turn

The real value of the premier's counsel comes with the reaction against it. The bishops and other leaders in the churches have not hesitated to answer back. But there would be a still greater value if the churches were to provide means whereby its judgment, reinforced by the best knowledge of its students, could be pronounced upon the questions of the day. It is probably true that a church assembly may be as competent to judge an issue as an average political assembly, but that is not saying much. Our righteousness should exceed theirs. Without any doubt, the church has often lost weight through the failure to have a department thinking out the bearing of its principles upon living issues, and always intimately related to the general assemblies of the churches. We need moral passion, but we need no less the authority which comes from a mastery of the facts. After all, the churches ought to be grateful to Mr. Lloyd George.

The Music of the Sanctuary

Church music is receiving much attention in these days. Out of the past there are being brought the treasures of the early English masters, and in them the most modern of students take delight. Sir Henry Hadow, who is editing these ancient manuscripts, believes that they will take their place among the greatest works of music. Meanwhile, much is being done to dethrone the false gods of sentimental church music. Of the crusades against these there is none more effective than Dr. Martin Shaw, but there are few more difficult tasks than to persuade a congregation to abandon a "sweet," familiar and yet thoroughly bad tune. Not very many years ago, by patient continuance, certain free church congregations were persuaded to sing "Amen" at the end of every hymn. Now there is a reaction against this custom amongst the more modern folk, and it may become necessary, in order to keep up with the times, to reduce the Amens! There was once a captain at sea who in the absence of a chaplain read prayers, and inadvertently said the absolution, which it is not lawful for a layman to say. His lieutenant whispered to him of his mistake. "As you were!" thundered the voice of the captain. But this is neither here nor there.

Sir Henry Hadow, who is a great musical scholar, has been exhorting us to sing more: "We are not nearly enough of a singing nation, and it is more the pity because as a nation we can sing better than any other nation in Europe. We were once a nest of songbirds. I threw a meeting the other day into the greatest consternation by saying that if I had been heard singing by a policeman on my way to the meeting I should have been taken into custody at once. In no other capital of Europe would it excite the slightest remark. I have been in country after country where the men sing at their work, the women sing at the spinning wheel and the children sing at their little games in the roadway. It is their way, and a very wholesome way of expressing the joy of life."

Would the policeman on the American side of the Atlantic arrest such a joyful traveler? But the learned musician is right in telling us that we should sing more. In such times as these, we may find it hard to recover that old "careless rapture." Yet if the coal strike is really ending, and it looks as if it were, and above all if the nightmare of Ireland is removed, we might be tempted to run the gauntlet of the policemen and make a joyful noise unto the Lord.

The Philosophers and Einstein

Einstein has been here and has set a thousand tongues explaining his theories. So far as the mathematical facts are concerned, they are beyond one, and the "simplest" explanations are the hardest. But when the hasty and ill-equipped expositors of relativity come to philosophy and theology, their passports need examining. Einstein himself has said that the general theory of relativity is a purely physical doctrine, comparable with any metaphysic. He is not a philosopher, but some philosophers are ready to exploit his discovery. It is always necessary to warn the Christians not to tie up their religious experience to any system of speculative thought. The true philosophy must give an account of the religious life of the saints, but the saints need not understand intellectually all that they enjoy. Dr. A. E. Taylor, a really great metaphysician, has some wise words upon the attempts of philosophers to explain in their own abstract language the joy of the saints. He declines to believe that when the Christian saint speaks of the indwelling God who fills him with "joy unspeakable," he means no more than that "the indwelling God and his human tabernacle are both half-illusory masks for knowledge knowing itself." Of the thinkers who make such paraphrases it can be said in Dr. Taylor's words: They want to have the approval of the saint without committing themselves to any faith which would be derided as "unscientific" by the most worldly of scientific worldings. We do not believe that God is to be enjoyed on such terms. If you would find the God whom the Christian saints worship, you must be prepared to go out to meet him "bearing his reproach." In a time when so much, both good and evil, is coming to the west from the mystical east, it is well to have this reminder of the conditions upon which the Christian experience can be enjoyed, and it is all the more powerful coming as it does from a philosophic thinker. Christianity can never become merely a philosophical system, and it may be true still in the words Newman gives to the Angel speaking to Gerontius:

"It is thy very energy of thought That keeps thee from thy God."

As Canon Barnes says: "True faith is a product of the indirect action of the will. We must set ourselves to obey the moral law, to love and help our fellows, to seek purity and truth, to learn of Christ. Then, being pure in heart, we shall see God: our conversion will begin: the presence of Christ will be established within us: the sense of God's power and love will enfold us. In the depths of our being faith will thus grow; and, as it grows, will justify itself by the healthy unity which it gives to our complex nature."

CORRESPONDENCE

This Does the Heart Good

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: For a year I have been saying about The Christian Century, "It isn't true. There ain't no such animal. A paper as good as this simply isn't done. Anyway, it can't keep it up."

But you have kept it up! It is tremendous. Its fearlessness keeps hundreds of us going with a little more fearlessness in our separate fields. And they are separate! Its vision confirms our vision and clears the mists from the eyes of our souls.

Every issue is a thriller. Every issue I want to pass on to a dozen people of my parish, six reactionaries and six liberals, just to say, "I told you so." But I don't, for I can't risk losing it; I must file each one for future reading and quoting. It is all ammunition, of defense and offense!

I have just read "The Episcopal Church and Industrial Relations," by Spofford, in June 16th issue. I take a whack at Episcopal ecclesiasticism every time I get a chance, but, Mr. Spofford, almost thou persuadest me to be an Episcopalian. Why must the Church League for Industrial Democracy be confined to one sect? The inspiration of such a fellowship would mean much to all of us. Brother Congregationalists, let's organize one of our own—we have great social documents also. Let's fight together and hang together, and not separately.

And you other churches, why not do likewise? Then we'll federate socialized Christian leaders, and who shall down us!

China's Resources Tempt World's Greed

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In connection with Secretary Hughes' firm and righteous refusal to recognize the special rights of foreigners in certain Chinese provinces, and in view of China's sharing in the momentous international conference at Washington in November, a study of European aggression in Asia calls for much attention in America in the next few months. Our attention has been concentrated on German and Japanese aggression and we have been almost blind to the far more heinous aggression of other powers. We know little of how far Great Britain and France and their financiers are pushing their claims, though the new Russia is apparently withdrawing hers.

The immense potential energy and rich resources of China have excited the cupidity of the capitalists of the world and of some of their governments, and America, alone, has been her friend. A stupendous opportunity is given Secretary Hughes to lead the nations to take the first step now toward the ultimate withdrawal from the whole continent of Asia of the white race as a governing and dominating influence. Lothrop Stoddard assures us that if this is not finally done a stupendous racial conflict is inevitable. It will be remembered that President Wilson at Paris forcibly expressed his hope that not only Shantung but all other foreign possessions would revert to their original owners.

Says Herbert Adams Gibbons in his valuable book, "The New Map of Asia": "No commentary is needed to drive home to the reader the heartlessness, the immorality, the hypocrisy, the brutality of the European powers in their relations with Asiatic races. . . . The Japanese have no more contempt and the Chinese no more dislike for Germans than for other Europeans; all are tarred with the same brush."

Professor John Dewey, not only an able philosopher, but also a shrewd political observer and one whose counsel now should be carefully noted, has been studying the Chinese situation on the spot for the last two years. There are two Chinas—the north with its corrupt Peking government which seems to have played into the hands of the Japanese, and the rebellious south with its capital at Canton and under the leadership of Sun Yat Sen. Professor Dewey writes in the New Republic of July 6: "One of the two presidents, no matter which, recently stated that a renewal of the Anglo-Japanese alliance meant the partition of China. In this division, Japan would take the north and Great Britain the south," i. e., "in regard to the tendency of policies and events."

Professor Dewey finds that in Canton the British are as much dreaded as the Japanese are in the north. The Japanese influence in the south is negligible. But the British Cassell Collieries Contract in that region which was drawn up in April of 1920, during the temporary control of "military carpet-baggers" from a neighboring province, was knowingly made by a British company with a government which no more represented the people of the province than the military government of Germany represented the people of Belgium during the war. This contract gave the British company a monopoly of the coal in most of the provinces along the lines of the only existing railways and those to be built. The features of the contract, as given by Professor Dewey, deserve careful study. Note the "dollar a ton royalty on all coal mined," as compared with the usual ten cents a ton royalty and observe how clever have been British seekers for concessions compared with their pupils in cupidity—the Japanese.

The British interests at Hong Kong are endeavoring to control the entire industrial development of this most flourishing province of China. Hong Kong is now the port for the whole region and the British there are trying to prevent the building near Canton of a first-class harbor and Chinese port. These are some of the things which Professor Dewey reports and on which our press should give us more detailed information, for these have far-reaching significance.

The liberal element in England is doubtless opposed to this selfish policy of exploitation. It is incumbent on the liberals in all lands now to reinforce each other.

LUCIA AMES MEAD.

Mr. DuBois' Position

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I am writing you relative to an article in The Christian Century dated July 14, over the signature of Professor Alva W. Taylor, entitled "Black versus White." There are many sentiments of justice and merit in the article, in fact the article taken as a whole is of a very high type and permeated with Christian thoughtfulness and good will.

There is one statement in the article, however, to which I want to call attention and in a measure to correct if I may be permitted to do so. In speaking of the Tulsa riot, Professor Taylor spoke of "Certain Negroes, disciples of the DuBois theory that their only way to justice is through blood." In another part of the article he writes as follows: "The teachings of the DuBois school that Negro rights will be won only by Negro blood, are given open ground for fructification." Towards the close of the article he groups the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People with the Ku Klux Klan, seeming to infer that the Ku Klux Klan is to certain southern whites what the N. A. A. C. P. is to the colored people in general.

While I am not always in sympathy with the stand that is taken by Mr. DuBois in his writings I have never gained the impression from reading somewhat extensively after him that he was an advocate of "justice through blood." I desire to quote a paragraph from the editorial page of The Crisis of July, 1921, page 101. This quotation is from the pen of Mr. DuBois himself, and reads as follows: "Some folks seem to think that because The Crisis and the N. A. A. C. P. preach continually the gospel of fighting for your rights and standing up against oppression we mean by this that the Negro is to gain his place in the world by blood and conquest. God forbid! If the rights of the darker races can only be bought by brute force, then we face the saddest future that ever the world looked upon. But what we and what all thinking men mean by self-assertion and fighting is that when human beings insistently and even obtrusively succeed in putting their case before the world, they gain so great a multitude of allies that their cause is bound to succeed. The only difficulty is that such persons are so easily persuaded not to cry out, not to complain, not to disturb the world. Complaint, agitation, insistence day in and day out upon the wrong of evil, is a civilized and justifiable program; but after all its greatest effect must be upon the hearts and thoughts of men, and if in meetings of amity and friendship white and colored people in this land can sit together and talk frankly, the Negro problem is solved." I believe that this paragraph states sufficiently clear his position without any further comments of my own.

Concerning the N. A. A. C. P. and Ku Klux Klan, I feel that they are as wide apart in their design and method as the people that make up their different memberships. The Ku Klux Klan is organized to deny such a thing as the brotherhood of men and seeks to perpetuate an aristocracy of white blood. It seeks to do this by overriding the laws of the country and taking affairs into its own hands. The N. A. A. C. P. is striving to attain justice where justice has been denied. It does not seek to sidestep law and order but makes of them an ally in its cause for righteousness. There is as much difference in the methods and motives of the two organizations as day and night and to even speak of them in the same connotation is to do the N. A. A. C. P. a grave injustice. The N. A. A. C. P. is not an infallible organization and should not be construed as attempting to be such, but it is working upon a real constructive line of work. It is more or less idealistic and is somewhat radical, but the fundamental basis upon which it rests I believe is sound.

I felt that these corrections ought to be made both in justice to Mr. DuBois and to the N. A. A. C. P. Assuring you again of my appreciation of Professor Taylor's article and of the splendid space which you are giving these days to the problems of race adjustment between the white and colored races, I am,

BOOKS

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE TREATY. By Andre Tardieu. The author of this latest book on the Treaty is the French High Commissioner to the United States, Member of the Cabinet and delegate of the French government to the Peace Conference. Colonel House says he was "the only nearly indispensable man at the conference." As Clemenceau's right hand man, Tardieu knows the bargains that were made at the sessions, and he here makes them public property. It is not surprising that France is pictured as the chief hero of the war, but it must be said that a sincere effort is made by the author to do justice to all parties concerned. The book is full of facts, not mere generalizations, as was true of the work of Keynes on the Treaty. (Bobbs Merrill. $4)

LABOR'S CRISIS, by Sigmund Mendelsohn. The value of this little book lies in the fact that the author reveals the viewpoint of a multitude of conservative employers of benevolent mind. He is sympathetic, in general, with the labor movement and makes astute comments on present-day conditions and tendencies. Yet at some points he seems quite inconsistent with himself. He speaks favorably of insurance against disability, unemployment, sickness and old age, but is very hesitant about a minimum wage law. He sees the moral implications of the commodity theory of labor and repudiates it, and even introduces a chapter on "moral economics"; yet he refers to the "cold fact" that "altruistic principles cannot play an important part in industrial and commercial life." But the book is revealing and is obviously sincere. (Macmillan, $1.50.)

MEN AND STEEL, by Mary Heaton Vorse. This volume is a series of sketches and penpictures with much emotional coloring but not without literary or social value. It is not in any sense comparable to the Report on the Steel Strike by the Interchurch World Movement, yet it supplements it with a mass of such "human" material as is needed to complete a picture of the industry and of the strike. The author is frankly presenting the strikers' case and makes no pretense of impartiality. She sees only one side. But the reader gains the impression that exposed to the same situation he too would see but one side. Hence the book is better as literature than as a contribution to the solution of a problem. (Boni, $1.00.)

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF THE CHRISTIAN SOUL. By George Stevens. The writer believes that Christianity is an educative process whereby the spirit of man may be trained into hatred and fear of sin. The results of his research in the sphere of subconsciousness in its relation to the soul are here set down in the language of students of the human mind. (Doran, $1.50)

ECONOMICS, by James Cunnison. A brief and effective survey of the field of economics, written from the point of view of the new school. The author's viewpoint as honorary director of the Glasgow School of Social Study and Training influences his theory as a lecturer on economics in the University of Glasgow. He regards the industrial structure of society not as fixed but changing, and economics not as an exact science but as a deeply human description of what is taking place in production of wealth, division of labor, the nature of exchange, the laws that govern value, and the principles upon which the products of industry are distributed among individuals. The volume is unusual for clarity and compactness. The technical terms and concepts of economics are stated simply, and the book keeps close to reality. It is especially valuable to persons not familiar with economics, and to those who desire to consider the subject from the point of view of social work. (Dutton, $2.00.)

THE PATH OF THE KING. By John Buchan. The author of "Greenmantle" here tells a story of individuality and power. The tale is based upon the belief that genius does not die out, but leaps, as a flaming spark, from generation to generation, kindling the flame eternal. The book closes with Lincoln as a leading figure. (Doran $1.90.)

BUFF: A COLLIE. By Albert Payson Terhune. As a lover of animals and as a skillful portrayer of their characteristics, Mr. Terhune has won fame by his "Lad" and "Bruce." Any one who loves dogs—and who does not—will enjoy this book. It tells of the strange adventures that befell a collie which was both gentle and a hard fighter. (Doran, $2.00.)

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Proof of Vitality*

HOW many churches can measure up to the test of the Antioch church as shown in this lesson? The thing that impresses us most as we study this story, is not the first leg of the first missionary journey nor that violent condemnation of the sorcerer, Elymas, although we like the direct way in which Paul knocked him out. The impressive thing is that the Antioch church under the ministrations of Barnabas, Paul and other strong and good men had reached the place where it could no longer be self-contained. It must expand, it must share its life, it must press out into new fields. There are two types of churches: (1) One seeks to be the whole thing. This church boasts of big influential membership and offerings but never dreams of forming another congregation. It is too selfish to give up any of its valued members to form another group. The Year Book would not carry so many names in that case. There are many cities of from 100,000 to 150,000 where only one church of a certain persuasion exists and only because the fixed policy of that church is to hold everything to itself, to make a great name for itself. (2) The other type seeks little for itself. It throws off one mission after another. Every new suburb sees a new church started. Strong members are thrust out to man these new fields. When years have passed you will find ten or twenty prosperous churches as well as the old mother church. Here is a Mother with children, while in the other case you have a stately dame—but childless! The proof of a church's vitality is its ability to bear children. The fact to notice in this study is that Antioch had grown in grace, in numbers, in unselfishness, in missionary zeal, in love for Christ, in prayer until the urge became imperative and we see this early church gathering into a great prayer-meeting, even with fasting, asking God to send out laborers into the vast harvest fields. What courage that must have taken then! All untried were these fields. We have centuries of experience to cheer us on. We can see the changes wrought in China, we can see the miracles of the Congo, we have seen the power of the gospel to make republics and cast out cannibalism and every sin. Upon such evidence we send forth our young people, but in Antioch there was only the faith and the high pressure of true religion. What would happen in any one of our churches if after a series of earnest sermons a conviction were developed that out of that very group someone or more ought to go to the foreign field? Prayer meetings would be held where men and women would pray for guidance and all would be ready to go or send! How long would the young men and young women withstand such an atmospheric pressure? Jesus lifted up his eyes and saw the harvest fields, ripe, dead ripe for the reapers. He told us to pray that the Lord would send forth reapers. Instead of many of the dull and inane prayers which we hear in modern pulpits suppose the preacher should get up some morning and with a thrill in his voice and a throb in his heart would say, "O God, we pray Thee to thrust forth some of our group as foreign missionaries, for Christ's sake, Amen"? Suppose he stopped right there? Suppose that the elders caught that note, thought the problem through until they would be willing for their own sons and daughters to go and that then they would get up in prayer-meeting Wednesday night and pray after this fashion, "O God, in Jesus' name we ask that right out of our own families Thou wouldst send forth laborers into Thy harvest fields; lay Thy hands upon us or upon our children if it be Thy will but send the reapers forth, Amen." How long would the people stand that kind of earnest praying, backed by conviction? Not long. The seminaries would be filled, the missionary colleges would be over-crowded. Suppose your class this morning would go apart into a quiet room and make such prayers, who dares to think what would happen? "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that He send forth reapers into that harvest." That is a command, as imperative as any other and how shamefully neglected. When you talk of Apostolic Christianity do not overlook this!

RELIGION AMONG AMERICAN MEN

A GREAT cross section of American life —this our army in the World War has surely been. What it has shown of the real religious life of American men, and the vital lessons which the church should learn from it, are presented in this, the first of the studies made by the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook. Every minister who wishes to know the heart of the average American man—and especially the young man—should read this significant volume. Cloth, $2.00.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Episcopalians Join in Federation Work

For a long time the church federation movement has halted because the Protestant Episcopal church has not joined heartily. The Lambeth Conference spoke a clear word on this point. While not favoring national federation movements, it urged the Episcopalians to join in local church councils. In many city federations all over America the change of front is being felt. This strong communion deserved more place in the leadership of the Christian forces than in the past it has exercised. Isolation kept it impotent in the larger community movements. In this new day a wholesome and gracious influence will be wielded on the church of Christ by the Episcopalians.

Dr. Douglas Changes Pastorate

Dr. Lloyd C. Douglas has resigned as pastor of First Congregational church of Ann Arbor, Mich., and accepted the pastorate of First Congregational church of Akron, O. In the latter city he will have a corps of assistants and the use of a church plant described as "the very last word in comfort, convenience and serviceableness." He will begin his duties in the new field in September. Dr. Douglas is known to Christian Century readers as a frequent contributor to its pages. He is the author of "Wanted—A Congregation."

Woman Heads the Baptist Denomination This Year

The Baptists have "scooped" the Christian world in one thing at least. While the various denominations have debated the question of the place of woman in the church, the northern Baptists have elected one to head their organization this year. The following is the officary of the Northern Baptist convention for the coming year: President, Mrs. W. A. Montgomery, Rochester, N. Y.; first vice president, Mr. Corwin S. Shank, Seattle, Wash.; second vice president, Rev. J. J. Ross, Chicago, Ill.; corresponding secretary, Rev. William C. Bitting, St. Louis, Mo.; recording secretary, Rev. Maurice A. Levy, Pittsfield, Mass.; statistical secretary, Rev. Charles A. Walker, West Chester, Pa.; treasurer, Mr. Frank L. Miner, Des Moines, Iowa.

Lloyd-George the Greatest of Bishop-Makers

No premier in modern times has created so many bishops of the Established church as has David Lloyd-George, premier of the British Empire. This is the more astonishing in view of the fact that Mr. Lloyd-George is a free-churchman and belongs to a denomination which believes that church and state should be separate. The church of England has forty-two bishops in England and Wales, and sixteen of these have been appointed by the present premier. The influence of these appointments on the church of England is important. While the premier cannot altogether override ecclesiastical sentiment, nevertheless his appointments have tended to weaken the high church party and to give the broad churchmen a better standing in the nation. The present anomalous situation has led many Episcopalians of England to come over to the idea of disestablishment. The idea of a free churchman appointing the bishops is very distasteful to those who hold to the high church view of the church of England.

Bryan's Attack on Evolution Circulated

The recent address of William Jennings Bryan at Moody Institute, Chicago, directed against the believers in the evolutionary hypothesis has been circulated widely over the country. Mr. Bryan turns the shafts of ridicule which have made him feared on the public forum against the Darwinian ideas. He believes that in this new crusade he is fighting the major enemy of Christian civilization. In the introduction to his address he says: "I come to present to you the Bible as the word of God, and to protest against the enemies, open and secret, who would lift man from his knees, take from him his faith in God and withdraw from his life the restraining influence of a belief in immortality. That is what I believe the Darwinian doctrine is doing. It leads people into agnosticism and pantheism, and plunges the world into the worst of wars and divides society into classes, fighting each other on a brute basis. It is time that the Christian church should understand what is going on and array itself against those enemies of the church, Christianity and civilization."

Settle the Question of Sunday Movies by Conference

About a year ago the moving picture theaters of Kirksville, Mo., began giving Sunday exhibitions. Recently there was a conference in the office of the prosecuting attorney between the managers and owners of the theaters on one hand, and the leading members of the Christian church on the other. The church people insisted that the theaters were hurting the work of the churches and claimed that the show houses could be closed by law. The theater people denied that legal action would be effective, but offered to close up their houses on Sunday voluntarily in view of the statement of the church people that the films were hurting church attendance. Thus the Sunday movie controversy which disturbs so many communities these days has found an amicable and friendly settlement in Kirksville.

Open Air Preaching Much in Vogue

The unusually hot summer has encouraged a great increase in open-air preaching on the part of the churches. Church lawns are being utilized for congregations with chairs placed in the open. First Congregational church of Oak Park, Ill., has an out-door pulpit of stone as a part of the regular equipment of the church. At Evanston, Ill., in addition to a service in First Baptist church under community auspices, there is an open-air service in Foster Field, a playground, where the audiences are much larger than in the church. In smaller cities there are meetings from the courthouse steps or in the town parks.

Women Plan to Care for Children of Factory Operatives

A group of women met in the Metropolitan Tower in New York recently to consider the needs of the millions of children of factory operatives on foreign fields. The coming of western industrialism to eastern lands gives to the missionary problem a new angle. In the view of the women there is also a new opportunity. With the mother at work in the factories Christian care may bring to the children of the eastern lands much more quickly a knowledge of the Christian gospel. The committee decided that in the next four years a worker would be placed in each field for service among the children. These workers will be directed by the World's Sunday School Association.

Chautauqua Recognizes Place of Missions

While the mother Chautauqua in New York has always had many Bible lectures on its program there has never been any provision for the teaching of Christian missions. This year Dr. J. C. Archer of the Divinity School of Yale University was called to give two courses on Christian missions. There is rumor of the establishing of a missions house which would make the missionary interest a permanent part of the Chautauqua program.

Roof Garden Socials a Church Enterprise

The intense heat in Texas in the summertime tends to slow down church work a great deal in spite of the well known zeal of the church workers of that enterprising state. South End Christian church of Houston made ready for the summertime by providing a roof garden. This summer it is being used for a series of socials and one of the items at a recent entertainment was a moving picture exhibition. Rev. W. D. Ryan recently became pastor of this church, coming from Youngstown, Ohio.

Disciples at Bethany Park Will Debate

Disciples ministers in the early days were often called upon to defend their views upon the public forum. The debating history of Alexander Campbell is a well known feature in the church life of the past century. In these latter days there has been so little of debate that even Disciple problems have not been often discussed in the church conventions. Hoosier ministers believe that the way out of some modern difficulties is through a return to the forum. At the Ministers'

Retreat at Bethany Park Assembly, near Indianapolis, the first week in August there will be two debates every day. The questions proposed indicate that the ministers are going to face real problems rather than fictitious ones. Some of the questions up for discussion are: "Professional Evangelism vs. Educational Evangelism," "The Church College vs. the State University," "The Community Church vs. the Denominational Church," "The Closed Sunday vs. the Recreational Sunday," "The Church Should Investigate the Industrial Situation," "Ultimate Authority for the Individual Christian is Found in the Christian Consciousness Rather than in the Scriptures," "Should Disciples Emphasize Christian Unity or the Restoration of the New Testament Church," "The Disciples Should Become a Representative Democracy in Control of Their Missionary and Educational Agencies."

Unitarians Will Be Fellowshipped

The bitterness of the ancient Unitarian controversy of New England is abating as the years go by. This is well illustrated in a recent action taken by the executive committee of the Massachusetts Sunday School Association. This committee has voted to receive Unitarian and other disfellowshipped schools into fellowship providing the district associations approve the action of the committee. The Universalists were received several years ago and under the present action it is contemplated that the Unitarians might accept membership in the association. The fear that the Unitarians might get the best of the argument seems to have abated in evangelical circles, for isolation speaks to the world of just such a fear.

Jews Sadly Divided Over Zionism

Zionism threatens to be the rock on which Jews will split, just as the second coming doctrine menaces the Christian churches. Both Reformed and Orthodox Jews are split without regard to the usual theological differences and along new lines. The anti-Zionists are alarmed at the prospect of a Jewish state in Palestine and are organizing to oppose it. The Zionists themselves are now split into two organizations. The society headed by Judge Brandeis is opposed to taking European immigrants to Palestine entirely at American expense. The other society looks upon the Zionist project more from the philanthropic than from the industrial and political viewpoint.

Rev. Alexander Paul Becomes Candidate Secretary

Rev. Alexander Paul, a returned missionary from China, has been drafted by the United Christian Missionary Society to fill the place of candidate secretary, made vacant by the death of D. O. Cunningham. Mr. Paul has not consented to occupy this position permanently since he much prefers the work on the foreign field. In China he has been known as a man of open vision, seeing the problems of the mission field not only in terms of the individual experience, but also from the standpoint of the whole nation. A native of Ireland, he will carry into his work as candidate secretary the eloquence and enthusiasm of his native land. During the coming year he will visit colleges and state universities in an effort to commend the task on the foreign field to the enthusiasm of Disciples young people.

Young Minister Scores a Success

Rev. Kirby Page, a young Disciples minister, has scored a unique success in a metropolitan field. He took the Ridgewood Community church of Brooklyn, N. Y., which was on its last legs, having only seven active members at the time. In three years 301 new members have been received, and the present membership of the church is 258. Mr. Page is closing his work with the Ridgewood church to devote himself to research work in connection with the work headed up by Sherwood Eddy. Mr. Page is an author and lecturer as well as a minister.

Temperance Workers Are in Disagreement

A bitter feud has broken out among the temperance workers at Washington. Mr. Edwin C. Dinwiddie was for a number of years connected with the Anti-Saloon League, and used to be credited with many of its victories. He resigned a year ago, under pressure from the league leaders, the latter assert. He holds to a moderate position in the matter of law enforcement while the league officials foster the more drastic bills. Mr. Dinwiddie is now the superintendent of the National Temperance Bureau, the Washington representative of the International Order of Good Templars and the president of the International Congress against Alcoholism. Mr. Dinwiddie recently defended the action of Attorney General Palmer for ruling in favor of medicinal beer.

Methodists Declare a Dividend on Their Publishing Work

The Methodist Book Concern has just issued its annual report, and declared the annual dividend. The money goes into the pension fund of the church and in former days was the chief item of support for the aged and disabled ministers of the denomination. The dividend this year is $275,000, which is a considerable sum in view of the difficulties of the publishing business in these days of high costs. The Methodist Book Concern is charged with the publication of books, Sunday school supplies and periodicals which are used by a denomination of six million people.

Federal Council Organizes Commission on Racial Relations

The riot at Tulsa and other portentous events has led the Federal Council of Churches to organize a new commission on Negro Churches and Race Relations. The first meeting of the new commission was held at Washington, D. C., on July 12. The meeting was presided over by John J. Eagen, of Atlanta, Ga. He is president of the Atlanta Council of Churches and one of the leading Christian laymen of the south. The commission numbers about one hundred white and colored churchmen, most of them being citizens of the southland. These men insist that there is no inevitable conflict between the races, since humanity is an organism. The ideas on one hand, that the races should be segregated, or on the

Presbyterians Send Out New Missionaries

THE Presbyterian church is sending out 111 new missionaries this year. These appointees met the secretaries, board members and furloughed missionaries in New York recently for final instructions. This is an annual custom of the Presbyterians. An address of welcome was delivered by Dr. George Alexander, president of the board of foreign missions. Addresses were also delivered by Dr. Robert E. Speer and Dr. Arthur J. Brown. Dr. Brown gave the new missionaries some wholesome negatives. He said: "It is no part of your aim to Americanize the people, nor to interfere with their manners or customs unless there is a moral question involved. Nor is secular education the missionary aim. Neither must you exploit your own denomination." Dr. Speer spoke on the missionary motive. "The highest motive is the motive of obedience," he declared. "Another great motive is gratitude, the inability to keep to ourselves what Christ has given us. Christ's message must reach the heart of the people. Preaching the gospel is not giving out, but getting in. Our hearts must be the altar and Christ's love the flame." Fifteen of the missionaries go for special terms and special projects while the others go in the regular way to a life work. It is interesting to note that eighteen of the group are ordained men. There are eight doctors, eight nurses, and thirty-two educators and evangelists. Of the women, twenty-nine are wives or fiancées of other missionaries. Among the special term missionaries are four agriculturists, two architects, six teachers and three wives of missionaries. The furloughed missionaries spoke in the practical vein, advising with regard to travel convenience, house-keeping problems on the field and many other every-day matters. The missionary girls among the appointees were urged not to be diverted from their life work by marriage to men of no missionary purpose, and the single men missionaries were told right out to look for a life companion among the girls of missionary inclination. The assignment of the missionaries to the various fields is now practically complete. Assignments are made after careful consultation with the new missionaries.

other that they be amalgamated, are condemned. It is thought the commission may be a clearing house for the races. Mob violence will be denounced throughout the churches cooperating with the Federal Council, for on this matter all Christians can agree.

Astonishing Results from Rural Survey

The Ohio Federation of Churches has published some of the results of a rural survey which was made recently. Some astonishing results are presented in maps and graphs. Summerford Community, in Madison county, has 300 people at the community center and approximately 775 in the whole community. Three church buildings are in the midst of the community, one without services and the other two with non-resident pastors. The churches confine their efforts to a small section of the area with the result that two thirds of the people are unchurched. Thus overchurching in one section has meant utter religious neglect in another. The same sort of a situation is to be found in Rome Community in Adams county. In Meigs county there are 31 resident pastors. All of these are located in twelve of the twenty-four communities in the county, leaving twelve communities without a single resident pastor. A strip of territory eight miles wide and thirteen miles long has not a single resident pastor. The survey is such an indictment of modern denominationalism as to shake to its foundations the present method of organizing the church.

Bible Study in Texas Schools

The study of the Bible has been introduced into the public schools in Hereford, Tex. Through the leadership of a Christian layman who is a tither, the Bible courses were established in 1917. In the high school the courses are elective, but in the grade schools all students are required to take the work. Two forty-five minute periods a week have been given in the high school, and a total enrolment of 250 was secured last year. After a year of experimentation during which time the teacher was paid by Mr. G. A. F. Parker, the churches of Hereford realized the value of the work, and they are now underwriting the expense. It is the testimony of the superintendent of schools that the problem of discipline in the schools has been made vastly easier by the introduction of the Bible courses.

"A Warless World by 1923" the New Slogan

Christian Endeavor now has a new slogan. It will be remembered that in 1911 the world was startled by a slogan "A Saloonless Nation by 1923." The great convention in New York City early in July adopted a new slogan equally startling, "A Warless World by 1923." It was curious that only a day or so after the slogan was adopted, President Harding called the disarmament congress. Dr. F. E. Clark is very happy over the great New York convention which brought together 16,000 people from all parts of the world. The society now numbers four million members, and has 80,000 societies living on five continents and speaking over a hundred different languages. Dr. Clark said at the conclusion of the convention: "We have gained from this convention the spirit and incentive to go back to our homes and carry forward the great work to which we are consecrated. Christian Endeavor is stronger than ever, better organized, and has a mighty fine staff of field secretaries throughout the world. Our future has never been so bright, especially as we find the various denominations growing more receptive, almost day by day."

New Era Magazine Will Have a New Editor

The last General Assembly of the Presbyterian church directed that in the future the New Era Magazine should be conducted by the boards in charge of the benevolences of the church. In pursuance of this policy a committee of seven has been formed. The journal will have a change of name and will be called the Presbyterian Magazine henceforth. Dr.

Fighting for Faith

ONE of the great hours in the National Congregational Council comes when the council preacher brings his spiritual message to the ministers and the churches. Dr. Gaius Glenn Atkins of Detroit performed this service at Los Angeles with rare insight and power. Interpreting the wistful mood of many in our churches today he told how an oldtime hero fought for his faith in the midst of the turmoil and tragedy of his own day. Many of our readers will be heartened by this message of hope. Dr. Atkins said in part:

"This old story of Elijah's has a meaning for our time. It is the story of a lonely and discouraged man who had been fighting for his faith against long odds and who had seemed for the moment to win, but who discovered when his great day was over that though you may slay the priests of false gods with the sword, you cannot change the hearts of men by any such weapon as that. His work seemed to have failed, and he fled. All this is as familiar as anything in the Bible and belongs to ancient customs and ancient times. But the splendid spiritual insights of the story have a timeless truth.

"For we, too, who thought ourselves but yesterday to have won such a fight for the kingdom of God as men had never won before and to be standing on the threshold of a new world, have been taught as Elijah, that though you may do much with the sword you can not by such a weapon as that so change the hearts of men as to bring true the hopes and dreams of the years. We have made Elijah's mistake, we have fallen a little into Elijah's despair. We need Elijah's saving bosom.

"And first we need a true understanding of God's true ways. Only the sense of a power and wisdom beyond our own is great enough either to comfort or control or inspire us. A time which cannot face back upon a greater than itself, a time unchecked in its haste and unawed in its pride and unguided in its folly—and un comforted in its sorrows and unsaved in its sins by a living faith in God is both hopeless and helpless. The world needs God.

"But that is so true a commonplace as to need no dwelling upon—least of all, in this presence. We know our need of God well enough, and each one of us in his own way gets him a god, for wherever our loyalties and adorations and residences are, there our God is—be our creeds what they may.

"And these real gods of ours, these gods that really move and rule us, do because they move and rule us, make our souls and our worlds. If, then, we could come only to a true understanding of God's true ways and a hearty obedience thereto we might fill our souls and our world with the wonder and beauty of God and so our understanding of God becomes more important than anything else in the world save two things—our love for God and our obedience to his will."

"In the story of Elijah two contrasting conceptions of God are put one against the other: God as force, against God as reason, appeal to understanding. God as the one who drives, as against a God who calls. God, as wind and fire and earthquake, against the God of the still small voice. Nay, it was not a contrast, it was a correction. It was only Elijah who had supposed God as these shaking, burning, beating forces. But God was the quiet, to be heard only by the hushed soul and working in a quiet, inward way.

"Our time needs to be taught that. The fire, wind and earthquake live still in our society and our souls. We are impatient and fearful of quiet forces, our approved methods are the 'drive,' our considerable concern is with our machinery, and our final weapon is force. We forge our guns for our fears or our desires, and load our shells with destruction and terror. And still we are neither safely at peace nor do any of our concerns too much prosper in our hands. May it not be that we have the wrong gods and that we need to be taught anew that God is in the still small voice.

"That is to say, God is to be found in reason and conscience and in holy obedience to those true laws of life which are always spiritual. God is in insight and understanding, and in such methods as may finally win in the relationship of men of good will. He is in slow and patient things, in growth, in education, in the recasting of life from within, in the slow conformity of a troubled world to true values and methods, and ends, through the transformation of life itself. There was no other way for a lonely prophet 3000 years ago. There is no other method for the church today."

James H. Snowden has been elected as editor. Dr. Snowden has taught in the Presbyterian Seminary at Pittsburgh and is known for his sound and scholarly books on a variety of religious subjects. Mr. Walter I. Clarke, who has been editing the magazine, will continue with the journal until October 1, when the new order of things begins. The bureau of publicity of the church will henceforth confine its efforts to advertising the Presbyterian denomination through a press bureau service to secular and religious papers throughout the United States. This press bureau service has been very efficiently organized the past year and has helped to make Presbyterian work as well known as that of any denomination in the country.

Missionary Administrator Has a Great Trip

Dr. S. G. Inman, secretary of the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America, has returned from a trip of inspection in Latin-American fields. Among other experiences he went up the Parana river to Corrientes, one of the cities which has been allocated to the Disciples of Christ. He has held conferences with some of the strongest men of the Latin American continent. Among his other experiences has been the privilege of lecturing in some of the great universities of the southern continent. After completing his work in Latin America, he went to Spain and Portugal to confer with publishers about the publication of Spanish literature. Dr. Inman has made himself conversant with the thought and life of the Latin Americans in a way quite unique for this time, and his expert knowledge is at the service of all the mission boards operating in these fields.

Church Advertisers Hold Convention

Several years ago the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World organized a group of churchmen in the interest of larger publicity for the church. The advertising convention was held at Atlanta, Georgia, this year, the middle of June, and the church section was presided over by Dr. Christian F. Reisner. In the church program one of the unique addresses was that by Rev. Hubert Cowley-Carroll, rector of Trinity Episcopal church of Hamilton, O., on "Extending the Kingdom of God by Wireless Telephone." He sends his service by wireless each Sunday evening, and it is received by a large number of amateur operators. There is a small outfit carried in a suitcase which connects up for the benefit of sick people. A Pittsburgh rector follows the same practice.

Commission to Study Education in China

The recent Baptist convention in Des Moines created a commission to go to the orient for a year and study the subject of Christian education. Among the appointees on this commission are Dr. E. D. Burton of the University of Chicago and Rev. Frank W. Padelford, secretary of the board of education. Dr. Burton has been largely influential in his denomination in connection with mission work, and his appointment on this important commission in the face of the hue and cry of the conservatives is a great tribute to his probity and intellectual soundness.

A church college gives religious training a state school may not give. A state university gives a broader and more thorough training than the average church college can give.

Ministerial students earn their way preaching for near-by churches.

Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?

By Albert Parker Fitch

"Can the church survive in the changing order?" It is a real question. We have a way of supposing that she cannot perish, but there is no such a thing as permanency of this sort in the social structure.

The question is not only real, it is grave, important. At few other times in man's mental and moral history has he more needed the guiding and steadying leadership of a strong religious organization than now.

Can the church survive in the changing order? Well, the answer will depend upon the extent and character of her faith. The day has come for dropping a liberal apologetic for scholastic Christianity; for trying to define ancient phrases which once carried an open and ingenuous meaning; for reinterpreting historical movements so as to make them un-historically acceptable; for reading twentieth century sophistries into good third century metaphysics.

Religious Education in Your School

THIS is written only for pastors who feel some measure of responsibility for the quality of literature going into the hands of their Sunday-school scholars. And, no doubt, all pastors who read The Christian Century are of that sort. Their point of view is that of religious education. The Sunday-school to them is more than an aggregation of units brought together each week to go through a certain formal program—calling the roll, “doing” the lesson, “taking up the pennies,” asking for birthday money, and telling the children to be sure to “have a good lesson” for next Sunday! The Sunday-school is to them rather The Church Studying the Word of Eternal Truth, and developing in minds and hearts the spirit of the Christian religion. It is, indeed, the church’s best chance to guarantee Christly men and women in the next generation, as well as in this. To pastors who hold this high ideal of the work of the Sunday-school, the matter of literature becomes a most vital one. Second only to the influence of the teacher in the life of the pupil is that of the literature upon which the scholars feed their minds and souls. And, in many cases, we are sure the influence of the literature comes first.

Why you should be interested in The Bethany Graded Lessons (Interdenominational Syndicate)

There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.

They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.

They are free from the sectarian spirit.

They are soundly and fervently evangelical.

They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.

They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.

Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.

They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—several leading denominations have cooperated to produce them and are now using them.

Every school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

Illinois Governor Severely Strains Popular Loyalty

THE criminal charges against Governor Small and Lieutenant Governor Sterling are the scandal of the nation. Until the case has been given its legal hearing the fair-minded citizen will try to withhold judgment, even though he be filled with the gravest misgivings. Every man is innocent until he is proved guilty, and this principle must be applied even to politicians, though in such a case it is hard to keep people from acting on the reverse principle. Meanwhile, it must be said that Governor Small is making it hard for the fair minded public to keep a neutral mood. His course from the first announcement of the grand jury's findings has been anything but that which an innocent man should have adopted. In threatening to resist arrest with the power of the militia; in allowing his attorneys to set up the claim, as maladroit as it is ridiculous, that the king can do no wrong; and, at the time of our going to press, in remaining away from the capital city where the sheriff waits to serve the warrants, the governor is allowing the reservoir of public opinion to fill up with suspicion and prejudgment which can only with great difficulty be restrained in the inexorable day of trial. Moreover, Governor Small's talk since his indictment has been anything but reassuring. Not a hint of enlightenment has he given the public in respect to the matters wherewith he is charged. Instead he has talked explosively and excitedly about the alleged corruptions of the men and agencies which, he alleges, are in conspiracy to assassinate his character. All that he says may be true, or not true, but everybody can see that it is totally irrelevant to the charge that during his term of office as state treasurer Mr. Small, now governor, embezzled so many hundred thousand dollars of the state's funds. Men who are not guilty have one road, and only one, back to public confidence. That road leads through a thorough and fearless investigation. If Illinois has been robbed by her state treasurers, her citizens will allow no legal fiction about the sacredness of the head of the state to stand in the way of the punishment of the guilty. If there has been no theft, Governor Small owes it both to himself and to the fair name of the state to have the charges cleared up in the eyes of all the world.

Christ and the Road to En-dor

THE Methodist Times, of London, tells us that spiritualism, far from dying in England, is still rampant. It attributes its vogue to the fact that it has so many wealthy "believers" as ardent evangelists. Sympathy with bereaved multitudes is also a reason why those who disbelieve in its "manifestations" are reluctant to condemn it. As an antidote for the "craze" the Times recommends a book of fiction, founded on fact, entitled "The Road to En-dor," by E. H. Scott, in which two officers, by pretending to be "mediums," won their freedom from a Turkish prison of war. All of which is interesting; but it seems to us that the deeper cause for the advent and growth of spiritualism is the lack of a confident and triumphant assurance of immortality on the part of the church, and that the remedy lies there. Jesus lived by the power of the endless life, and by that power the church won her early victories in the world. Then as now men everywhere were craving for a new power of divine grace, a new and haunting kind of goodness, and a more vivid hope. In that period of stress and hazard, when an old form of civilization was dying and another was coming to birth, it was the Christian vision of eternal life that gave relief and renewal; and that vision we must recapture for our troubled time. The notion of eternal life popular in our day is not identical with the Christian doctrine which gave faith and hope and power in days of old. Indeed, our idea is not so much of the eternal life as of the future life, "a series of moments snipped off at one end and not at the other." It is not only defective but dangerous. It breaks the continuity and destroys all connection between our present lives and life further on. How different the grand conception of eternal life as revealed by Jesus, in which the sky begins at the top of the ground, which is both a treasure and a trophy, a possession and an anticipation, redeeming us from the cruelties and vicissitudes of time while saving us from a stagnant blessedness. By this faith men were victors over the world, and by it the new, uprising Christianity grasped the crumbling classic world and reshaped it. By this sign, and by no other, we too shall conquer!

Unemployment in the Spiritual Sphere

THE new census reveals the amazing fact that in Greater New York there are almost a million people of Protestant antecedents who are not associated with the churches of the city. These people have come into the metropolis from smaller communities, and have left the church behind them. When they go to church at all, they go as "tramps" from church to church, having no spiritual home, no active interest or fellowship. They are the spiritually unemployed, and the problem of dealing with them taxes the ingenuity and strategy of pastors and other Christian workers. The Roman Catholics order things differently and are finely organized for the purpose. They have the city divided into districts of so many blocks each and a committee to look after each district. As soon as a new family moves into the district a member of the committee calls to ascertain their religious affiliations; and if they are Catholics they are invited to the church of the parish, and at the same time their names are reported to the priest in charge. Similar plans are afoot to keep track of Protestant families moving to the city, as well as students and other young people who cast their lot in the metropolis. Pastors in smaller communities can help. When any of their people—especially their young people—are moving to New York, or to any great city, if they will notify a pastor of the communion to which they belong, it will facilitate the labors of their fellow-workers and save for the church many who otherwise may become indifferent or drift.

Kid Gloved Preaching Out of Date

DR. JOHN CLIFFORD, the grand old man of the free churches of Britain, has been telling some reminiscences—what a rich volume he carries in his mind, if he could be induced to write it down! Seventy years ago he was baptized in Nether Street Baptist Church, Beeston, and fifty-eight years ago, almost to a day, he preached his first sermon in Praed Street Church, Paddington. There was nothing remarkable, he tells us modestly, about the matter of the sermon, but the congregation was shocked by his manner. "The style of the pulpit at that period may be judged by the fact that many ministers, acknowledged to be great preachers, wore kid gloves as they preached." Which thing is a parable. Kid gloved preaching, which touches lightly and deals gently with social evils, is still very popular. It does not shock; it soothes. Its eloquence is a kind of celestial chloroform. For example we need go no further back than the anti-slavery agitation, when the kid glove preacher did not once disturb the peaceful somnambulism which saw no conflict between the religion of Jesus and the owning of human beings as chattels. It is so today, in all the pleas for the church to be prudent, rather than prophetic, and vaguely platitudinous rather than definitely specific in respect to industrial conditions. The kid glove is a symbol of the moral neutrality of the church, which makes the Sunday morning service a symphony concert, and the sermon a dose of opium. Imagine Amos preaching in kid gloves! Imagine John Clifford—the great soldier in the wars of God—failing, or refusing, to handle moral realities with naked hands! His great loving heart, his uncompromising moral heroism, his valiant championship of every forward-looking cause—these are a part of the noblest tradition of the British pulpit.

Did the Smiths Win the War?

THERE were more Smiths in the world war than any other family. They were recruited 51,000 strong. This is far beyond the record of the Johnson family, which was represented by only 29,000 of their scions. Behind these come trailing 22,500 Jones people and 9,000 members of the Brown family. The Cohens make an astonishing showing with an enrollment of 4,500. Of course only an enthusiastic and indiscreet member of the Smith family would ever claim that the Smiths won the war, because of their numerical strength in that conflict. It is somewhat the same way with the denominational claims that are sometimes made. One denomination claims to be the mother of education and another the home of orthodoxy. Some claim peculiar missionary zeal and others an excess of liberality in giving. But the world will never be saved by the denominational Smiths or Joneses or Browns. It took everybody to win the war. Even some families that we had never had much to do with were made glorious in 1917 by placing a gold star on their banner. Certain small denominations have shown the way in particular things. The Moravians can teach us something in missionary zeal. The Universalists have exhibited admirable courage in contending for their convictions. Covenanters Presbyterians may be wrong in some of their views and altogether too narrow, but they have developed some great saints in their midst. The Quakers shame us all with their achievements in benevolence and perhaps also in moral character. That state of mind which can see no virtue save in some one particular household of faith misses much of the beauty of religion. The saints are not all of one denomination. The reformers were of many communions. The great missionaries have in divine providence been distributed among all denominations. Sectarian pride would close our eyes to the beauty of holiness in the whole church of Christ. It takes a catholic spirited Christian to get that fellowship in the church of Christ which is most rewarding. The Smiths did not win the war, though we appreciate fully all that they did. America won the war. And the war against sin and spiritual blindness will some day be won not by a denominational family but by the whole united family of God.

The Menace of the Street Fair

THIS is the season for the street fair. In small towns all over the land village officials are being tempted by the offer of a liberal license fee to permit the setting up of the questionable shows which are the usual feature of the street fair. Since these communities have so little in the way of legitimate and uplifting recreation, public sentiment often demands the fair. The protest from the church people is feeble and ineffective. Yet everyone knows just exactly what the harvest is after the fair has departed. Female harpies traveling with the shows leave behind their trail of venereal disease to curse the community for years afterwards. Gambling devices create an appetite in the community for this kind of unnatural excitement. The economic loss to the town is not usually given serious consideration. Were the community to put up half as much money for clean and wholesome recreation under local direction, its population might play a whole year instead of a single week. Perhaps the minister will preach against the evil shows after they are gone and he realizes in some measure just how bad they were. To preach against a popular recreation, however bad, without putting something in its place is a futility. Play is not a superfluous thing to be rooted out of life, but a legitimate part of every life program. If the community has no other leadership for community play, the churches must furnish it. During the war manuals were printed giving directions for many games in which the whole community could engage. The Y. M. C. A. has been particularly skillful in putting some of these programs into operation. By all means abolish the street fair, but do not forget to put on a constructive program. Otherwise your church will be known chiefly in the character of a kill-joy institution.

Foes In Labor's Own Household

MURDER can be hired at fixed charges in Chicago, according to the confession of the chief of a squad of Chicago "bombers." If one wants to get even with a man and he looks like a husky citizen, one may secure a slugging for him at twenty-five dollars for the ordinary every-day article. If there is any doubt about the job being done right, one can go along and supervise the job. Two sticks of dynamite will be set off to blow out the front of a store for two hundred dollars. For three hundred dollars three sticks of dynamite will be placed in such a manner as to destroy a building. The reader inquires, who wants to hire the agents of so nefarious a business? The confession of the indicted man is that the labor unions of Chicago have secured just such aid. By intimidation they have induced unwilling men to join the union. Recalcitrant employers have been brought to time. For a time it has seemed effective. But the unions which employ this method have the least real loyalty among their men. Those organizations which handle employers by threats and intimidations in the long run lose their contention. For a long time the public has heard of the injustices practiced by the employing class upon labor. That story has to be told and retold until a new attitude and perhaps a new system of industrial relations have been created. But the fair-minded citizen insists on hearing both sides of the story and especially the impartial churchman. The church has been trying in recent years to help the labor unions of the country win better wages and better working conditions. It is now embarrassed to be found advocating the cause of any organization which stoops to slugging and assassination as a means of gaining its ends. Just as the church has called upon employers for living wages and humane conditions, it now calls upon the labor unions to clean house. They cannot hope for big victories under the leadership of men who will use criminal weapons to secure doubtful victories.

Political Judaism

MR. MORGENTHAU spilled the beans and now they are running all over. The Christians and Moslems of Palestine have formed an association to resist the movement to convert their land into a Jewish state. However little else they may have in common, this has furnished a bond of fellowship. The Zionist councils have faced a crisis which has been met even temporarily only by an astonishing magnanimity on the part of the American division. Of the hundred million dollars the Zionist propaganda requires, eighty are expected from American Jewish contributors. Yet the control of the funds of the movement is largely vested in the leaders of other national groups. The American contingent has protested, but has not rebelled, though American traditions breed bold sentiments touching "taxation without representation."

Mr. Morgenthau has gone at the heart of the problem which thoughtful observers outside of Jewry have puzzled over from the start. And he cuts the knot with characteristic American directness. He does not believe in a Palestinian Jewish state at all. He cannot reconcile its aspirations, or even its existence, with his Americanism. And the latter he does not propose to surrender. He professes a sort of Judaism which does not force him into a dilemma. He does not propose to be forced now or at any time into a choice of loyalties, as between his religion and his national obligations.

How can any American Jew fail to see the dilemma which Mr. Morgenthau thus so masterfully avoids? No thoughtful American Gentile has been able to understand how such a broad-minded Hebrew ecclesiastic as Rabbi Wise, or so astute a Hebrew layman as Louis Marshall, can carry their American patriotism and their Zionism in the same mental structure. All have wondered how long the bulkhead in their double compartment minds could endure the strain.

Political loyalty is one. Under the present world order it does not admit of division. The citizens of any nation may maintain a Platonic admiration for the political systems of neighboring nations, but their ultimate loyalty cannot be "Platonized." Spiritual Judaism is one thing. A Palestinian state, or a Jewish political organization anywhere else, is a very different thing—at least in Gentile estimation. It is easy to understand how such an organization is the goal of even the most spiritual Judaism when entertained by a realist mind. But it is not the less impossible to reconcile its concrete realization with the present social and economic status of the Jew in all parts of the world.

Once a Jewish state is set up in Palestine, in so far as it is accepted as the proper expression of Judaism, the Jew of the diaspora must surrender his religion. Is there any escape from this issue? The Jew can be a Jew anywhere, so long as his religious adherence carries with it no political implications. At least he can be an acknowledged Jew in every land where religious freedom is guaranteed or practiced. And even in states where an established religion other than Jewish debars him from the fullest and highest participation in the affairs of state, he can still hold to his religion without too serious embarrassment.

But what would be the status of the Jew in any land of the present world when the profession of his religion would inevitably identify him with the fortunes and aspirations and diplomacy, even with the military policies, of a political state alien to the society of his residence and citizenship? The status seems, at least to the Gentile mind, altogether impossible. A revival of anti-Semitism, and its spread to lands where heretofore it has not prevailed, is not the least embarrassing of the inevitable results of such a move. How can the Jewish outlander maintain his own spiritual and mental integrity? It is not even necessary to imagine a possible precipitation of war between the new Jewish state and the land of his citizenship. War is not, let us hope, the necessary condition or even potentiality among separate political states. But it remains true, by the very nature of the present system of political organization, that political loyalty is one, and cannot be divided. Hyphenation, discriminating Americans are by this time well aware, must remain spiritual, or racial, or sentimental; it dare not become political under any circumstances.

If the proposed new Jewish state in Palestine is to be and remain a province or dominion of the British Empire the way is smoothed for any Jew residing and claiming citizenship in any portion of the British Empire. But the way is decidedly roughened for the Jew elsewhere. The Briton is honored, especially in times of peace, in most regions of the world for his connection with so magnificent a political structure, but for that very reason his political loyalty is the more emphasized in his own mind and scrutinized by citizens of other political units. A Jew identified with so insignificant a power as an independent Palestinian state must forever be, would, in many lands and on many occasions, be in a far more advantageous position when a resident of an outlying nation, than if he were recognized as a Briton. The anticipated dependence of the new Palestine upon British sovereignty thus fails to relieve the embarrassment of Zionism; it would seem rather to compound it.

Christianity is international, inter-racial, and has tended through recent centuries to become non-political. The recent world war has shown how embarrassing, not to say futile, has been the attempt to maintain a religion partly political and partly non-political. But the missionary character and practice of the Christian religion has enabled it to come through even such a crisis as the recent war with its integrity not entirely destroyed. Its weakness in the minds of many has been revealed in the impotence of its ecclesiastical system to cope with such an international situation as the war precipitated.

But if Christianity had been officially identified with either one of the combatants, its value as a spiritual factor in the new world economy would have been utterly destroyed, and the war could not possibly have held to the fore the issues which most of the participants believed, and in the main still hope will prove to have been the real ends and aims of the conflict.

Judaism is not a missionary religion. It does not invite those of Gentile races to accept its tenets and share its ideals, except on terms which so far sacrifice their self-respect as to leave altogether negligible any non-Jewish adherence to the cult. To become international Judaism would be compelled to lose its character as a historic religion. It is international now, and has been since the first dispersion ages ago, in a sense in which some may be pleased to use the term. But even the qualified internationalism it has been able to boast would be absolutely impossible except through a "dispersion" and its failure to realize its political goal, a goal the hope of which Zionists and the majority of the orthodox have quite consistently contended is essential to the vitality of the cult.

Judaism verily faces a dilemma. It dare not identify itself with a political state, nor dare it decline to do so, now that the opportunity seems afforded. Mr. Morgenthau is a religious liberal. From the orthodox Jewish point of view, even from the point of view of Rabbi Wise's free synagogue he is very much of a liberal. He does not propose to surrender his Americanism, nor aught of its political implications. Nor does he propose to be read out of the Jewish fold. He professes a kind of Jewish faith which requires no Jewish political state as its consummation, not even a remote goal of its hope.

Many Gentiles will join with the orthodox Jew in wondering what sort of Judaism that may be. But Mr. Morgenthau's Americanism is none the less gratifying and honoring to him. And his spiritual insights are not the less thrilling, by whatever name they may go, or under whatever cult they may be fostered. If he chooses to style that cult Judaism, all who share the true American passion for religious freedom will honor his choice, and men of the spirit, under whatever name, will enter into a deepened spiritual fellowship with him.

Preaching in Fiction

THE incredibly stupid sermon of the minister in "Main Street," as Mr. Lewis reports it, suggests a brief study of preaching as reported in modern fiction. It is an interesting inquiry, which our readers may extend indefinitely if they are so minded. If they pursue it they will discover that the pulpit does not often come off well at the hands of our novelists. But there are exceptions; and ministers are not in a mood to strike back, but rather humbly to learn what kind of preaching our novelists deem effective. They deal with the stuff of life, with the making and unmaking of character, with the braiding together of human lives, for good or ill, with the discipline of tragedy and the teaching of events. They are, in fact, great outside preachers, and we have been studying some of their sermons.

Examples, of course, are many. One recalls the glorious sermons in the stories of George MacDonald—himself a preacher—and those piercing, poignant, heart-shaking sermons as reported by Mark Rutherford, who, though he left the pulpit, remained always a preacher. How can one forget the sermon in "The Revolution of Tanner's Lane," to name but one? But we turn from preacher-novelists to novelists who turn preachers and write sermons into their stories. Before us lie two English novels of unequal merit, but each containing a very striking sermon. The first is "The Soul of Susan Yellam," by H. A. Vachell, which shows us something of the drab and dingy life of an English village during the war. Of course a sermon lifted out of the atmosphere of the story, which tells why it was preached, as well as the effect it had upon those who heard it, loses much; but the sermon of Rev. Mr. Hamlin is worth hearing none the less:

Next Sunday, he took for his text the verse out of the 106th Psalm: "And He gave them their desire; but withal He sent leanness into their soul." He began by reminding his parishioners of what he had said in his sermon on patriotism: the soul in its essence was always right,—"what there is of it," he added impressively. "Some souls are very lean. I want you to notice that the word 'soul' is used in the singular. God sent leanness into the soul of his people. Nations, therefore, like individuals, possess souls. Has leanness entered into the soul of our nation?"

"We have prospered exceedingly. We are even richer than our expert accountants deem us to be. Some of you may have glanced casually at the stupendous figures which set forth the wealth and resources of the British Empire. We forget to consider how this vast wealth is piled up. It is not my purpose to consider that with you, today. But such consideration is the duty of those who are able to deal with these astounding figures. We have been, in short, given our desire. In the text you will note that God gave his people their desire; and then he sent leanness into their souls.

"What was their desire? The psalmist informs us in the context. God's chosen people had wandered from him. They had corrupted themselves, as we read in Exodus. I will cite one instance known to the youngest child here: they had set up and worshipped the calf of Horeb, the golden calf, which has stood forth ever since as the symbol of Mammon. They wanted their golden calf, and God gave it to them. And he sent leanness into their souls. To many of us this text presents difficulties. Is it wrong for a nation to desire worldly prosperity? Is it wrong for an individual, for any one of us, to desire to better one's condition in life, to rise, as it is called, in the world? Most certainly not. Such a desire is firmly rooted in every healthy nation, in every healthy man and woman. It is basic, the mainspring of human endeavor and human advancement, rooted in nations and individuals by God.

"The desire, then, in its simplest form, must be right. Its accomplishment may be utterly wrong. Desires change their character during accomplishment. Thrift, for instance, may degenerate into parsimony; temperance, if uncontrolled, leads to intemperance; the noblest ambitions may become insensate; proper care of the body, which I have commended to you, may end in vanity; love, alas! is often deformed into lust. All that is obvious. No one questions it. Desires, then, face two ways. They may lead us to God or away from Him; they may enrich or impoverish the soul. But why, you may ask, does God, as in the text, deliberately gratify soul-impoverishing desires in a nation, with the knowledge and therefore with the intention of making the soul of that nation lean? The answer is plain. Nations, like individuals, exercise the privilege of free-will. The choice between good and evil is theirs, as it is mine and yours.

"How can we tell whether the soul of a nation be lean? There is an infallible test, the same test which each of us must apply to ourselves. Never forget that what we think, we are. What we go on thinking, we become. By a nation's thoughts, by your own thoughts, the soul's stature may be measured. If the thoughts of a nation, if your own thoughts, dwell habitually upon self-advancement and self-indulgence, be sure that the soul is dwindling instead of expanding. If your thoughts, collectively or individually, are hard, jealous thoughts concerning other nations, the soul is growing lean. But when we think of others with love animating our thoughts, and if that love, in ever-widening circles includes not only friends but all, all who claim from us pity and consideration, then it is very well with the soul. It is expanding, and is capable of an expansion so immense that, like time and space, no finite mind can measure it.

"Hate impoverishes souls and bodies. A man under the influence of a violent passion is physically the worse. A doctor will tell you that. A nation convulsed by hate is physically weaker. Violence is not strength. It may appear to be so for a brief time. In a stand-up fight, between two men, the man who loses his temper is likely to lose the victory. At this moment, a gospel of hate is convulsing our enemies. We may, and must, hate what they have done, the atrocious crimes perpetrated by and for authority, but let us beware of hating, as they hate, because such rancor eats away the soul. Let us remember who said, 'God forgive them, for they know not what they do.' Let us consider more attentively the desires of a nation and their direction—upward or downward. I repeat emphatically that the desires of a nation are the desires of the individual immeasurably multiplied.

"And first, I should like to suggest to you that desires concerned with material ends, such as money, or any other worldly ambition, are generally gratified, provided we work for them hard enough. When are desires soul-impoverishing? How can we tell when a nation or an individual, after rising steadily upward, reaches a point from which it and he, as steadily, descend? The answer may be found in the book Micah: 'He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good, and what doth the lord require of thee, but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?' In itself a nation can achieve much, so can an individual; but if self-advancement, in any form, whether modest or far-reaching, relies upon itself and takes to itself the credit and glory, then we are not walking humbly with God, but speeding from him along a road that may lead to success, as the world interprets success, but which leads, also, to disappointment, disillusionment, and often at the last—despair. The great conquerors of history have not been happy men. Everything that is done vaingloriously turns to ashes. From that sad thought we may take this much comfort. Ashes, as you farmers know, are great fertilisers. I know of no greater proof of God's wisdom and mercy than this: the ashes of our failures do, so I believe, cause good to bloom out of evil.

"If it be true that leanness has been sent into the soul of this nation, if we have not walked humbly with God, what can be done? The answer is to be found not only in the Bible, but in every chapter of the world's history. We must make atonement by sacrifice."

It is good preaching; it is good homiletics; it is simple, direct, and practical. The preacher paused, and many remembered the pause afterwards, as he uttered the word "sacrifice"—for he had a son in the army, who was killed two days later. How the sermon fitted the situation, and how each applied it to someone else—the better to parry its thrust at themselves—the novelist tells us with the privilege of his art. It is a sermon good for the soul of America, as for England, for a nation or an individual, the two being kept together all through. A different kind of sermon, more familiar and colloquial, as befitted the congregation—it is preached in the dismal slums of London—may be read in "A Candidate for Truth," by J. D. Beresford. The preacher, Rev. Cecil Barker, Vicar of St. Mark's, is one of the best clerical characters portrayed in recent fiction, so human, yet so haunted by a passion for human souls. He picks up pieces of men and women out of the waste basket of a great city, and puts them together again. Taking for his text St. James 2:8: "If ye fulfill the royal law according to the Scriptures, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, ye do well," his sermon, as reported by the author, was as follows:

"I was passing Buckingham Palace a few weeks ago and saw a crowd collected round the gates. I joined them, and listened to what some of them were saying. It appeared that the queen was expected to drive out. There were two women just in front of me chattering, and I heard one of them say to the other: 'I do love to get a sight of royalty.' I asked her just what she meant by royalty, and she told me she meant kings and queens. I suppose most of you here mean kings and queens when you speak of royalty, and that is why I want you to consider for a moment what St. James meant when he spoke of this 'royal law.'"

Still in a vein that was half colloquial, Barker carried on an explanation of the various gradations of law. He spoke of the law of the home, of the rules of a club, and then of the laws of parliament and the edicts of monarchs.... When this point had been made he returned to his definition of a royal law which he now showed to be one which overruled all others: "When St. James speaks of a royal law, he makes a wider sweep still. The king he refers to is the King of kings and Lord of lords, and his law was framed without distinction of nations; it is applicable to every human being now living in the world, and it was ordained to override every law framed by human agency, so that when the lesser law contradicts the greater, the lesser should be revoked or altered."

He returned to his opening anecdote, and to make his point he read the following verse of the epistle: "But if ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors." He asked: "Do you find that a hard saying? Do you think that because we are enjoined to have no 'respect to persons' we must become democrats or socialists?" He explained that what was intended was that this greater law recognized no differences between individuals, and that if the queen was adored for her queenship, and not because she was a fellow-creature, we were convinced of the law as transgressors. He denounced without restraint the attitude of flatterers and sycophants, and then, with a sudden application of his theme, he said, with blunt emphasis:

"You are all sycophants; snobs, every one of you. There is no sacrifice you wouldn't make if some sprig of royalty invited you to his house, but you would not walk across the street to help John Jones, your neighbor. You break the royal law every day of your lives a dozen times a day. You think it might be easy to love the queen of England as yourself, but what about the poor devil who snatched your watch in the high road because he was starving? Do you feel that you can love him as yourself?" At this point he changed his tone, and, bending over the pulpit, he spoke in a more confidential voice: "Rotten things, laws, aren't they? Always new laws being made and old ones altered; the poor layman doesn't know what he may do and what he mayn't, half the time...."

From his point of vantage the vicar looked down on a congregation with smiling faces. "That makes you smile, doesn't it?" he said. "Only you know that if we could just keep that one royal law of St. James, if we could all love our neighbors as ourselves, there would be no need for any other law; there would be no need for socialism any more than for kings and queens and parliaments; there would be no need for armies and navies, or prisons or taxes. What a happy place this world might be if we could substitute that one royal law for all the others."

And all of us say Amen, like Cairns in the story: "Capital sermon he gave us"; and there it ends. It was real preaching, and we regret that the author did not give us the whole of it. After such manner our modern novelists write sermons, good sermons—simple, vivid, happy in illustration, and pungent in application—but are they any better, any more human, than most of the sermons to be heard in our churches? We think not. None the less the preacher can learn much from the novelist both as to style and, no less, the appropriation and presentation of truth by the imagination. The man of the pulpit has the greatest of all stories to tell, surpassing any romance ever written—and it behooves him to learn from all artists how to tell it with charm and power and haunting beauty.

The Pajamas

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE came unto me a Young Man, who said, I desire a better Job. For behold, I have been long in my Present Situation, and I am Getting Nowhere. And I desire to Move Up.

And I inquired of him concerning his Occupation, and he told me what it was. And I asked him certain Questions concerning matters such as I supposed to belong to his Vocation.

And he answered me, saying, I once learned that, but I have forgotten. And, I know the answer to that question, but I cannot think of it just now. And, I have a book wherein I look up such matters when I have need.

But there was nothing which I asked of him which he could tell me Right Off the Bat.

And I said unto him, Once upon a time there was a man who said, I have occasion to travel now and again, and behold, I will keep a Bag that is always packed. And he put into it a Suit of Pajamas, and a Safety Razor, and a Tooth Brush, and a Pair of Hair Brushes, and divers other things, such as Travelers need.

And he went upon a Journey, and it came to pass in the morning that he arose and put on his Raiment, and took his Bag and went to the Wash Room. And his Pajamas did he leave in his Berth. And while he was washing and shaving, the Porter came along, and removed the Sheets and the Pillow Cases from his berth, and gathered them into an armful, and chucked them into his Laundry Bag. And the Pajamas rolled he up with the Linen. And when the man came back from the Wash Room, behold, his berth was all made up nicely. And he sat down in comfort, and in due time he got off the train, and he gave a Quarter to the Porter, and was at peace with himself and with all mankind.

But the next night when he started back, he removed his clothing in his berth, and he sought in his bag for his Pajamas.

And he was Considerably in Need of them, but they were not there, nor hath he ever found them.

And I said unto the young man, It is impossible for a man to keep constantly in his mind all the facts and principles and ideas which he may sometime need. But he who succeedeth must be able to produce on demand the vital elements of his Stock in Trade. A man cannot do business forever on the things he formerly knew, any more than the mill can grind with the water that is past. Neither may a man depend upon those Facts which he once possessed, but which have drifted away into the general region of the Beautiful Isle of Somewhere.

And I said, There come to men moments when they have retired behind the Curtain and removed their Raiment, when one suit of Pajamas that are available for immediate use is worth a thousand pieces of lingerie rolled up in the Linen of the Pullman Company.

VERSE

Columbus in a Storm

BY day and night upon a raging sea,
Engulfed by waves and torn by savage winds,
Columbus drove his ships toward the west.
By day the lookout scanned the skyline's edge,
By night he listened for a thundering surf;
While in his reeling cabin sat the man
Who in an age of darkness sailed by faith:
Beneath a lanthorn's light lay stretched his charts.

Upon a sea of surging tragic years,
Now balked by adverse winds from unknown shores,
Now fiercely driven by the storm she knows,
Fearing today the terrors of the deep,
Thinking tonight she hears the breakers roar;
Humanity, like him who found the new world's shores,
Must trust the charts her bravest hours have drawn,
And steer by faith, with quiet heart and strong.

Youth

NOT theirs to question or to hesitate
Whence once they hear the challenge and the call;
Not theirs the doubting mood that like a pall
Lies on our hearts; they ponder not their fate,
Nor are they wise like us to speculate
Of loss or gain. Like flame upleaping they
Their answer make, and laughing march away,—
To new-born worlds their lives are dedicate.

And we, O God, shall we no longer dare
To follow waving banners of a dream?
Shall we not still their questing spirit share
In high adventure faithful to the gleam?

O God of Youth, when Thy far bugles blow,
Gird Thou our sinews and our souls to go!

Children of the Night

(Suggested by protective work for girls on Chicago streets)

NIGHT waits above the glare of blazing streets,
Denied her virtuous, God-appointed part;
Fain would she clasp in sleep, safe in her breast,
The little maids that course the city's heart.

Hold, Night! Blame not these eager, cramped young souls, Blame rather thy lean, irksome sister, Day.
These children see in thee but mad release;
Thou art indeed their only time for play.

Yea, children of the city's garish night,
We should to you for bitter wrongs atone.
Let him who hath no sin against you wrought—
Let such an one be first to cast a stone.

Ah, God! Thou markest well; thou carest still.
With tears of Deity the night is wet.
But, Lord, are all thy followers asleep?
Art thou again on lonely Olivet?

Lyric

SIXTY Aprils have I seen,
And sixty winters white—
Processions now of green,
Led on by lordly light,
And now dark hordes that hide
In gloom the summer's pride—
Yet none can say that I
Within my bosom's core,
Beneath whatever sky,
Found not beside my door
Bright evidence of spring,
And hope in everything.

George W. Truett

Ninth Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

THREE scenes are linked in my mind as I think of the career of Dr. Truett, whose ministry is one of the most remarkable in the history of the modern church. Taken together they show how God made a mighty preacher, endowed and trained him for his task, and set him in a place of influence and power. He is a truly great preacher, as much for the depth, simplicity and intensity of his faith, as for the size, poise, and incommunicable charm of his personality. No man among us has more of what Joseph Parker called "the tone of great preaching," which might be the solicitude of a mother, the passion of a father, and the wooing note of a lover, all in one. "Men are guided by type, not by argument," said Bagehot; "it is the life of teachers that is catching, not their tenets"; and that is supremely true of Dr. Truett, whose character fulfills the words of Amiel who said, "to be religious is to personify and embody the Eternal."

The first scene is from a biographical sketch of Dr. Truett, all too brief, which shows us the boy from the Blue Ridge Mountains at a meeting of the Baptists of Georgia, in the old court-house at Marietta, in 1889. He was there to plead the cause of the youth of the mountains, as precious as gold for the miner's pick and fit to adorn the crown of a king. Tall, pale, shy, vastly embarrassed in the focus of so many eyes, the youth was forced into the aisle and led to the "prisoners' dock." There he told his story, forgetting himself—as he always does—and remembering only youth denied an opportunity of access to its rightful inheritance of knowledge. It was a simple story, but epic in its pathos of quiet recital of the passions, hopes, and longings of an unsung heroism. It grew more poignant with each word, until every heart was broken and yet athrill, moved alike by the merit of the plea and by the tones of a voice which carries the burden of tears which seems ever laid upon it. It was no pitiful plea of poverty—who ever heard that from a southern mountaineer?—but the cry of a youth in behalf of youth, the strong persuasion of a just matter, the logic of one who was resolved to let his own lack of opportunity plead for others. Suffice it to say that the young man of twenty-two went back to his mountain home taking new hope and joy with him.

WESTWARD TO TEXAS

Thence, after a time, the path of the young man led westward to Texas, where his parents had moved ahead of him. Within a few years he had saved a college from financial despair, had endowed it, had been graduated from it, and was elected to its presidency. Happily, and wisely, he did not accept the honor, keeping to the path marked out for his soul by One who made him to be a preacher. The triumphs of Dr. Truett—"plain, mountain-hearted, love-torn George Truett," in the words of one of his friends—read like a legend, as year by year he moved forward, divinely led while humbly following, to a place of command among his brethren. The man who wooed cowboys to their knees won cities also, until, in 1897, he came to the pulpit of the First Baptist Church of Dallas, a noble church destined to grow under his leadership to be one of the mighty forces of the nation, both in numbers and in spiritual fruitfulness. There, as pastor, teacher and evangelist, his genius has shone for more than twenty years, where his name is a household word, and his fame is like a fragrance throughout the nation.

The second scene was two years later, in Louisville, at a meeting of the Baptist convention of the south in 1899, when Dr. Truett was the preacher. It was a great occasion, and there was a great orator to match it. The picture is vivid in my memory—the finely wrought sermon, the burning earnestness of the preacher—but no words of mine can describe a voice which has in it an echo of that infinite pain that throbs forever in the human heart; the voice of one who knows that humanity is deeply wounded, and that only Christ can heal it. The sermon was entitled "The Subject and Object of the Gospel," and was valuable not only for its exposition of the theme but as a revelation of the ideals of the preacher. He magnified his office, and there were passages of stinging rebuke of clap-trap methods which degrade the pulpit. "All sensationalism in the pulpit is worse than sawdust," he said; it smacks of the street and is a burning shame upon the Christian ministry. The following passage from the sermon gives one clue to the secret of a preacher who knows whereof he speaks, and in whom the Christ-motif is supreme:

"Nothing can take the place of the Christian ministry. The progress of civilization, the making of many books, the increase of schools and learning, the marvelous triumphs of the press—mighty as are all of these agencies—they can never supersede the divinely sent preacher In the great crises of the past, matchless has been the influence wielded by God's prophets and preachers. When all other voices have failed, they have rallied the wavering people to the standards of truth and righteousness. It was the golden-mouthed Chrysostom who became the oracle of the hour in the days when Antioch was smitten with terror. It was the flaming Augustine who rallied his fellow countrymen from despair and breathed into their lives new hope and purpose, when imperial Rome lay bleeding and trampled beneath the heel of an invading oppressor. It was the plain, yet invincible Luther, who, when reeking corruption reigned in the papal court and spread its blight over all Europe, spoke forth words that echoed as the thunder and were piercing as the lightning, stirring a revolution that thrilled all Christendom and marking a new epoch in the civilization of the world. As in the past so shall it be in the future, that God's foremost instrument is his preacher, in both the civilization and the evangelization of the world.

There was an element in Paul's preaching that must needs be in all effective preaching. It was his tone of authority. He believed his message with all his heart, and as God's ambassador he delivered it without quailing, for one moment, under any fire. There is untold power in him who knows his mission is a thing of God's own willing, and that he cannot fail, though doubts may shroud in cloud the transient hour.

It is conviction that convinces. The last place on earth for stammering and indefiniteness is the pulpit. Christ's ambassador is to proclaim his Master's message rather than to defend it. He is a witness rather than an advocate. Christianity is nothing if it is not sublimely positive. It is not a conundrum to be guessed at, or a theory to be speculated upon, but it is a divine revelation which is to be implicitly accepted and followed with the deepest heart-throb of our lives. To be continually on the defensive is contrary to the very genius and purpose of the gospel. The gospel faithfully preached is its own best defense."

A SERMON ON CAPITOL STEPS

The third scene was in Washington, in May, 1920, where the hosts of southern Baptists had assembled for their great convention—perhaps the greatest religious assembly in the world. As the convention was held in the national capital it was decided that there should be an address setting forth the Baptist position with regard to the relation of church and state; and Dr. Truett was selected to deliver the address. He stood on the front steps of the capitol building, looking toward the White House, and the audience, numbering many thousands, filled the open space. Not for twenty years had I seen Dr. Truett, and time had powdered his hair; but the wonderful voice, with its haunting keys and cadences, was the same. The address was entitled "Baptists and Religious Liberty," and it was as much a sermon as an oration, reviewing the long struggle for the freedom of faith, and the part which Baptist heroes had in fighting the battle. If it celebrated liberty, it was also a plea for what Burke called "a manly, moral, regulated liberty"; and it laid emphasis upon the obligations which all true liberty imposes, lest it be used "for an occasion of the flesh." But liberty is not all. Even if education be added to liberty it is not enough, for "a democracy needs more than intelligence—it needs Christ"; and the address closed with a demand for evangelization nation-wide, world-wide, and ceaseless. For more than an hour the orator held the vast audience enthralled, and he sent us away with a solemn and overwhelming sense of the crisis of the modern world and its challenge to the Christian faith.

Some one said of Spurgeon that his theology, by itself, was abhorrent, but that it was never by itself. It was mixed with the stuff of the man, dipped and dyed in all the hues of his life, touched with spiritual genius and transfigured by a glorified common sense. In the same way, to many of us the theology of Dr. Truett would seem archaic, if not untenable, if we stopped to remember it. What we remember is not his theory but his experience, and we share and rejoice in the grand orthodoxy of the heart which makes his preaching so vital and compelling. Like the rest of us, when he argues he is weak; when he tells of the love of God and the saviourhood of Christ, he is irresistible. According to Aristotle—whose book on Rhetoric every preacher should study, if only to learn that rhetoric is not mere cookery, as Plato said in contempt—the office of the orator is persuasion, for which three qualities are necessary: prudence, moral excellence, and the good of the hearers at heart. No one fulfills these conditions more perfectly than Dr. Truett, whose character lights up like an altar lamp the teaching of his words. More than an evangelist, he is an evangel. As a rough man put it, unconsciously paying a high tribute, "He is a man who means it without trying to." His sincerity is not simply transparent, it is luminous. Men know that he loves them—they feel it—and that his one wish is to win them to Christ, and that to that end he spends his power without thought of himself. One of his friends has tried to describe his secret:

What is it that constitutes the acknowledged power of his preaching? In one answer all opinions meet. It is something in the man himself—the man behind the sermon, the incarnation of truthfulness in the messenger. Many sermons will yield to analysis the secret of their charm. Though many of the sermons of Truett have been reported in full, he belongs to that class of preachers who convince us that preaching is in the highest sense an incarnation, something more than a report of the truth, something more than the proclamation of the gospel. Whitfield could so speak the most commonplace words as to send chills through his audience. Truett has much of this power to communicate to men his soul on the most ordinary vehicles of thought and language. His words take on his spiritual quality as the dull black wire takes on the electric current.

Electricity, however, is scarcely a fortunate figure. He is least of all of the spectacular type. There is nothing angular or irregular in him. He has none of the personality run to seed—individualism on a pious spree. The strongest personalities are not eccentric. Eccentricity is unnecessary to such men. They have specific gravity beyond the need of peculiar advertisement. Too much of what men call personality in the pulpit, in the view that preaching is an incarnation, must hinder rather than help the gospel purpose. Is it possible that evangelism, which, reduced to the terms of psychology, is egotism, can be the appointed power of God unto salvation? The power of George Truett, as a preacher, can have no such explanation.

The phrase most often employed to explain Truett is "heart-power." Translated into visible, audible fact, it is this: A man of substantial flesh, enough to be a man of like passions with other men; an open Saxon face—a serious, some say a sad face; a voice set in a key of pathos; an impression of unfeigned sympathy, as of a man who has suffered, and whose pain, whatever it be, has become lost in a larger pain, through exchange of all personal life sorrows for the great human sorrow everywhere. In declining the presidency of Baylor University he said simply in explanation: "I have sought and found the shepherd's heart." Perhaps there lies the hiding of his power. Many have quoted the great avowal which Frederic Myers puts into the mouth of Paul the Apostle, but none whom I know can appropriate it more truly than Truett, when he stands before a congregation of his fellow men to preach the gospel that saves:

"Oft when the word is on me to deliver,

Lifts the illusion and truth lies bare,
Desert or throng, the city or the river
Melts in a lucid paradise of air.

"Only like souls I see the folk thereunder

Bound who should conquer, slaves who should be kings;
Hearing their one hope with an empty wonder,
Sadly content in a show of things.

"Then with a rush the intolerable craving

Shivers throughout me like a trumpet call.
Oh, to save these, to perish for their saving,
Die for their life, be offered for them all."

A PASSION FOR SOULS

When all due allowance is made for the beautiful exaggeration of friendship in this tribute, these words do help us to know the power of a preacher whose passion for human souls is a consuming fire, and whose ministry is attuned to the mighty music of redemption. The latest volume of sermons by Dr. Truett is by far the best, not only as a revelation of deeper experience and riper powers, but because it preserves the whole of each service and thus reproduces, as far as can be done in print, the atmosphere of his personality. The comments on the lessons, the prayers, the exhortations, the glowing appeals, all are reported in full, erasing only such errors as are inevitably due to rapid speaking and reporting. It is entitled "A Quest for Souls"—a title selected by another, but exactly descriptive of the life-passion of the preacher—and as an example of evangelistic preaching at its highest it has no volume to surpass it. As in his former volume, "We Would See Jesus," his homiletic method is utterly simple and straightforward, with no clever devices, no suggestion of sensation, nothing to deflect attention from the message. It is as free from the artificial and the meretricious as the preacher himself is free from the blandishments of flattery, wealth, or fame. It is rich in illustration, drawn from life, from history, from biography, from his own wide observation, and especially from his varied experience as a confidant of storm-vexed human souls; but the illustration never once gets in the way of the truth. Of the prayers one hesitates to speak—they are so tender, so direct, so aglow with insight and sympathy, so intimate without being familiar, so haunting in pathos yet so victorious in faith; as of one who knows how to climb right up onto the knees of God and talk with the simplicity of a little child. The total impression of the volume does not leave one thinking of the preacher at all—he is quite forgotten—but of the Master whose he is and whom he reveals; and it is hard to know how any human being resisted such a series of appeals.

EXALTED EVANGELISM

Truly he is a winsome preacher of the winsomeness of Christ; one could not imagine the gospel message being stained on his lips by acerbity or odium. Always positive, always persuasive, Dr. Truett has none of the grim, harsh dogmatism of Torrey, none of the incredible vituperation which has disfigured so much popular revivalism. He is an evangelist of the Loving-Heart, not of threats and thunders, and even in his most earnest moods his gentleness is palpable, his good will unfailing. His thought and language are of the simplest. He knows how to be picturesque and full of color, and he need only be himself to be richly human, but he never speaks except for a verdict. Instead of coming religiously to every point he comes at once to the point of religion, as when he began a sermon with the question: "Does not that boy over there wish to be a Christian, and that older one, turning into manhood, and that young man himself there, and that young woman—do you not wish to be Christians?" It is his explicit and purposeful "preaching for conversions" that makes it worth whole, and very much worth while, studying him. An adherent of the older conception of Christianity, he is by that much ahead of the times, and the glib young liberals, who imagine they are progressive, are far behind. For, unless we are winners of human souls, we are not messengers of him who came to seek and to save that which is lost.

A famous master of Trinity College said of Maurice, after hearing him preach a university sermon: "There is about that man a kind of divine feeling or possession." More and more this divine feeling, this supernatural grace, seems to me to be the great distinction and charm of Dr. Truett as a preacher. Other men are greater scholars and profounder thinkers, and there may be others who have something of his artless simplicity of moving eloquence—Gipsy Smith has much of it—but in his character as a Christ-anointed evangelist I doubt if Dr. Truett is surpassed by any man in our generation. Edmund Burke said of Charles Fox: "That man was made to be loved"; but his remark is of far nobler application to George Truett. He was made to be loved. Indeed, it may be truly said that he does his best work through the exalted and wonderful love which he unconsciously and inevitably draws toward himself. People do not try, do not care to analyze or define his power; they simply love him as one altogether worthy of their homage and affection. Here is a burden of confidence and devotion to make a man tremble; and it must be added that no man ever used an opportunity with higher seriousness or nobler power. Back into the hearts of the people he pours through their love a tide of holy manhood, seeking to lift them by their love into the redeeming fellowship of the great Lover. One thanks God for every remembrance of such a man, whose ministry is a benediction to the world and a theme of thanksgiving in the whole church of God.

Companionship *

By Frederick Hall

THERE on your Dead Man's Hill, outside the city,
You did your bit for God and native land,
While some looked on in scorn, a few in pity,
And most, like me, just didn't understand.

We went not lonely but with flags a-flying,
And cheering crowds, like a big football game;
Then afterwards came mud, and pain, and dying,
And some of us came home—not just the same.

I—? oh, a fellow can come back at twenty,
The gas and all the rest—they weren't so bad,
I'm no sob sister, I'll have fun aplenty—
But 'twas the only right arm that I had.

And sometimes at a dance, or when they're playing
A good stiff game of ball, I think of you
And of my empty sleeve—it isn't praying—
But—I gave something for a great cause too.

*An overseas welfare worker relates that a doughboy said to him, "Before I came to France, I never saw anything in the cross: but now—why, I think Jesus was a lucky man to have the chance to die for a great cause."

Earth's Blood

By Meade Dutt

AUGUST—what does it mean to you? baked prairies? oppressive heat? brown and parched pastures? Perhaps. But did you ever tramp through the interminable stretches of a virgin forest in mid-summer? So I thought—few have. It is a sensation—the forest is good for many sensations. High, brown trunks, as smooth and as straight as an Indian's arrow, one hundred feet without a limb or a knot; dried leaves, broken branches, tufts of ferns, forest weeds.

John Woodman knew the forest,—he had seen it writhe in the tempest's fury, he had heard it moan in the melancholy days of autumn, he had looked upon it when it was still and white in winter, he had seen that miracle of October. But what are these when the throat is parched and the body cries for water? It was for this refreshment that John Woodman had driven himself forward coming at length to this spring flowing from beneath a large rock. The action of the water had gouged out an irregular pool a few yards in diameter. It was lined with tender cress, and about its edges grew the bullrush, the arrow head and the cowslip. Golden sand gleamed in its placid depth—sand that had been washed for centuries by the stream of liquid crystal that had flowed so constantly since that day nature shuddered and rearranged herself and somewhere a cavern was left, water poured into it and a channel was opened. Then, lo, one bright morning a sunbeam slid down through the clouds and smote this spot where for the first time a clear, cold stream—earth's blood—was flowing—flowing for man who was yet to be.

The golden floor of the pool was strewn with the small shells of the water snail, bleached and whitened; broken bits of bark from the pines hard by, twigs dropped from the surrounding trees, all lay in whimsical mosaics about the bottom. Wispy minnows darted in and out the rushes, or poised motionless in the splotches of sunlight; water spiders jumped and skated aimlessly about. Two or three dragon flies with iridescent wings flitted back and forth through the sun and shade, and then settled motionless on the tip of a broken branch which in falling had stuck in the side of the pool. Long rays of sunlight thrust themselves through the branches above, some like opalescent blades from the fabled Orient, others like rods of fire-wrought gold, glinted on the gauzy wings of the dragon flies, or pierced the mirrored surface of the water, outlining grotesque and ever changing figures of sun and shadow on the sandy floor of the pool.

All about this spring nature had laid her cushions of tightly curled moss—not one, but many. About it she swung her incense pots—not those crude, clumsy things which men make and heat with fire, but the buds of the wild rose which, bursting, poured their treasures on the pure, sun-filtered air. John Woodman heard the soft, silvery prattle of the little stream that flowed from the pool, he heard the clear trumpet note of a wild bird; the incense intoxicated him,—and he fell prone on the mossy pavement and worshipped.

Again, as he looked at the crystalline purity of that pool he thought of other pools—pools filled with murky water made turgid by wriggling, working crawfish, pools stagnant with fever, disease, and death; but this pool challenged him to search its inmost heart. The gravel in its depths was both fine and coarse, yet clean; the shells, whether flat or twisted, had long since been purged of all impurity. The texture of rare lilies and fragrant buttercups had been drawn from the pool by the mysterious alchemy of summer. John Woodman prayed for a heart as pure as the pool before him. Through the shadowed silences of the forest came, on a winged messenger, to his heart the words of a wise man who prayed: "Create within me a clean heart, O God."

John Woodman looked at the sun-splotched surface of the pool, and then he dreamed, day dreamed. He lost sight of the yellow sand, the shells, the water soaked twigs and bits of bark. He heard no brazen blare of trumpet, no grinding of armies, no battle shock—he heard nothing. Yet through the clearness of that pool he became strangely conscious of a multitude of men and women; they were brilliantly clad. The magic of a great presence had drawn them from the market place, from their workshops, their ovens, their fields, their merchandising—when He passed by they forgot gold and silver, bales of goods, plow and hoe, they even forgot themselves, and followed him to the rounded summit of a mountain. They were listening to the clear musical voice of the Master who was saying—and there in the far depths of the forest John Woodman heard him say: "The pure in heart shall see God—blessed are they."

Just above his head a mocking bird piped its clear note and awakened him, and he saw that the pool really had bottom, that the sand and the shells were still there. He saw the clear water flowing from beneath the rock, pouring its pure libation in nature's behalf. He thought of its constancy. Far in the heart of the shadowy forest it was jealous for nothing else, it desired to be nothing more than a spring in the forest. Great trees had fallen and the moss was covering their decaying trunks; hills were worn down by the action of rain and snow; the heat of summer and the cold of winter had come and gone from time immemorial, but the spring was faithful. The test of a spring, thought he, is August when the burning heat of summer is at full tide, when the sun's sharp, hot rays probe the earth for the last drop of moisture and the soil can no longer resist the ruthless robber; then the roots are searching every particle of the earth's mound for one last little drink. This spring had freely received, its supply was never failing, so it freely gave. In the moist earth near the pool John Woodman saw outlined the print of the trim hoof of a forest deer; she and her fawn had come to drink. They had not been disappointed—that was certainly plain. Then that man lay by the pool and thought of another to which he had come but an hour before expecting to find water, but instead he read the tale of tragedy. The mud had been cut and carved by the feet of frantic, thirsty beasts, all had been there: beasts with wide and with narrow hoofs, beasts with furry feet, beasts with long claws and short—the tragic story was written in the hieroglyphics their frenzied feet had left in the clay—now baked and hard. The spring had failed—what mockery! Better it had never flowed a single drop.

John Woodman turned all this over in his mind, and then he thought of a sentence in his Bible: "God grant mercy to the house of Onesiphorus, for he hath oft refreshed me." John Woodman's eyes looked at the forest about him. Its rough, tan barked trunks faded into columns of white: Corinthian, Doric, fluted, plain. He saw splendid temples, and winding in and out the temple courts and sacred enclosures, the stately processions of paganism; he heard shouts, gongs, shrieks, cries, moans—the incantations of a pagan religious ceremonial. He saw garlanded beasts with gilded horns, skipping devotees, dancing attendants, pompous priests, smoking incense pots. With all he beheld a mass of seething, writhing humanity, and in the midst of it one man, clothed and in his right mind—Paul the Christian empire builder. Paganism was all about him, weakening him with ten thousand invisible forces and influences. John Woodman saw the multitudinous homes of that pagan city—porticoed, pillared, humble, splendid, large, small—but there was one that was strangely like the perennial spring in the wilderness: the home of Onesiphorus. To this home the great Christian leader had gone again and again and was as many times refreshed. "He hath oft refreshed me."

John Woodman reclined on the soft, mossy cushion and looked steadfastly at the spring and its pool. Abundant life was all about it. How green and vigorous the vegetation that grew near it! How dense and beautiful the foliage of the trees whose tiny rootlets drank from it! Unconsciously his eye wandered up to the branches of those high, over-arching trees—there were no seared leaves, none were even withered. About the spring he saw the long fronds of the sword fern, sweeping, graceful, perfect. Flowers, such as commonly grew in the early summer in the northern forest, had prolonged their stay into the summer heat, nor were they worse for their tarrying. Flaming red petals against dark, glossy green, bluebells, violets, gold of buttercups, pink of wild rose. He saw the bees with pollen-dusted thighs, butterflies, dragonflies, and too, an humming bird flitted from blossom to blossom; he was conscious of buds and berries of many colors on nearby branches. Elms with wide spreading limbs, birches with smooth white trunks, pines heavy life-giving power of that spring. No longer was it to him an impersonal, inanimate thing obeying a law it could not avoid, it had taken on a sweet and kindly—even lovely—personality of a fostering mother who loved every minnow in her magic pool, every flaming petal and ripening berry, every bug and bee, every bush and rush, and for them she lived. She fed them from her own breast, fed and protected them with a constancy which can come only from a pure heart that loves passionately and divinely. John Woodman's soul was filled with the peaceful content that lingered about this spring. He knew full well the hot breath of the plains, it could not enter here. It might ride above the tree-tops on the couriers of the air, but it could not woo these children of the spring with wily words of lying promises, nor could it drive them from her with stinging lash or take them with captive chains. They were secure in her love.

After a long time John Woodman came slowly to his feet, looking thoughtfully at the silvery surface of the pool and the spring flowing with never failing abundance. Then he repeated unconsciously and aloud: "My God shall supply your every need."

The Wise One

By Arthur B. Rhinow

THE Wise One sat in the shade of the palm. Old men said their fathers had told them that the tree was older than the Wise One.

"Did you see him?" he asked, in a voice that echoed centuries.

"Yes, we did," the men answered. They were tired. Their feet and sandals were dusty.

"And did you feel the power?"

They smiled; and one of them, a young man, laughed.

"We did just as Martha told us she did," the spokesman reported. "Each one of us took his turn. We waited until the prophet was surrounded by a crowd, we came up from behind, we touched the hem of his garment. Just as she told us. But we felt nothing like the power of which she speaks. Benoni, the fool, thought he felt something, but he is a fool. And he did not do as we told him to do. He listened to the prophet's words and forgot himself."

The Wise One was silent.

"We were scientific," the spokesman continued. "We tabulated our impressions. And we have come to the conclusion that Martha did not tell the truth. If she felt the power, why did not we? We did just as she told us she had done."

"But how was she cured?"

The spokesman shrugged his shoulders, and his eyebrows hinted at dark powers.

"Did you indeed do as she did?" the Wise One asked again, after a pause.

"Exactly as she told us. We waited until the people thronged about him, then we came up from behind, and we touched the hem of his garment."

The voice of the Wise One became deeper, unearthly.

"And had you felt the need of him?" he asked.

"No," the spokesman wavered. "We were making a scientific investigation." He coughed.

The Wise One dropped his eyes and sat very still. And in the long silence that followed, one after the other of the men stole away.

Property for Service or for Power

THE essential question in the modern discussion of industry and business is ethical in character. What is right, is the real issue, and right, in the last analysis, is simply a question of what is fair between men as human beings. The great appeal of socialism to many does not inhere in its materialistic and sordid philosophy, but in its offer of readjustment in the present inequitable division of property and profits. It appeals to the ethical sense. Whatever of good there is in our present system is blurred by its obvious failure to distribute benefits according to merit or earning power. Property rights legally supersede earning rights; possession is nine points at law as against one for the earnings of the human being. "It takes money to earn money" is true as a slogan for saving, but it is a sentence of death upon those who do not possess money. Our system results, even in a land of such opportunity as ours, in one-tenth of the population owning and enjoying more wealth than the other nine-tenths, while the ratio in an old land of money-making like England is even more on the side of possessions.

It has been said that "the only way to beat socialism is to beat it to it." It is a striking fact in history that one extreme not only begets another but it begets an extreme of like nature. A regime careless of life in France begot a revolution careless of life. A dictatorship of the aristocracy in Russia begets a dictatorship of the proletariat. A materialistic capitalism begets a materialistic philosophy of socialism, and an industrial system under capitalistic enterprise that tends to bureaucratic management (in the hands of a few) prepares the way for a bureaucratic socialism. J. Pierpont Morgan is quoted as having said, "After us socialism," and dogmatic Marxians argue that the present progressive centralization of wealth and its administration through interlocking directorates, syndicates and "gentlemen's agreements" is as inevitable a preparation for the coming of state socialism as is spring for summer.

The Power of Possession

There is tyranny in possession as mere power. It is not to the fact of possession that the denial of human rights is to be charged, but to a certain super-power inherent in our system of possession which administers property without reference to human rights. There are landlords in England who are the workless scions of a long line of workless ancestors; personally they contribute nothing to society—they toil not, neither do they spin, yet Solomon in all his glory was not so arrayed as are they. Some years ago the writer found old women hoeing in the gardens of one of the richest and most worthless of them for a shilling a day, and he talked many times with an old hostler employed by one of these idle rich who never made more than thirty shillings per week and in his old age was dependent upon the old-age pension granted by the government to the indigent. An Astor dwells in England on the unearned increments of an ancestor's good fortune in having been a farmer where New York City happened to grow up. Wage-earning tenants contribute to him an altogether disproportionate share of their family incomes in rentals that go to support in luxury a peerage purchased with them. Every stroke of the piston in British industry, in these reconstruction days, pays tribute to idle heirs whose fathers were in some manner made the possessors of unseen coal beds. This is to pay tribute to the super-power of the mere legal right of possession without any reference to service rendered or ethical methods of administration.

Then, as if the power of workless possession were not enough, the irony of this thing in a democratic society lies in the fact that these gilded parasites upon society should be the most envied and privileged members of the society off of which they live. Let perspiring, working humanity cease its labor, and their possessions are so much empty vanity. Their possession is worthless without labor, yet labor has no earning power without the use of their possession. So it follows that labor is not only dependent upon them but that they have a quasi title in labor. These idle privileged groups do not own labor, but they do own the prop to its house, and as Shakespeare said, "He who owns the prop to my house, owns my house."

The Good in Possession

Sir Arthur Young, a British landlord of two and one-half centuries ago, traveled far and wide over Europe, studying the various systems of land tenure and administration. He summed up the case against the fixed tenant systems by saying, "Ownership turns sands into gold." The fact of possession not only gives earning power but it provides incentive to live and to do and to be useful. An American teacher in China told the writer only yesterday that some of the worst features of the ancient guild system in that country were the inhibitions put upon initiative, the necessity of caring for hangers-on, and the dead levels maintained by the system. On the one hand is a paralyzing denial of the privilege of ownership in a capitalized super-power of possession which arbitrarily holds property without reference to service rendered, and on the other hand there exists a similar debility, because of the communal arrangement which inhibits the individual incentive that comes through personal possession.

But the inevitable reaction from an uncompromising power of personal possession will be the radical reaction to a communal possession on the theory that the cure for a monopoly by few is possession by all alike. The dogmatic Marxians are right in arguing that a denial of possession to the many by the few is the shortest route to the possession of all by all. In other words, the unreasoning, blind fury of the possessors who stand upon the privileges of legal possession without reference to social consequences and cry for the dungeon for all socialists, are doing more to make socialism inevitable than are the men they would imprison; the blind push of a sense of inequity and injustice in a society in which the masses are becoming more and more educated, is many times more powerful than are any words of persuasion. The New York capitalist who said the big fundamental mistake is the education of the masses was right from the standpoint of a hyper-capitalism. We are educating our masters.

Possession for Power vs. Possession for Service

The ethical demand for a more equitable distribution of our common possessions is not a demand for an arbitrary division of property or for its communal administration; it is simply a demand for a more equitable distribution of the profits of our complex machinery of production; it is a protest against property's taking for itself the whole increment of profits, and against the claim of "brains" to all the margin above a living for "muscle." Capitalism claims to rest upon individual initiative and to give expression to the creative impulse, but it has come to pass, through the unconditioned legal power of possession without reference to use, that four-fifths of active, earning humanity are denied those very opportunities in any considerable degree. As the great machine of productive enterprise grows more powerful, an increasing proportion of its marginal earnings goes to increase the disproportionate possessions of the few and thus to capitalize possession more and individual enterprise less. Capitalism thus results in a denial of incentive, the very thing which it has been charged socialism would deny.

Ethics thus lays upon us the obligation of democratizing industry and business and all our productive and distributing agencies. For this there is required a new sense of the stewardship of possessions. Above all, the great possessors must acknowledge this principle of stewardship. Possession for power must give way to possession for use and service. The measure of one's legal ownership must become the measure of one's social obligation, and the unlimited right of possession must give way to an ethical right to own only in the measure that possession is made of use to all. All legal devices that turn progressively and in a graduated manner unearned increments, excess profits, large incomes and inheritances into tax funds are a means of lowering the dangerous blood pressure of our present economic organism. This, with a constitutional building up of our social life through an increasing democratization of industry, through cooperative enterprises that still leave with individuals that sort of ownership which turns sands into gold, and through a social conscience that forbids all exploitation, monopoly or arbitrary privilege and which demands that all who eat must work, offers a progress through evolution; otherwise we will face revolution in due time, with the consequent use of that violence which always injures, if indeed it does not destroy.

London, July 9, 1921.

IS there to be peace with Ireland? The papers are full of hope this morning as I write, but no one who knows the tragedy of Ireland dare hope without trembling. Smuts has been here working as a peace maker. Everybody here longs for peace, but in the history of Ireland too often has the cup been dashed from the lips about to drink. Still, a land so beloved may come some day to the end of its sorrows, and some day the people of this country may begin to understand Ireland and to repent of their own share in the tragedy. For those who wish to know Ireland as it is, may I commend a beautiful book by E. C. Summerville and Martin Ross, the two ladies who were the authors of "Some Experiences of an Irish R. M." It is a story of love and renunciation and death, and around this central theme with rare skill the authors have grouped sketches of Irish character in its varied phases, and particularly have they shown the different bearings of the groups of Irishmen towards the future of their land. They agree in little but their love of Ireland. One passage I must give from this book.

"Oh! Peace, peace!" cried the priest. "We cry peace where there is no peace! When was there peace in Ireland! The lamp of revolt was never quenched in her! Sometimes it has been only a daggerpoint of flame; sometimes a red bonfire is kindled out of it! Look at what is happening this day and getting worse every day in place of better! Oh God! Will the time ever come when these flames will die in the broad daylight of peace and Ireland be left to fulfill her destiny? . . ."

"Dan who believed in salvation through the plough and was hated by the rebels as a loyalist and by the loyalists as a rebel, said bitterly,

"To be The Seething Pot from one generation to another! That's her destiny, I suppose!"

"To be the Sanctuary of Religion," said Father Hugh, with a light in his other-worldly eyes, 'to be the one country in the world that cherishes our holy church!' His voice had deepened and his brogue had broadened. The peasant boy that he had been was in his voice, but in his face was vision and assurance of a peace that is not of this world."

The authors of this tender and beautiful book make every voice heard that comes from Irish hearts. They do not speak their own mind, but no book I have ever read makes the tragedy of Ireland come home so directly to the reader.

The Great Fight and Other Things.

Last Sunday afternoon I had the pleasure of visiting one of the great Methodist central missions. It was a comforting fact to discover a great crowd of men at 3 o'clock on a broiling Sunday ready to hear of the things that matter. If one were to judge of the public mind by the proportions kept in the newspapers, one would have imagined that no one was thinking of anything but the Dempsey-Carpentier fight. The atmosphere of that Saturday when the fight took place was alarming, it was admitted. Everyone here seemed to be waiting for news of the fight, yet in all probability we had been a little hypnotized by the papers and we were ashamed of ourselves afterwards. Newspapers have a power of suggestion which might well be used for good, as it often has been for doubtful or secondary things. It was, however, reassuring to find that there was room in the minds of a thousand men that Sunday afternoon for other concerns than "sport." The plain truth is that it is those of us who care for sport most who regret this hysterical and ill-balanced mood of the hour.

Is the Nonconformist Conscience Asleep?

Much attention has been given to Dr. Garvie's discussion of the Christian conscience, and especially of the nonconformist conscience. "This," he declares, "has been found disappointing in recent times. Occasions have arisen," he says, "in recent years when a clear and firm indication of the path of duty for the nation might have been expected and has not been given, at least in such a way as to arrest attention and exert influence." Some of the reasons for this Dr. Garvie analyses with remarkable candor and fairness. He shows how the former political unity of the free churches was broken up in the '80s and how the formal cause of this division was but a sign of a deeper cleavage. At the present moment he adds: "Discord and division threaten many of the churches, if any decisive action is taken on political issues; and counsels of prudence sometimes prevail over the promptings of conscience. It is argued that there can seldom be a political issue in which the moral principle involved is so distinct and certain as to warrant the breaking up of the harmony necessary for a church, if it is to do its work effectively. Allowing some force to this consideration, I myself am convinced that it would be good for themselves as well as the world if the churches learned to live more dangerously, to take greater risks, and if need be pay a higher price for fidelity to Christian conscience."

A General Staff For the Church

We want better staff work in the Christian church. There should be trusted men set apart by the churches to think out the real bearing of Christian principles upon the practical questions of the hour. Such a staff must be competent and it must have weight in the churches. The weakness of the moment lies in the powerlessness of the wise leaders to communicate their wisdom. There is enough guidance on many matters already to be found by those who seek for it. But the staff which we need is not the one which will answer when it is questioned. It is one which will declare with authority even when it is not asked the mind of the Christian church. The hard working pastor has neither the time nor the training to preach politically. Very often he makes a fool of himself by his plain lack of data and by his exaggerated rhetoric. There were no fools greater in war time than the rhetorical preachers, who made their pulpits into outposts for government departments. They had their reward then, but they have little now. Over-emphasis in style and haziness in material are our besetting sins, and it is small wonder that we are warned to keep out of politics. At the same time the Christian church should have its experts who know the facts better than statesmen can know them, and who know the mind of Christ and can relate the two.

In General

The new president of the Wesleyan Methodist church, the Rev. J. A. Sharp, has richly deserved the honor given to him. The papers note that he won his way from the carpenter's bench, and that he has admirably served the publications department of the church. He is reputed to be one of those who make changes quietly and present a revolution as an accomplished fact, when no one knows that a revolution has happened. . . . My friend, the Rev. Herbert Arnold, who has just passed away, spent the last years of his ministerial life, after he had retired from a settled pastorate, in a very valuable service to the churches. If a minister were ordered away on sick leave for half a year or if a church desired a period of quiet after some troubles, or if it were not ready to call a minister, Mr. Arnold would go to the rescue, and by his tact and real graciousness of spirit, as well as by his powers as a preacher, he brought many churches around difficult corners. It is a form of ministry to which senior men might well give themselves. . . . The season of fellowship conferences and camps is beginning. Once the summer was a time of rest for busy workers in the churches, and there is rest still to be had, but it is taken in other ways. Sometimes those who knew the former order of things wonder if complete detachment in a holiday is not better than a conference at Swanwick. It is a significant fact that Spurgeon used to count the days before his holiday as schoolboys do the days before the end of them.

Woolman or Wesley or Both?

The Free Church Fellowship in August has for the theme of its conference, "Revival in the Life of the Church." True to its method of careful inquiry and joint thinking, it is trying to discover what can be learned from the past for our immediate guidance. Is there any former revival which only needs to be repeated and then our poverty would be turned to wealth and our silence to song? And if any type of revival is nearer to our condition which is it? One interesting question has been raised—do we need a Wesley or a Woolman the more? Or do we need a blend of both schools of thought and devotion? Or will any revival that comes be fresh and startling and unclassified? It is a useful study and may lead to some fruitful service.

Into the Enemy's Quarters

We find spokesmen of the church often so apologetic that it is cheering to find one who has every right to speak arising in his might to stay the old-fashioned champions of rationalism: Writes the Rev. C. E. Raven: "We suppose that in the history of human thought no change has been more rapid and no collapse more complete than that which has befallen rationalism. It is probably true to say that twenty years ago the bulk of the scholars in our universities were agnostics and very many were materialists. The thinkers and teachers were beginning to escape into a larger world, but the students were still toiling with "honest doubt." Down till about 1909 there was still life among the unbelievers, though materialism was plainly on its deathbed. Suddenly it died, and long before the war a great revival of spiritual and theistic belief had begun, with a corresponding increase of vitality in the churches.

That July

July is with us, with the scent of the limes and the harvests ripening—the July never comes without memories of THAT JULY in 1914. There are few of us but have memories of that time and of the friends who were still with us. We were camped, some of us, with jolly London boys by the Solent, and the great naval inspection was forward. Of those who helped us, three were public school or university men. They are all on the other side, and many of the boys to whom they were giving their friendship. These are the thoughts which come with this month when life is at its full tide in the world of nature. It is of death we think and yet not of death as a limit.

"Some strange thoughts transcend our wonted themes
And into glory peep."

CORRESPONDENCE

Legion Cannot Be Bought

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: There is no paper which comes to my desk that I read with such thoughtful eagerness as your esteemed weekly. Whether I agree with what you write or not, it at least makes me think. But two sentences in your last issue (July 21) move me almost to profane thought.

I have noticed before that your opinion of the ex-soldier or American Legion members was rather low, and I have wondered at it. In the first editorial of the above-mentioned issue that unjustified spirit crops out again. Commenting on the opposition on the part of the President to the proposed bonus for able-bodied soldiers you wrote, "Here was an opportunity to have purchased the political allegiance of the coming generation of young men." One is tempted to apply the short and ugly word made current by President Roosevelt to that statement and to pay for you the admission fee into his once thriving Ananias Club.

If you think that the patriotism of the men who a few years ago volunteered willingly to fight for what they conceived to be a great principle (I speak as one who enlisted and was not drafted) is at so low an ebb that it can be purchased for a few hundred dollars, you are wrong. When two years ago, with the government's finances in better condition than at present, the Legion posts in Connecticut began voting whether to support the movement for this bonus bill, about a third of the posts voted to oppose it. Also there are many thousands of ex-soldiers not members of the American Legion or any other organization, and these are the ones who are perhaps even less interested in getting something for themselves, many of whom oppose the bonus because with President Harding they know our country cannot afford to pay it. Your statement is slander on the good name of thousands of ex-soldiers.

Now don't misunderstand me. I oppose the bonus at present, not because I do not think it just in principle, but simply because the folks who stayed at home so effectively looted the government's treasury that we who gave our time and risked our lives for $33 per must again sacrifice ourselves for the country's welfare. The one thing which makes an ex-soldier want the bonus more than anything else is when his friends who stayed at home begin telling how much they made at wartime wages. Remember, there were preachers who drew salaries from their churches, worked at big wages in munitions factories during the week, and cashed in on large dividends of patriotism, while I and others were saving our thirty bucks a month so that if our leave period ever came we might have money enough to avail ourselves of it. And then, when my comrades came home they found their old jobs waiting for them (sometimes), while the fellow who stayed at home had been promoted past them and was now their boss.

The bonus is just, but simply not expedient at present. For that reason I and many other returned soldiers oppose it, and we resent your insinuation that our political allegiance could be bought with the few hundred dollars we would get.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The Christian Century continues to grow better with each succeeding number. It has now been nearly two years since I became a subscriber, and the magazine has taken a permanent place on my annual list. The current number (July 21) is especially thought provoking. Your castigation of those companies which continually pester our lives with their insulting circulars advertising "sermons for all occasions" is well administered and, too, rightly deserved.

I have been wondering if there is any significance in the proximity of that editorial and the other on "Main Street in London." Perhaps Mr. Sinclair Lewis included the church in his recent satirical adventure because of such institutions as the "sermon factories." If so he ought to receive from the religious press and from sincere ministers praise rather than blame.

Certainly nothing is more humiliating than to be compelled to acknowledge that there are men with consciences so "blunt" as to preach a sermon on the peril of stealing, the sermon itself being the best illustration of the subject. The medical profession, perhaps every profession is troubled with its "quacks," but an intelligent public is quickly able to distinguish between the faker and the genuine; but the ministerial faker is for a time at least proof against discovery, and through the Christian courtesy of his fellows, always secure from exposure.

It is such miserable makeshift work—if I may dignify it with that honorable word—that lends a sense of justice to criticism such as that of Mr. John Spargo and others. The sooner the ministry is purged of such insincerity (in many cases unconscious insincerity) and all that it implies, the sooner will the ministry of the church be augmented by young and vigorous lives ready to pour their energies into Christ's service.

Swift Changes in Fortune*

RARELY do we find such vivid and sudden contrasts as in the few verses recorded here: Barnabas and Paul are taken for gods by the crowd, Barnabas is called Jupiter and Paul Mercury; oxen and garlands after the manner of the old Grecian ceremonials are brought to do them honor. Eight verses farther on the multitude drags them out of town and Paul is stoned and left for dead. Here is indeed honor and dishonor, a god and a dead dog!

But Paul was so completely devoted to his cause that nothing phased him. In whatever state he found himself, he learned to be content,—surrounded by admiring friends or beaten in the prison, walking the gardens of Ephesus or escaping from a sinking ship, preaching to vast audiences who admired him so much that they would gladly have plucked out their eyes and given them to him or suffering lonely confinement in the prison at Cæsarea. To live was Christ, to die was gain. Living or dying, he belonged body and soul to his Master. He thought of himself as a bondsman, his only joy was to advance his Master's interests.

One of the most difficult things that we have to face is this very variation of fortune. From health the family is suddenly precipitated into painful sickness, in an hour all the sunshine seems to die out, all the bird song seems a mockery, and the laughter seems hideously out of place. It was easy to serve God when the family was well, have we the faith and grip on God to go ahead now? Can we permit the sorrow and the heartache, which never leave us, to mellow us into rare sympathy, until we find ourselves more useful, being surprised to find how many people were traveling under the same load? Here comes financial disaster. In a day all our savings are imperiled, then lost. We had become used to certain luxuries. The proud house, the big car, the club, the vacation, the exclusive shops, the servants, the entertainment of a certain set of friends. It seemed easy to worship God when we lived in the midst of these happy circumstances. Then came the crash. Money was scarce, we moved to a little house on a side street, we dismissed the servants, we sold the car, we did not renew our memberships in the clubs, we shopped at the department stores, we worked all year, the elaborate dinners were no more and many of our supposed friends cut us dead. Did faith in God perish then? Were we serving God for gain? Or again, we had always enjoyed almost perfect health. Night and day we worked without thinking of the energy spent. We could eat anything, run up ten flights of stairs, toil until one in the morning, and laugh at the cautions people gave us about working too hard. We gloried in our recklessness. Others might fall at the right hand and the left but we would go right on. Then one day something happened. The doctor had discovered high blood pressure. He prescribed a limited diet. He demanded ten hours a day in bed. He advised a trip of weeks' duration. He said, "Now, if you are careful you may reasonably expect to live until you are seventy, but if there is any more nonsense you will probably pass out at fifty." In that hour the world changed color, death stared you in the face for the first time. All day long you kept murmuring, "What's the use; what's the use?" If you would drop out suddenly another world would profit by all your Herculean toil. How about your faith—did it waver in that moment? The wheel of fortune spins swiftly; today you win, tomorrow you lose. Can you keep your faith steady? Today you are prosperous—can you keep your head and not become overbearing, proud and insolent? Tomorrow everything goes wrong, the stocks shrink, the dividends fail, the assessments come, prices fade away, property deteriorates, heavy losses rush in upon you. Can you still smile and trust and help the other fellow? Paul could say, "I know how to abound and how to be abased," but his faith was so true, his confidence so strong, his trust in Christ so absolute that nothing changed him. Living or dying, abounding or suffering, admired or hated, succeeding or failing, with scores of converts or with none he knew whom he trusted and that his trust would be guarded. That is a real faith worthy our imitation.

THE ONLY POSSIBLE PEACE, by Frederick C. Howe. Mr. Howe always writes with knowledge of the facts and a keen critical acumen. Finding economic factors most potent in bringing war on to the world, he analyzes those in which the threat is most potential and points out the way to prevent their convergence toward another conflict. The highway is along the line of Woodrow Wilson's ideals as expressed in his various war and peace papers. He would have strategic places behind which strong nations hold their war powers internationalized. If Suez, the Dardanelles and the Bagdad Railway were internationalized, disarmament would be made possible and there would come an end of that fear that keeps suspicion breeding war. All disputatious problems that hinge on an overdone nationalistic or imperial policy would be put in charge of an international tribunal and weak peoples coached into responsible government instead of exploited for gain. SOCIAL CONDITIONS IN AN AMERICAN CITY, by Shelby M. Harrison. It is seven years since the Springfield Survey was made, and the city has taken on a new social aspect since that time. But the findings of the survey, which have been circulated widely in sectional reports, and are now made available, in summary form in the present volume, are of first rate and immediate importance. The Springfield Survey was one of two exhaustive studies which the Sage Foundation has made. The five-volume report on Pittsburgh is still a classic work, and the present volume becomes at once a part of the indispensable equipment of the city worker. Added to the summary itself, which is presented in readable form and extensively illustrated, is an appendix containing direct testimony on the results of the project. The prime object of a survey is to secure cooperative action in the direction of social betterment. That the Springfield Survey was a success as judged by this standard is abundantly shown by the fact to which Mr. Harrison bears testimony, that more than forty distinct items appear in the list of betterment undertakings which followed the survey within about two years. This fact alone warrants the most careful study of the project of which the volume gives an account. (Sage Foundation, $2.50.)

THE WEEKDAY CHURCH SCHOOL. By H. F. Cope. The book tells in an interesting fashion what has been, is being and can be done to extend religious education into all the days of the week. (Doran, $2.00).

ONE THOUSAND EVANGELISTIC ILLUSTRATIONS. By Aquilla Webb. This book is more valuable than most books of this sort. It is highly commended in an introductory note by Dr. E. Y. Mullins, of Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville. (Doran, $5.00).

SOCIAL LEGISLATION IN ILLINOIS, by Seba Eldridge. A carefully prepared survey of the social legislation needed in Illinois. It tells the facts regarding housing, child welfare, the care of dependents and defectives, widowed mothers and the administration of laws already on the statutes. A more centralized and scientific administration is recommended as are laws bringing the care of the needy up to a genuinely human standard. (W. M. Shimmin & Co., Rockford, Ill.)

Summer Conference at Union Seminary Closes

One hundred and fifty ministers from all parts of the country attended the summer conference at Union Theological Seminary of New York this summer. Some outstanding scholars lectured, but it was not the lectures that made the deepest impression upon the men. Trips were made to famous churches and settlements of the city. Evenings were spent in conferences on the practical problems of the church. All the ministers present were accommodated in the dormitories, which assured comfortable quarters for all.

Chicago Church Federation Has Aggressive Program

The summer slump will not be allowed to continue into the autumn season if the plans of the Chicago Church Federation are brought to success. On October 9, the fiftieth anniversary of the Chicago fire will be observed, and on the evening of this day community services will be held throughout the city with an emphasis upon good citizenship. On Armistice day in November will be a big demonstration of church strength in a great mass meeting which will be held at the Auditorium. The themes announced for this day will be "God and the Nation" and "Making the Modern City a City of God." A Sunday school parade is being planned for the afternoon of November 11. In addition to these positive announcements there is a tentative plan of securing Gipsy Smith to speak two or three nights in mass meetings to quicken the evangelistic spirit in the various churches. Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston is president of the Chicago Church Federation.

Union Church Solves the Community Problem

Mill Plain, Conn., is a residence district near Waterbury, Conn. During the past year the people erected a small chapel and secured Rev. Lawrence Day, a theological student of Yale Divinity School, to preach for them. In the constituency of this worshipping group there are ten denominations represented. It was clear that no church could be organized on a denominational basis. In consequence a union church was formed on the basis of a declared belief in Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior. On the charter membership roll are the names of 259 people, so the new organization starts out with splendid prospects. On the day of the formal organization of the church Judge Arthur F. Ells, president of the Waterbury Federation of Churches, was present and brought the greetings of these churches. Mr. Day was formerly assistant pastor of First Christian church of Lincoln, Neb.

Dr. Newton's Old Church Finds Pastor

The Liberal Christian church of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, was put on the ecclesiastical map by Dr. Joseph Fort Newton. By tradition a Universalist church it has in later years come to be an independent church of liberal evangelical character. It was from this church that Dr. Newton was called to the City Temple, London, in 1916. It has recently called as pastor Rev. Waldemar W. Argow of New York City. Mr. Argow was formerly pastor of First Baptist church, Lorain, Ohio, and in recent years has served as director of Christian service in the Twenty-third Street Y. M. C. A. of New York City.

Special Trains to Winona Convention

The Disciples International Convention at Winona Lake, Ind., August 28-September 4, is arousing wide interest. The transportation secretary, E. E. Elliot, announces special trains to the convention from St. Louis and from Chicago. The railroads have granted special rates and it is believed that large numbers of automobile tourists will drive to the grounds at Winona Lake as a vacation outing. The approach to the convention this year is noteworthy in that there seem to be no burning issues. Disciples conventions for a number of years have been made lively by the assaults of a small group of conservatives upon the officials of the organization. This year the usual pre-convention campaign against these men has been omitted. It is expected that the convention will develop large plans of advance work for the communion, and a committee is now at work upon a new call to Disciple forces. The subscription of the Interchurch underwritings fund opens the way for this. The reports of the United Christian Missionary Society indicate that the receipts for the month of June were the largest in the history of the denomination for any single month. Monies received at the headquarters at St. Louis amounted to $823,000.

Dr. Wilbur Crafts Visits Chicago

Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts, who visited Chicago recently, making a number of public addresses, is one of the interesting figures in American Protestantism. He has had a wide denominational experience, being successively a pastor of Methodist, Congregational and Presbyterian churches. In later years he became interested in reform work. His effort to stop the Dempsey-Carpentier fight brought him into great prominence this year. His organization seeks to restrain gambling and to promote laws against easy divorce as well as to assist in the enforcement of the Volstead act. Mr. Crafts is an advocate of federal marriage laws which would supersede the separate state enactments upon this subject.

Clearing House of Foreign Language Literature

The Home Missions Council has established a bureau of information with regard to foreign language literature on religion for immigrants. This bureau has taken over the files of the Interchurch World Movement, which had gathered a considerable quantity of this literature. As a result of this research there is found to be a much better supply of religious literature for immigrants than was at first supposed. It is believed that new sources of supply will be uncovered from time to time which will be significant in home mission work. Some important racial groups have no religious newspaper printed in their language, and these same groups have socialist journals which are quite as much concerned with anti-religious propaganda as with constructive teaching of the socialist dogma. When the research is complete it is likely that steps will be taken to supply glaring deficiencies in the literature.

Campbell Institute Holds Annual Meeting in Chicago

The annual meeting of the Campbell Institute was held at University Church of the Disciples July 27-29. This organization is unique among the denominations of America. It was founded by a group of young men of advanced university training twenty-five years ago and includes in its membership chiefly preachers and teachers. In recent years the strictness of the requirements for membership have been somewhat modified, but the organization still stands as the sponsor for higher university training. The president of this year's meeting was Dr. R. C. Flickinger of Northwestern University and the secretary Dr. E. S. Ames. A monthly publication is carried on called The Scroll. The Campbell Institute includes in its membership men of various kinds of theological opinion, though it is reputed among the Disciples to be an organization of theological liberals. The topics this year were of a more practical nature than formerly. A group of speakers addressed themselves to the theme, "What Will the Disciples Contribute to the Christian World in the Next Twenty-five Years." The organization is undertaking to start a library for the circulation of books by mail and a national lectureship.

Southern Baptists Send Out Missionaries

The Southern Baptist denomination is sending out fifty new missionaries this autumn. Most of these are from Texas, which is the state of greatest strength for this denomination. The missionary leaders have inquired into the religious experience of these new missionaries and have discovered that all but four were converted before the age of fourteen, and that all but two came from Christian homes.

Unitarians Train Sunday School Teachers

The arid intellectualism that has so often characterized Unitarian churches is giving way to a new era of church enterprise. The business men who are organized into the Unitarian Laymen's League are responsible for a number of new activities. Last summer they brought most of their ministers to Harvard for a period of summer study. This year the league conducted at Star Island a religious training school for prospective Sunday school teachers. The students came from all over the nation and represent twenty states. Most of these were men. The league statement in the promotion of the school is significant: "A man is proudest of himself when he has served a child; done something to make the day brighter for some boy or girl. The finest service that can be rendered 'unto one of these' is to help them in the creation of their most valued asset—character."

Works for Children of Russia

The Russian Relief and Reconstruction Fund maintains Rev. F. F. Komlosy in Russia for the purpose of aiding the children of that country. Mr. Komlosy is now in America presenting the needs of Russian children. He says of the situation in Russia: Morally Russia is dead. Mentally she has fallen into decay. The condition of the present adult generation is so appalling that parents are scarcely fit to have charge of their own children lest they drag them down into the same pit, and Russia's chance of regeneration is put farther and farther back. The gap in the children's lives is becoming wider every day and consequently harder to bridge over. The result is everywhere apparent, so that it is a matter of urgency to save the coming generation lest Russia go completely to the devil."

Another Big Bible Class Record

The race for the distinction of having the largest Bible class in the world keeps on. Just now the news is going the rounds of a Presbyterian class in Montgomery, Ala., which had on a special Sunday an attendance of thirty-five hundred men. The average weekly attendance at this class is said to be 800. In such classes there is considerable organization, and the boosting organization is distinct from the teaching program.

Takes Strong Action Against the Dance

Though it has been common for evangelical ministers of various types to denounce the dance, few denominations have had an official pronouncement on the subject. The Methodist Episcopal church has had such a pronouncement which has been very unpopular in a certain section of the church. It is interesting to note that the Hicksite Quakers have recently abolished their rule against the dance and that the southern Presbyterian church has adopted the following resolution: "Nor need the Church of Christ have any hesitancy in announcing its position on this subject; for the men of the world agree, with one consent, that it is inconsistent with the nature of the Christian profession for members of the church to engage in the modern dance. The assembly has uniformly discouraged and condemned the modern dance in all its forms as tending to evil, whether practiced in public halls or private parlors. And we affectionately urge all our Christian parents not to send their children to dancing schools, where they acquire a fondness and an aptitude for this dangerous amusement."

Junior Church Numbers Two Hundred

The problem of ministering to the younger members of the church with a sermon adapted to the needs of the boys and girls is being met in some communities by the organization of a junior church. The congestion in crowded buildings is met in this way as the junior church often worships in a Sunday school room. First Methodist church of Anniston, Ala., has a junior church with over two hundred members, all under fifteen years of age. The objection urged against the junior church in some communities is that the children do not grow up loyal to the church of their parents in this way. However the junior church is one of the many pieces of experimentation that is going on in evangelical churches these days to meet the demand for a religion that will minister to the whole community.

Cools Off the Congregation With Ice

It is to be admitted that the theaters thought of it first. This hot summer they have been advertising in the big cities auditoriums that were cooled with tons of ice. Meanwhile the church people have been mopping perspiration and facing a summer slump in proportion to the inordinate temperatures of this year. First Methodist church of St. Louis recently experimented with the use of ice at church. Twelve one hundred pound cakes of ice were placed at the front of the auditorium and electric fans played the breezes upon the ice, driving coolness down the pews upon the waiting congregation. Though the thermometer was 90 outside the building, the inside temperature was very comfortable. Some churches with an indirect steam heating equipment where the air is driven over steam coils are thinking of substituting ice pans for steam coils in the summer, which could be done with a minimum of expense.

Official Organs Are Bones of Contention

The effort to establish a weekly newspaper as the official organ of a denomination has been the bone of contention in many ecclesiastical fellowships. The Baptist, published by the Northern Baptist Convention, is still compelled to compete with the Watchman-Examiner, a privately owned paper. The United Presbyterians at their last General Assembly took action to establish a denominational organ under the direct control of the Assembly. The committee in carrying out these instructions is changing the character of the young people's paper, the Christian Union Herald, from a young people's journal to a journal for adults, and the name is being changed to the United Presbyterian Herald. Meanwhile the paper under private ownership called the United Presbyterian goes on and it would seem that the denominationally owned organ would have to compete with this journal. The situation does not contribute to the peace and harmony of the United Presbyterian denomination.

Prayermeeting Goes to the Roof

Texas Disciples preachers are continually original and interesting. Rev. William Dunn Ryan of South End Church of Disciples, Houston, has taken his weekly prayermeeting to the roof garden of the church and has over a hundred people present every week. Many other church meetings are held there, and by this means the summer slump is reduced to a minimum. First church in Ft. Worth

Pilgrimage Play of the Life of Christ

SOMETHING that approaches the Passion Play of Oberammergau in the magnificence of its undertaking is the Pilgrimage Play at Hollywood, Cal. The life of Christ is presented, the mountains and hills of the section helping very greatly in reproducing the atmosphere of Palestine. Twelve episodes from the life of Christ are dramatized, and these are given almost entirely in the language of the new testament. Mrs. Christine Wetherill Stevenson, who has spent much time in Palestine, has given much thought and attention to the costuming. She has come to believe that Jesus always wore a head-dress in conformity with oriental custom, so the Christus this year will wear the oriental covering.

Mr. Henry Herbert is a second year taking the part of the Christus. His simplicity, sincerity, and reverence, with the addition of a beautiful voice, have made his work most acceptable to the audiences. The other parts are taken by men and women who have sought to enter into the spirit of the Bible story.

Mr. Arthur Farwell has charge of the music. Many instruments are used in the production of the musical effects, among these being the great organ, a string quartet, brass quartet, kettledrums and a chorus of twenty selected voices. The celestial voices are presented by the chorus in musical form. These celestial voices waken the shepherd on the hill-side and warn Joseph.

The scenes that are presented include the Annunciation to the Virgin Mary, the Wise Men before Herod, the Babe in the Manger, the Adoration of the Shepherds, the Coming of the Wise Men, the Baptism of Christ, the Temptation in the Wilderness, the Transfiguration, the Miracles, the Last Supper, the Agony in the Garden of Gethesemane, the Resurrection and the Ascension.

There is every prospect that the Pilgrimage Play in California will attract thousands of tourists in years to come. It is believed that the effect of the play will be to deepen Christian devotion in all those who witness the sacred scenes.

has recently secured an athletic director who will spend his whole time in the physical education of boys. This church now has a considerable staff of workers. The ministers at Electra preached recently in a theater on the theme "Does one have to believe the whole Bible to be a Christian?" He boldly asserted that it is Bible doctrine to answer this question in the negative. His sermon was a plea to the church not to make the burdens of faith unduly heavy.

Pastor of Gretna Green Church Is Married

The most popular church in the middle west for weddings is the famous little church that inspired the song, "The Little Brown Church in the Vale." Hundreds of couples from all parts of the middle west come here to be married in the course of the year. The minister, T. M. Walton, is a Disciple, though the church is of Congregational tradition. Recently Mr. Walton was married to a popular young lady of the community, Rev. Guy B. Williamson of Fifteenth Avenue Church of Disciples, Rock Island, Ill., performing the ceremony.

Cause of Union in Canada Grows

The vote in the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church of Canada on the subject of union with Methodists and Congregationalists was overwhelming this year. Those favoring union numbered 414, while those opposed numbered 107. A committee of thirty-three was appointed to negotiate the union, and of this committee eleven were taken from the ranks of those voting against the union. It seems therefore a foregone conclusion that the union will ultimately be consummated, and that without division in the ranks of the Presbyterian church. If this is achieved it will demonstrate the Canadian Presbyterian leaders as men of marked Christian statesmanship.

Federation Follows Feud

Federation of churches is better than a feud between churches, in the view of the citizens of Rockport, Mass. For forty years a Congregational church and a Universalist church divided honors in a restricted territory and the competition knew no rules in former days. Finally both churches became very weak, as is apt to happen in such a situation. Four years ago the Universalist church was compelled to close, being no longer able to maintain a minister. Since the federation of the two congregations a membership of over a hundred has been mustered and once more the preaching of the gospel goes forward in this once sadly divided village. This story might be duplicated in thousands of villages of the United States save for the happy sequel which may be recorded in the case of the Rockport community.

Dr. Poteat Will Spend a Year in China

Dr. E. M. Poteat has been one of the most inspirational speakers upon the missionary platform in recent years. His labors in connection with the Interchurch World Movement made him known to a larger constituency than the Baptists. During the past year he has been connected with the New World Movement of the Northern Baptist convention. Dr. Poteat resigned from this service the past spring and with his wife and daughter will sail for China the latter part of this month. He will spend a year there preaching and teaching the New Testament. Dr. Poteat has given two of his sons to the missionary service in China, and he will visit them while in the oriental republic.

Interdenominational Church Ordains Woman

Mrs. Clemme Ellis White was ordained to the gospel ministry by an interdenominational council in New York recently. Baptists and Congregationalists have the custom in connection with ordination of calling in representatives of a group of churches. The unique feature of this ordination was not only the fact that the person ordained was a woman, but that the council was composed of representatives of four denominations. Representatives from the Baptists, the Methodists, the Presbyterians and the Dutch Reformed sat in the council. Mrs. White is to serve as superintendent of West Side Mission at 268 W. 47th St. In the examination preceding ordination Mrs. White was questioned with regard to her Christian experience, her theological opinions and her call to the ministry and the questions are said to have been quite searching. Mrs. White is secretary of the International Union of Gospel Missions. In days gone by she was a teacher in the public schools and served in the mission without pay.

Dr. Barton Pronounces "Blue Laws" Story a Malicious Hoax

Nearly everybody in the United States believes that in New England there were once a set of "Blue Laws" which forbade a mother even to kiss her child on the Sabbath day, and which provided severe penalties for walking in the garden on the holy day. Dr. William E. Barton, of Oak Park, Ill., is something of a historian in addition to being the popular pastor of First Congregational Church. He has investigated these stories and declares: "The Connecticut Blue Laws were a malicious invention, created nearly one hundred and fifty years after their supposed enactment.

How Shall I Get Ready to Preach?

A church college gives religious training a state school may not give. A state university gives a broader and more thorough training than the average church college can give.

At the Bible College of Missouri a student obtains an intensive religious training while getting the educational benefits of the University of Missouri. Attending both schools at once, he combines the merits of both.

Ministerial students earn their way preaching for near-by churches.

Dr. Grenfell Finishes Tour of United States

Dr. Grenfell is now at work for the thirty-first summer among the people of Labrador. He has just completed a lecture tour of the United States and Canada. The proceeds of these lectures go into the treasury of the Labrador mission. There is a very serious economic situation in Labrador today. An oversupply of fish in the world makes it seem probable that the hardy fishermen of the north will find no market this year for their catch. Dr. Grenfell is seeking a fund of a million and a half as endowment for the work which he has begun. The city of Boston cheerfully took $111,000 of this fund and raised it promptly. Among the new workers in Labrador this summer are a number of women who go as "Nutrition Experts." These women will seek to introduce better methods in the housekeeping of the Labrador women.

Episcopal Social Workers Meet

The Episcopal church is noted for its interest in the social problems of the age. It is unique in that it has called together its social workers in a great conference at Milwaukee which met just prior to the meeting of the great secular organization of social workers. Mr. John M. Glenn made a strong plea for cooperation with other Christian bodies in carrying on the social ministry of the gospel. Mr. Glenn is director of the Russell Sage Foundation. The needs of the child were given careful consideration and it was the judgment of the social workers that the church should not relinquish the care of her own children. It will be henceforth an item of Episcopal policy to gather up the orphans of the church and place them out in homes where they will be brought up well in the faith. The conference urges upon the priests of the church the creation of a parish committee in each parish which will be charged with the local administration of the social service program. That the conference was regarded as important in the life of the denomination is seen in the fact that the presiding bishop of the church, Bishop Gailor, was present, as well as numerous other ecclesiastics of rank.

America Will Not Be Represented at the Vatican

Those who are particularly alert in watching the political propaganda of the Roman Catholic church have been much concerned over rumors that President Harding would appoint an ambassador to the Vatican. England continues such a relationship which was begun during the war and France has recently resumed diplomatic relations after a break running back through many years. President Harding asserts that no representative will be appointed unless such action is directed by congress. This should allay the gossip which has been going about recently. It should grow increasingly apparent to the Roman Catholic leaders that the source of much of the anti-Catholic feeling through the world rests back upon the political pretensions of the pope.

Prominent Disciple Layman Takes Vacation in China

David W. Teachout is one of the leading laymen of the Disciples churches of Cleveland. His interest in missionary work has led him to take an extended vacation in China. He has been charmed with the scenery in China and has bought a bungalow on a mountain in which to spend a part of his vacation. Mrs. Teach-out, who accompanies him, is the daughter of the late Rev. F. E. Meigs, a distinguished missionary to China.

Business Manager a New Profession in the Church

The over-worked pastors of large churches have been seeking for years some method of finding time to do their reading and spiritual service. The latest evolution in the church is the new profession of business manager. Campbell Park Presbyterian Church of Chicago has a manager who looks after all the business details. The pastor preaches while another minister carries on the work of pastoral calling. In this way the minister may once more become an intellectual leader in his community.

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffeine contained in each:

Black tea —1 cupful.....	1.54 gr.
(hot) (5 fl. oz.)
Green tea —1 glassful.....	2.02 gr.
(cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice)
Coca-Cola —1 drink, 8 fl. oz.....	.61 gr.
(prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup)

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Outline of History

By H. G. WELLS

A SURVEY OF THE 41 CHAPTERS

The World's Dawn.

The world was old long before the coming of man, those immeasurable ages of life's first faint stirrings of which most of us know so little and are unable to learn much from professorial monographs. The "Outline" gives this marvellously interesting story in language which brings before the mind's eye a thoroughly understandable realization of those ages through which mass and matter passed, up to the crude beginnings of living creation, and thence to the giant reptiles and animals—a brilliantly told story, covering millions of years and culminating in the advent of man.

Man's Advent.

The dim mystery of man's origin is wisely dealt with. Sources are examined—the Bible, Evolution, and so on, in the light of actual discoveries of the Neanderthalic and other ages, and so is composed a picture of earliest human life and origins, which is full of enlightenment on the question. After that picture, the reader is shown mankind's victories and failures in the struggle for life against mammoths and monsters, his gradual rise from the primitive, the instinct of love and hate, the family idea, the earliest methods of protection and reasoning, the growth of intelligence. And so he emerges from savagery, he takes his first step along the path which leads to today.

Civilization's Cradle.

It is curious to picture an inarticulate world, yet it was so until man began to think; then came speech, which for long was the only means of record, a time of mythology and superstition out of which religion grew. The next steps in communication were signs, picture-language and writing, then art and culture. How, gradually over many centuries, all this came about in different parts of the world is told in the "Outline" and a marvellously fascinating story it is, of a world in civilization's cradle, still in the swaddling clothes of development.

History's Beginnings.

When mankind woke up to a realization of cause and effect, history began; sanguinary wars, brutal enslavings of nations, wholesale magnificent though crude conceptions. Thrilling pages these make in "Outline," wherein graphic portrayal is given of how these early races, some vanished, others surviving, made history, and in doing so wove the fabric of the world's polity, out of which evolved both the freedoms and oppressions of today.

In Anno Domini.

A right understanding of these years is necessary to the student of social and political questions, particularly in early Anno Domini when the world consciousness was keen and its conscience impressionable. It was the age of mind over matter, of noble chivalries struggling amid selfishness and greed, of Crusades and Magna Charta, the dawn of light and freedom. These two thousand years of progress are vividly outlined by Mr. Wells in words which get at the truth through the glamour and glitter and leave the reader in good view of the facts in accurate perspective.

What of Tomorrow?

After coming down to recent years, traversing the nineteenth century and revealing much about the Great War, the author takes the reader to the top of the high tower of his farsightedly practical imagination and shows him the world as it is to be if right and freedom are to sway and mankind is to gain good from the trials which have lately been tearing civilization. Without doubt such a coherent and common-sense plan of world co-operation as here depicted is an ideal worth the sacrifice of the War years, and if it is to come it will only be by united and unselfish action. Such a plan to study and work for is alone worth many times the cost of these volumes—invaluable as they are in other respects.

"OUR BIBLE"

By Herbert L. Willett

One of the most popular volumes ever published by The Christian Century Press. This recent book by Dr. Willett has been received with real enthusiasm by the religious and educational press of the country. The following are a few of the estimates passed upon the volume:

"Just the book that has been needed for a long time for thoughtful adults and senior students, a plain statement of the sources and making of the books of the Bible, of their history, of methods of criticism and interpretation and of the place of the Bible in the life of today."—Religious Education.

"Every Sunday school teacher and religious worker should read this book as a beginning in the important task of becoming intelligently religious."—Biblical World.

"The book will do good service in the movement which is now rapidly discrediting the aristocratic theology of the past."—The Public.

"The man who by long study and wide investigation, aided by the requisite scholarship and prompted by the right motive—the love of truth, not only for truth's sake but for humanity's sake—can help us to a better understanding of the origin, history and value of the Bible, has earned the gratitude of his fellow-men. This we believe is what Dr. Willett has done in this volume."—Dr. J. H. Garrison in The Christian-Evangelist.

"Interesting and illuminating, calculated to stimulate and satisfy the mind and to advance the devotional as well as the historical appreciation of the Bible."—Homiletic Review.

"One can recall a half-dozen volumes having to do with the origin and the formation of the Scriptures, all of them valuable, but not one so practical and usable as this book."—Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones.

"This readable work distinctly illuminates both background and foreground of the most wonderful of books."—Chicago Herald.

"The book evinces an evangelical spirit, intellectual honesty and ripe scholarship."—Augsburg Teacher.

"Scholarly but thoroughly simple."—Presbyterian Advance.

The Meaning of Baptism

By Charles Clayton Morrison

The Continent says of this work:

"It required courage to publish this book. It is by a minister of the Disciples' church, which has been peculiarly strenuous in behalf of the scriptural necessity for immersion, and he writes that 'the effect of our study is absolutely to break down the notion that any divine authority whatsoever stands behind the practice of immersion.' Instead, in the New Testament, baptism simply means the conferment and acceptance of the status of a Christian. He is strongly against the rebaptism of Christian believers who apply to Baptist or Disciple churches for membership having been accepted in other churches by any mode of baptism whatever. Equally he opposes infant baptism, because the subject of baptism must be voluntary. At the root of his argument lies a sound desire for Christian unity."

The Christian Advocate (New York) says:

"This is probably the most important book in English on the place of baptism in Christianity written since Mozley published his 'Baptismal Regeneration' in 1856."

The Congregationalist says of it:

"A daring and splendidly Christian piece of work, in which the author frankly asserts that Jesus 'had no intention of fixing a physical act upon his followers. He did not have in mind the form of baptism but the meaning of it.'"

Indifferentism and Its New Excuse

THOUSANDS of people who absent themselves from the churches in this reconstruction period must needs find an excuse adapted to the mood of the time. Each age has had its own popular excuse for remissness in religious duty. It was once popular to plead, "There are so many hypocrites in the church." The new explanation given by the religious delinquent is, "I had too much religion when I was a boy." Of all excuses this is the meanest, for it involves a challenge of one's parents on the fundamental level of their tutelage. None but an insensitive person would say this direct to his parents' face. The implications would be too painful. Yet many say it where parents have long since passed from the earthly scene. Darling children are often given their choice of going to Sunday school or for an automobile ride. When Johnny and Jane vote for a trip and a picnic, their elders solemnly recall, in justification, that in their own youth they had too much church! All of which indicates that the educational program of religion has not yet won the intelligence of the general community. Neither the family nor the state allows the child to decide whether he shall go to school and study arithmetic. The teacher may do her best to make the school room interesting and the parents may urge the advantage of an education, but the child goes off to school. We do not hear very many people saying that they had too much education when they were young, and give that as a reason for never looking at a book or a newspaper. They do not say that because of a surfeit of music in childhood they never go to a concert. The man who does not go to church nowadays is not suffering from a surfeit of religion. It may be the religious education of his youth was not wisely done, but the man who went to church when he was a boy is more likely to go now than the man who had no church-going habit when he was a boy. In every community there is great need of convincing the community that religion is not something children can get after awhile by some cheap and easy device like that of going forward to the altar. The best religion is to be gained only through toil and prayer and study.

Love Not Dependent On Political Orthodoxy

WHEN the call for relief for famine victims in Russia first was flashed across the wires, the reactionary press of the country delivered an ultimatum. No charity until Russia gave up her political heresies. Until such a time as the Lenin government was overthrown, children might starve and the cholera might stalk through the land. This would make a new amendment to the parable of the good Samaritan. While we may overlook many faults in the man who is wounded and bleeding, we must examine him as to his political orthodoxy before we stop the flow of blood. If he proves to be a socialist or communist, let him bleed to death. The Christian church can hardly take so crass a view. The children of Russia, and probably the nine-tenths of the population who do not read and write, could not tell the difference between socialist government and czarist government on a bet. So far as appearances go, there has not been much difference. The same old intolerance of free speech has gone on. The same invasion of legal rights has characterized Lenin as characterized Nicholas. The peasant with his wife and children has been the victim of circumstances. If he favored a change under Nicholas, it is not to be wondered at. If he fears another change of government, after one change of rulers has brought such a debacle, it need not be wondered at. Meanwhile the followers of the Nazarene whatever their political views, will not wait upon academic debates in the field of political economy before they do something. The famine and pestilence in Russia must be stayed at any cost. Pestilence is a thing that might reach even us if we did not establish the battle line against it thousands of miles away. But aside from all such self-regarding considerations are not these Russians our brothers? Whether they have been right or wrong in their opinions and policies time and God will judge. They are our brothers in the flesh and in the faith and perhaps in no nation on earth is there such loyalty of faith, though often unilluminated by educational advantages. The man who has two coats will part with one, and the man with two loaves will communicate with the man who has none, until those who need are cared for. This is Christianity.

Democracy Coming to the Church in Mission Lands

DEMOCRACY is one of the most popular words in the whole world today. Throughout Asia, once the home of absolutism, there are strong democratic groups who are insisting upon popular rule. British rule is being challenged in India in spite of the efficiency of British methods, and the progress made under the union jack. In China there are now two governments, and the new government under Dr. Sun Yat Sen has democracy for its watchword. Facts such as these have bearings upon the conduct of mission work. In the old days the churches in oriental countries were completely under the domination of the missionaries. This seemed like the only way to get on. Now the native Christians are serving notice on missionaries in many sections that the control of the churches must be in native hands just as soon as these churches can provide the funds with which to carry on their own work. These churches will also insist upon their own terms of fellowship. It is almost impossible for Baptist and Disciples missionaries to make the poor benighted Hindu want to excommunicate his Christian brother for a wrong opinion about baptism. There is a similar obtuseness among Episcopal churches in India where the natives seem utterly incompetent to grasp how tremendously important it is to have a ministry that traces itself back to the apostles through an unbroken contactual succession. The truth is that the narrowness of our western Christianity will be wiped out of India and China and Japan within ten years after a native church becomes autonomous. They may even be sending missionaries to America after awhile to recall us to the loyalties and the points of emphasis that characterized New Testament Christianity.

The Church in the Recreation Business

IN recent years large numbers of churches have gone into community recreation. The motive that led them to this task was at first the idea of "holding the young people." There was no idea at all that any form of play might be related to religion. In some churches there has been no right apprehension of the difference between amusement and recreation. All over the country one can find perfectly good gymnasiums in which there are now no activities. As one travels from church to church he finds here an unused bowling alley and there a set of perfectly good baseball uniforms that have been laid away to be consumed by moth and dirt. These tragedies arise from the lack of proper guidance in the significance of play. This is not surprising, for it is not so long since many church people frowned upon play as the work of the devil. In many cases the reaction from such an attitude leads all the way to the soul-destroying attitude that any kind of amusement is worth while, more worth while than any other life interest. The distinction between amusement and recreation is a very important one. In recreation we build over again. Every kind of play is to be tested by its reaction upon character, upon our daily toil and upon our spiritual attitudes. With such a principle in mind one does not need to tarry long in condemning a bull fight, or in commending chess or tennis. In one case we kill time by a process that brutalizes the soul. In the other we develop skill of mind or body, and give the mind that relaxation which is necessary to insure the quality of tomorrow's thought. The playground is the teacher of social justice. Fair play is the beginning of respect for all law. The churches that have gone in simply to kill time for a group of young people in order to "hold" them have been disappointed, while the church that has sought to re-create its young people, using the word in that wonderful double sense which is possible in true play, has gone on building character quite as truly in its gymnasium as in its Sunday school.

Interchurch Leaders Sustained by Their Critics

THE manufacturers of the country, though not without notable exceptions, have been in a state of indignation for many months with regard to the published report of the commission of the Interchurch World Movement on industrial conditions. There have been two or three feeble efforts to answer the indictment brought by the Interchurch report by ministers whose addresses have been given wide circulation by the manufacturing interests, but for the most part the factory leaders have been compelled to swallow their anger. Recently Mr. Clayton L. Patterson, secretary of the Bureau of Labor of the National Association of Sheet and Tinplate Manufacturers, issued a forty-thousand word criticism of the Interchurch report. It is interesting to note that after many denunciatory remarks the central point of the Interchurch report is admitted. He says: "I am not prepared to say at this time that the eight hour day is too short, nor the ten hour day too long, but I do say that the twelve hour day is too long and the seven-day week indefensible, and strange as it may seem to the gentlemen who have so severely condemned the steel industry for the practice, 95 per cent of the steel manufacturers of the country today are of the same opinion. The twelve hour day and the seven day week in the industry must and will be abolished because it is inconsistent with public opinion, is un-American under present-day standards, and detrimental to the best interests of the workman and his family." If Judge Gary can still defend the policy of his corporation after this report he has indeed a tougher skin than any of us have imagined. While his corporation has sponsored many philanthropies, most of these have been made necessary by a policy of long hours the effect of which is to break the men whom he later undertakes in some measure to repair. What the public demands is a labor policy that will enable a man to stay well through the normal period of a workingman's life instead of going on the human junk pile in the forties.

The American and Americanization

IT is the native American who is often the stumbling block in the way of Americanization of the foreigner. His attitude toward the newcomers is one of aloofness. He does not get acquainted with his neighbors of other races, but gives them the social snub. The immigrant comes to this country just a little less ignorant of America than many Americans are of Europe when they go there for the first time. They ask questions that are sometimes ludicrous. Their mistakes in language may provoke mirth, but not among those Americans whose German has been mocked in Berlin, or whose French has provoked smiles in Paris. The first thing that is necessary in the process of Americanization is to make the immigrant love America. He cannot do this unless Americans are themselves lovable. The very idea of Americanization may be formulated in such a way that it is not essentially different from the thing that was once called Germanization. With the gates at Ellis Island swinging wide open again, and large numbers of immigrants coming to us from the most underprivileged nations of the world, there is more than ever reason to be concerned about the treatment of the foreigners. They are coming from Italy and Syria in large numbers, and these immigrants will not be Americanized by any happy accident. Only a deliberate purpose and a thoroughly Christian attitude toward them will make them acceptable parts of the future structure of America.

State Money for Sectarian Purposes

HOW sectarian projects may be aided by political leaders without support of law is well illustrated in the case of Pennsylvania. Some thirty years ago a small appropriation of thirty thousand dollars went through the legislature in support of a sectarian institution. Since then the annual budget has grown until the grand total of over two million dollars was reached. Roman Catholic institutions were for the most part the recipients of the money. The work they are doing is in many cases laudable work. But along with the philanthropy sectarian propaganda is carried on which is virtually paid for by the state. Recently a taxpayer brought action in one of the lower courts to restrain the state treasurer from paying out the money to these institutions. The lower courts decided against the petition, but when the action was carried into the supreme court, an order was issued sustaining the complainant. This kind of thing has been going on in other states than Pennsylvania. Schools for the Indian paid for with taxpayers' money have been used for ends of religious propaganda. There has been complaint in Illinois with regard to some appropriations. The secu-larist who is opposed to all religions gets his best argument out of this practice. Holding that all religionists are bad, he makes such action appear as a looting of the public funds, which in some measure it is, even though the community receives some service in return. Protestants have seldom been charged with any illegal use of state funds. It will be quite to their interest to avoid even the appearance of evil in this regard.

Anglo-American Snags

ABUST of George Washington has been unveiled in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral; a statue of Lincoln stands near Westminster Abbey. Preachers exchange pulpits, orators talk eloquently of "hands across the sea," editors write of "cementing the great friendship"; but all the while the Ship of Goodwill, is running against snags. Mr. A. G. Gardiner—perhaps the ablest editorial essayist since Watterson retired—has just published a brilliant little book entitled "The Anglo-American Future," in which he generously lays all the blame for the present misunderstanding on Britain—but that is far from the fact. Owen Wister, in "An Ancient Grudge or a Straight Deal," lays the blame at the door of school boy prejudice in America; and so the honors are even. Mr. Gardiner says that we must get the grit out of the machine—naval grit, Japanese grit, Irish grit—and then the wheels will run smoothly. But will they? As a matter of fact, on both sides of the Atlantic there is just now an acerbity of feeling which differs widely from the protestations of union during the war, and which has little to do with presidents or politicians. What is it, therefore, apart from mere mischief-making, which has again aroused ill feeling between two nations of professedly the same ideals and tradition?

Manifestly there is something deeper which furnishes the mischief-maker with his opportunity and material; and since the armistice there has been, for the first time, an organized anti-American propaganda in England—not in Scotland or in Wales—matching, if not provoked by, the organized anti-British propaganda in America. This is a new factor in the situation, and unless we reckon with it we shall fail to face the reality. An Italian publicist said recently that in the English mind America has taken the place of Germany as the naval and commercial rival of Britain, and that conflict is inevitable. By the same token, since the war, and especially since the peace conference, the average American mind has a profound distrust of Britain, fearing that her cunning may tie up and shackle the simple American giant before he comes to a full realization of his powers. As matters stand, no compliments, no ringing of the Anglo-Saxon changes, no outside methods, can much affect what is fundamentally due to differences of temperament, joined with a lack of knowledge on both sides.

What, then, shall we do? Chesterton has told us that we can abolish the inevitable, and that is the task before us if the world is to be stabilized. Surely the friends of Anglo-Saxon unity make a supreme mistake in narrowing their appeal. It is not for the countries concerned that such unity is necessary, but for the benefit of the whole world. In both countries the wider conception would do much to dissolve ill feeling and misunderstanding, which are regretted by the better elements in both. Mr. Asquith said the other day at Manchester that the most fruitful and the one really permanent lesson of the war is that it has taught, or ought to teach, mankind "the interdependence, moral, social and economic, of all the communities which make up the civilized world." In America we are slow to learn this lesson, much less to assume the obligations which it imposes; and the air of blurred bitterness and cloudy cynicism in which we have lived for more than two years has not been favorable to such vision. Perhaps, with the coming of a better mood and a clearer sky, we can at least see the snags in the way of English-speaking friendship, and avoid if not remove them.

Plain Man Statesmanship

YOU, Mr. Plain Man, are the individual of whom, according to a writer in a recent number of the Hibbert Journal, it is required that you shall discharge certain official functions in the service of the speculative social philosopher. You can ask certain pertinent questions which for him to ask too boldly would be reckoned impertinent. None can doubt your orthodoxy. When you raise the question, you frankly wish to know. If he inquires too pointedly, he is indexed if not cashiered as a heretic and a radical.

It is eminently time you got busy upon your official duties. For we are in a muddle which must be utterly bewildering to your straightforward mind. Honestly, now, have you encountered during the past two and a half or three years an economist or financier or practical business man or captain of industry, for whose economic acumen you would give the snap of your finger, who has been able to show you head or tail of the tangle into which fate or our own perversity has brought us? It is futile to ask who is running our economic affairs. Manifestly nobody is. But who knows anything about them, can conjecture where we are coming out, or what ought to be done to bring us anywhere?

A while ago it was all for thrift. Every device was adopted to induce the American people to save. Our shameless thriftlessness was the concerted theme of essayist, poet, columner, paragrapher, editorial leader, and even the reporter's scoop. And millions of us actually began to take ourselves seriously as savers. We swelled the accounts of the savings banks to unprecedented totals. We bought stamps. We bought bonds, sold them, then bought them back at the lower figures which the market quotes.

Shortly the cry was Produce. Increased production was to save us and all the rest of the world. The world was famishing for food. Europe was going barefoot for the lack of shoes. Asia was shivering in the default of clothing. Africa—well, though it has got on thus far without shoes and precious little clothing, yet Africa was desperately in need of something which America could generously provide if all of us would only make it our conscientious concern to produce, produce, produce. And produce we did, farmers, laborers, manufacturers.

Latest has been the cry Buy! Everybody buy. Buy everything, anything. Make it a patriotic duty to brace the market. Empty the bursting warehouses. Revive the drooping spirits of the retailer. Save the manufacturer from abject despair. Stop this "buyers' strike." It is scandalous, un-American, cruel to the producer and is undermining the economic fabric on which the nation's and the world's civilization rests. Now, how can one live in this babel of precepts and retain his sanity? How can we save with all our might and buy with all our resources at the same time? If bursting warehouses are about to swamp our economic system how reasonably can production be hailed as the crowning virtue of our industrial order?

For more than a year we have just been "turning the corner," and the golden age of industrial prosperity has lain before us. But where is it? Has anybody's eye actually pierced the economic gloom which still so bewilders you, Mr. Plain Man, or is all this hallooing simply the boisterous way men supposed to be wise take to conceal their own bewilderment? Does anybody really have a glimmering of a notion when or how or by following what course we shall get out of the present muddle?

What are those sound and enduring principles to which we must hold against all the shocks of the recent world upheaval? The tariff? Mr. Fordney and his fellow-partisans of congress are very enthusiastic, or try to appear so. But can a high tariff be made to sound like the same heaven-sent gospel to a creditor nation that it was made to seem to a debtor nation? Now that we have everything to sell, and every healthy breath of our industrial life is dependent upon an active, wide-open market abroad, is it sound economic policy to antagonize every foreign market in the world by mountainous barriers to exchange? Now that we owe little or nothing, and everybody else owes us, how can we collect what is due if we play to a heretofore-unheard-of limit the old debtor's game?

We are a creditor nation. Our money is tied up in foreign securities. What if those securities turn out to be worthless? Is it physically, elementally, within the farthest flight of the imagination possible for the nations of Europe to pay off their war debts, piled as most of them are upon debts which previously were hurrying several of them toward abject bankruptcy? Have you found anyone with the least or the greatest skill in figures who is able to show how this can be accomplished?

Of course it is not being accomplished. Everybody knows that. The interest on these debts cannot now be paid. Can the interest ever be paid? The principal is too stunning even to think of. After Mr. Mellon has refunded the sums owed us by European nations, what then? After four years the next secretary of the treasury must doubtless recommend the refunding of the then unpaid interest on these new securities (?). And so on, until the crash comes. How far off is the crash? Can the mind of rational man conceive a way of avoiding the crash, if we continue to hold to the present economic order?

How the socialist would exult today, over the fulfillment of his horrendous prophecies, if he dared lift head or voice! But of course he dare not. The present generation will see red to the end of its days whenever the name of socialist is mentioned or any economic proposal couched in the terms he made familiar is broached. The socialist boasted of what he could do before the war, how certainly he could and would prevent what the world has suffered and is suffering. His rout and the crumbling up of his program is one of the monumental events of the war. He is thoroughly done for. What there is to salvage from the collapse of his program must be thoroughly repainted and furbished until it shall not be recognized as his or having to do with his ill-fated schemes. Russia is all left to him, and Russia he is usually hottest of all to repudiate as none of his.

So here we are. Are the employers going to save us with their feverish drive for the "open shop," which their most eminent leaders plainly assert will make an end of trade unions? Will the unionists any more certainly save us when they insist upon the hundred per cent union closed shop, Brindellism and all? Are the sporadic experiments in "industrial democracy" designed to save us with their cumbersome duplications of our lumbering federal system, "senate" and all?

Is the fetish of "private property" worth preserving which serves its most hallowed purpose in guaranteeing to us, our heirs and assigns forever, the title to the old decaying ancestral homestead which we would not live in for worlds, and which to continue to own nearly drives the whole family into bankruptcy, while under the sacred protection of our dear fetish the profiteer fastens his grip more firmly every season upon the throat of our whole society, and mountainous accumulations of the common stores once lodged in the control of one family or group become so inexorably and inalienably theirs that no degree of dolessness and profligacy on their part can loosen the grip?

Is a revival of the "fundamentals" of the old profit-seizing order the acme of our hopes? The world is bankrupt. What degree of financial skill can serve to liquidate the old order? The old financial system shows the world richer today, immensely richer, than before the war. But every child knows that the world is actually poorer, tragically poorer, when for years the most refined arts of destruction have held first place in the affairs of men. Who can trust figures which lie like these? How can any rational economic system be maintained under the jugglery of such a financial scheme?

Now that the socialist and his vagarious philosophy, his crass appeal to class intolerance, not to say blood-thirstiness, have been so thoroughly discounted, is it not time for you, Mr. Plain Man, to seek out and back up an intelligent economic science able to make an end of several of these fetishes of the old order which made it always so vulnerable to the attacks of the socialist? The economists of the old order are manifestly in their last ditch. Their wisest have committed themselves to prophecies which have not been fulfilled though the time has already elapsed. The future only grows blacker for their promises. The worst things the matter with our economic order they and their methods cannot possibly cure. They are juggling. They are sparring for time and breath. Not one of them who hangs to the good old ways, and worships the old "sacred" principles, has the ghost of a chance to make good his assurances. Surely you have hard sense enough to see that this old system which feeds an increasing army of legal tricksters, fastens the grip of the profiteer more and more firmly upon our whole life, and gathers fortunes for the few like the snowball started down hill after a March storm, and which leaves you every year more and more helpless before these inexorable forces—surely your hard sense will guide you to a statesmanship which will give short shrift to these old bugaboo sanctities and their self-serving high priests.

The Ice-Water Tank

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE were two young mothers from Italy, and they had each of them Several Children, whereof the oldest was a Little Girl. And she was about the age of the daughter of the daughter of Keturah. And they rode upon the train. And they had a Bottle, whose shape was at the bottom like unto a Diamond, such as they have in Italy. And it held it might be the fourth part of a Pint.

And as soon as they were seated in the train, the Little Girl filled the Bottle at the Ice-Water Tank. And she drank thereof, and she carried it to each of the Mothers, and to each of the Children. And they drank, every one of them, all that was in the Bottle. And by the time the last one had been refreshed, the first one was athirst. And the Little Girl began again, and went around the circle of the two families. And they drank of it as freely as it had been Red Wine.

Now the Little Girl wore a dress of Mrs. Harding Blue, and stockings that were green, and a red handkerchief upon her head. And her mother pinned up her dress to her waist, for she was wetting it at the Water Tank. And it was lucky that the aisle of the car was covered with Battleship Linoleum which was very thick; for the Little Girl trod a path back and forth and back and forth until the Water Tank must have been nearly empty.

And I said, Behold what a journey from New York into the Interior of this great and glorious nation meaneth to various Travelers upon the same train. There are mountains and rivers and bridges and tunnels, and these two families see no more of them than the women who are playing bridge in the Pullman. But for them a tour from the Atlantic Ocean to Pittsburg is one long and joyous procession to the Ice-Water Tank.

And who shall say that of all folk upon that train, they passed their time least profitably? For I lodged that night in an Inn, and the man who had been there before me left a larger assortment of Glassware than had any meaning in my life; and I would fain have joined him unto the two families of the children of Italy, and fed him Ice-Water till he had enough.

Analyzing the Race Problem

By H. O. Pritchard

THE recent shocking tragedy enacted at Tulsa, Oklahoma, has focused attention anew upon the perennial and perplexing problem of the American Negro. Perhaps it would be speaking more accurately to say that it has centered attention once more upon the problem of both the white and the black man, occasioned by both being citizens of the same mother country. It is not so much my purpose to express the burning shame which every true American, of whatever race, must feel because of this another outcropping of the substratum of our civilization, nor to suggest panaceas for preventing similar recurrences as it is to call attention to some factors which enter into the problem and which are seldom brought out into the open in any discussion of it. Most dissertations on the race question do but skim the surface. They deal with the superficials. The facts which I shall mention are unpleasant and stubborn, but they cannot be avoided. All of us are either consciously or subconsciously aware of them; and they must be faced squarely, sooner or later, by members of both races, if we are to find a way out of our difficulty.

The first of these factors I shall call the historical. By that is not meant so much the history of the Negro in America, which of course does enter in and goes far to make a background for the present acute phases; but rather the general historical factor. So far as I know history, I do not recall a single instance where two distinct races of any numerical strength have ever occupied the same territory, except upon one of two conditions. The weaker of the two has either been subjugated or exterminated. It is not necessary to recount the historical instances of this fact, since they are familiar to all who have even a passing knowledge of the history of mankind. It is more to the point to cite our own experience in America. The white man in America has come in contact with two other races. The one he subjugated; the other he practically exterminated.

NEGROES AND INDIANS

As I write this article I am riding on a train through Montana. Representatives of one of these races are acting as porters in the Pullman in which I ride and as waiters in the dining car in which I eat; and just this moment, as I look out of the car window, I see straggling along the roadside with ponies, tepees, blankets and papooses, a pitiable remnant of the other—a once proud and powerful race, which could not be subjugated, but whose pathetic fate has been the alternative. As I behold these two races—the one inside the car and the other outside—I see written in large letters not only the story of the white man's imperious dominion, but the long, long story of the conflict of races from the dim beginnings of human history until now.

But some one will arise and say, "You are not telling the truth. You are telling only half of it. It is true that we made a slave of the black man, but did we not afterward free him, and is he not now an American citizen?

It is true that we fought with the red man in the earlier years of our history, but are we not now protecting him, and is not our government spending huge sums annually for his benefit?" I reply, Yes, it is true that after four years of civil war, we did abolish slavery and give the right of franchise to the male members of the Negro race. But I deny that we have, as yet, freed him. We emancipated him, but we did not free him. We all know too well that he does not enjoy equal rights with the white man. And as for the Indian, it is true that we have isolated him on reservations and thus eliminated him as a problem. It is true that by a kind of political paternalism, we have done a sort of penance; but just as soon as we need the land on which he is now living we will take it and press him farther back into the broken and barren vastnesses of mountains and deserts.

RACIAL CHARACTERISTICS

A second factor I would name, the biological. By that I mean to call attention to racial distinctions and characteristics. It is not so much physical differences that are meant. There are such differences. Professor Bean has demonstrated that the liver and spleen of the Negro are on the average smaller than those of the white man. The brain of the Negro is also smaller. Then, there are outward differences such as pigmentation of skin, texture of hair, shape of head and face, contour of nose and mouth and other demarcations. While not overlooking these, which may or may not have significance, the more important fact and the one which bears directly on this problem is the difference in racial development. The Negro race is still a child race.

In making this point it is not necessary to argue that the Negro as such is inherently inferior to the white man. Furthermore we may admit that the present difference in this regard is due to social environment. The point is that there is a difference. Some months ago Mr. R. M. Trabue published an article on America Negro recruits in the war. He showed that the army tests of a considerable number of Louisiana and Mississippi Negroes and whites from the same region indicated a very material divergence in intellectual attainments. In fairness it should be said that the tests of northern recruits were far more favorable to the Negro, but even at best, the Negro suffers a disadvantage. Any one who has had to do with both Negro and white children in the school room, knows that there are racial mental differences and that, beyond a certain age, the white child as a rule is mentally superior.

In this connection it may be worth while to point out that nearly all, if indeed not all, of the Negroes, both in this country and in Europe, who have attained distinction, have had a strong admixture of white blood. Turner, Dumas, Pushkin, Douglas, Dunbar, DuBois, Bruce, Washington, Rosamond Johnson, Gilpin, Lewis and others worthy of mention, were or are mulattos. The pure black would seem to lack intellectual initiative and constructive ability in the present state of his racial development. I repeat, the Negro race is still a child race, and the leaders of both races must recognize this fact with its consequent implications, if we are going to make much progress in finding our way out.

EMANCIPATED BUT NOT FREED

A third factor is the sociological. This term is used in its broadest sense. I have already remarked that the Negro has been emancipated but not freed. Freedom is a large word. To have true freedom a man must have equal opportunity—economically, industrially, educationally, politically—with every other man, irrespective of race, color or previous condition of servitude. That the Negro does not enjoy such equality of opportunity is patent to all. I am not now contending that he should have it. I am simply stating that he does not have it. And the fact that he doesn't constitutes one of the prime factors of the problem.

That much used expression, "Let the Negro keep his place," spells volumes. What is his place? It means that he can be a Pullman porter but not a railroad conductor. It means that he can wait on us in the dining car, but—if he be a passenger on the train—not eat there. I recall a private conversation with Booker T. Washington, on one occasion, in which he told, without complaint on his part, of the handicaps under which he constantly labored in traveling from point to point, many a night sitting up all night in a dirty smoker, getting a bite to eat wherever he could, and spending the next day in the hardest kind of labor. That popular concept of the Negro's "place" means that he may enter some of the professions, but never will be recognized as a leader of any profession, no matter how brilliant his attainments or how great his contributions. It means that he may acquire property, but if he becomes too prosperous or presses too hard upon the economic structure, there will be a Tulsa race war in which all his property will be destroyed. It means—O well, we all know what it means. It means that the white man has not and in our day and generation, will not, grant to the Negro equality of opportunity. There is too much involved in such a transaction.

RACE PREJUDICE

A fourth and last factor I have pleased to term the psychological. It has to do with racial prejudices and antipathies. The human mind has a way of creating abstractions, which abstractions may have little bases in reality and no existence in the concrete, but which nevertheless become dogmatic beliefs. They are the "straw men," which we are so fond of either defending or ripping to pieces. At no one point does the human mind show its fondness for abstractions more clearly than in generalizing regarding the physical and mental make-up of a race. Perhaps I have been guilty of it in this paper. We create a mental classification which we label a race, and then insist upon throwing each member of that race into that general classification. That is to say, the human mind inclines to force the individual into the class to which he is conceived to belong and to ascribe to him all the traits of his class. This is the psychological basis of race prejudice. These abstractions are not always favorable to the racess and individuals so abstracted. In many instances, quite the reverse. This is true in the case of the Negro. The popular mind persists in generalizing the impressions made by the life of the weaker members of the Negro race into a norm by which it passes judgment upon all members of that race. The white man refuses to treat the individual Negro as an individual, but rather deals with him as a member of a class. The consciousness that the black man belongs to a class by himself is above all other factors the one which makes the problem so baffling. This consciousness is deepened and perpetuated by the marked contrast between the physical appearances of the white and black races. The popular skit, "All niggers look alike to me," has a real psychological background.

We all know how unreasoning and unyielding race prejudice is. We all know how few people there are who are able to rise above it. Even most Christians seem never to have yielded this portion of their paganism to the dominion of the universal Christ. This is all the more true when we come to dealing with mass consciousness and particularly mob psychology. The individual finds himself swallowed up and swept on by the swift flowing currents of racial hatreds and class animosities. Herein lie the deep-seated causes of war, whether it be between the Teuton and Anglo-Saxon in Flanders fields or between Ethiopian and Caucasian in Tulsa, Oklahoma. Until racial prejudices are conquered there will be no permanent peace from either world wars or race riots.

IS THERE ANY WAY OUT?

Having analyzed the problem, the question still remains: What is the solution? The pointing out of the factors is not equivalent to resolving them. Are the four factors which have been pointed out irreducible? Are they prime to each other? Is there no common denominator? Are these factors final and determinative? That all depends. It depends upon one's general viewpoint. If one believes that the law of the jungle, whether in modern business, in international relationships, or in racial impingements, still obtains and works with immutability, then there is no solution save the slow grinding processes of the ages, which may ultimately wipe out the problem altogether, by wiping out, exterminating or assimilating, one of the two races. But for men who believe that the law of the jungle can be modified and even abolished by the application of the principles and ideals of Jesus, another answer will be forthcoming.

After all, the question as to whether the Negro problem can be solved by any other than the law of tooth and fang, is only a part of the larger question: Are the principles of Jesus practicable in this modern world? The Wall Street Journal frankly says they are not. A great many labor leaders and commercial club leaders are just now saying they are not. The claim is now quite common that the spoils are to the strongest arm and the victory to those who are physically fittest to survive. Many an orthodox elder who would be shocked if his minister should announce that he believes in evolution, is, in his attitude toward other nations, in his views of the race question, in his business relationships, and in his general outlook upon life, frankly adopting the baldest materialistic philosophy, which outdoes the coldest evolutionist. When all is said and done, there is just one great theological question confronting us today, namely, Will the principles of Christ work? To believe that they will not is to be a pagan. To believe they will and to act as if they will, is to be a Christian.

EDUCATING A RACE

But what about the solution of the Negro problem? What about the historical factor? Can it be resolved? I believe it can be. It is true that no two races have lived together except upon one of the two conditions above mentioned; but it does not follow that they cannot. After all, history is only a record of man's social and psychological attitudes and if once you change these, then you change the course of history. We are learning in these days that "social inheritance" is the most determinative element of our heredity and if only that is changed the resultant will be changed. I should say that the historical factor has helped to create our problem, but it does not forbid its solution. Put into the current of history at any given point a different ethical and social passion and you remake the world. It is precisely such a change as is contemplated by the teachings of Jesus.

What of the biological factor? It must be granted that there is a racial difference. The Negro race is still a child race. What is the solution for this? Only one—education—if that will not solve it, there is no other solution. Education is used here in no narrow or provincial sense. It means all that is implied in lifting a race from childhood or adolescence up to unfolding maturity. It is a big task and a slow process, but there is no other way. It has a large place in God's economy. This education, too, must be Christian in its motives, its outlook, its application. Simply to crowd the mind of the Negro with academic facts will do little good and perhaps much harm. The whole man must be lifted up. And while we are doing our lifting, we shall have to apply some of our power to those sodden, ignorant and prejudiced white hordes which cause much of the present difficulties. Only regenerated hearts and minds in both races, created by the powerful leaven of Christian education, will ever change the currents of history and wipe out racial inequalities and biological differences.

ALL ONE IN CHRIST

And what shall we say of the sociological factor? Here is where we come close to our every-day attitudes and reactions. Can the white man be led to grant to the black man equal rights and opportunities? Yes, if both are truly Christianized; otherwise, No. When men really possess the mind of Christ, exact justice will be done and equality of opportunity will actually exist. The kingdom of God as Jesus conceived it, believed in it and died for it, had no place for the social inequalities which exist in our civilization, and certainly no place for the injustices which we practice toward our brethren of the black skin. The attitude of Jesus on this point is so clear that there can be no mistaking it. We must either accept it and practice it, or we must frankly say that it is impracticable and therefore we do not believe it. To say that the religion of Jesus cannot be applied with success to these sociological problems, is to admit its defeat, and the sooner we renounce it and cease to walk in a fool's paradise the better. I admit that its application is a colossal task and that it cannot be done without working radical changes in the present social, economical, political, educational and religious order. But if we are to be consistent we must either try it, or abandon it.

And now for the last of the factors—the psychological. This is the most stubborn of them all, but its resolution means, in large measure, the wiping out of the other three also. Race prejudice is the enemy of Christ. In him there is neither white nor black. But how apply his attitude to the question? Certainly that is not an easy question to answer. For one thing, ceasing to treat the individual as a member of a class and dealing with him as an individual will go a long way toward applying it. I cannot but believe that here lies the tap-root of the race problem—our persistent generalizing with regard to particular individuals. If we would only deal with a man on the basis of what he is, in himself, and not as a member of a class, the solution of the Negro problem and of all other race problems would be close at hand. I am not unmindful of much that this implies, but as a believer in the principles of Christ I must accept the implications of my allegiance to them.

WHAT THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN IS LIKE

I have just come from a gathering where, for a brief period at least, the principle of treating an individual as an individual was applied. It was a great Student Conference—the largest in the world. There were more than eight hundred men present, from some fifty-six colleges and universities, representing twenty-six nationalities. Men were there from Rhodesia, Australia, the South Seas, the Philippines, Japan, China, Korea, Russia, India, North Africa, Arabia, Continental Europe, South America, Mexico, Hawaii, Alaska, Canada. There were present representatives of each of the five great races of the human family—Mongolian, Malay, Ethiopian, Caucasian and the American Indian. There were also present, Protestants, Catholics, Confucianists, Buddhists and Mohammedans. For ten days these men ate at the same tables, slept in the same tents, sat in the same classes, talked, walked and prayed together. And in it all, each man stood on his own feet. No man was despised or rejected because of his color, or his race, or his religion.

It was glorious to hear those men from the various races testify that they had learned to free their minds and hearts of race prejudice and had come to see that men of other races were superior to themselves. It was a glimpse of what the kingdom of God is like. It was also a proof that such a kingdom is possible of larger realization here and now. It was a visible demonstration of the eternal truth, that we are all children of a common Father and brothers one of the other. I for one believe that that doctrine is not only true theoretically but practically, and with its realization in the workaday lives of white and black alike, the Negro problem will disappear.

The Disappearing Brotherhood

By Mark Wayne Williams

MODESTY is not a modern virtue. The first law of success is self-sufficiency. "I can do all things," whether by hook or crook. I am certain of my resources, I am sure of my goal. You may absolutely confide in my venture, my capacity, my experience. I have done such mighty works, therefore take stock in my company. I have succeeded in such political gerrymanders; therefore elect me to high office. You cannot fail, for I will not fail you. Rely on me, and you are bound to win. Of course you must not be too much the braggart and boaster. You must not be an ignoramus filled with noise and bluster. You must not offensively display your self-conceit. But you must have it the cardinal principle of your business career. This man believes fundamentally, tremendously, overwhelmingly in himself. Upon this rock he will build his cathedral church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Here is the high art of advertisement. This is the foundation of leadership; herein lies the secret of accomplishment. "A violet by a mossy stone, half hidden from the eye" is not even good poetry in these days. There must needs be brass bands and flaunting signs and proofs of popularity. You must look like a million dollars if you would get on. You must learn to sell yourself before you sell your proposition.

We cannot divorce an enlightened self-interest from our most ideal adventures. No man can consider an issue absolutely aloof from his personal equation. Indeed, we expect men to add to a program their own ambitions, and though they subordinate these to the larger task, they are doubtless at their best when they can identify their own happiness with the prosperity of their community. Personal ambition does not therefore derogate from patriotism or ideal leadership, when it is duly related and qualified. We cannot reprehend Lord Nelson for loving fame as well as country. The signers of the Declaration of Independence staked their "lives, their fortunes and their sacred honors" on the success of the Revolution. Which of you could carp and sneer because some of them, in gaining the tremendous stakes they played for their country, gained also large personal fortunes and honors? Let us not grudge them their well-gotten gains. Yet let us not forget those who "received not the promises" though they suffered for the faith. They were burned and beaten and crucified and torn by wild beasts, and died seeing no fruition to their struggle or their hope.

NOT A NATIONAL ATTRIBUTE

Modesty is not a natural attribute of prophets. Humility does not well describe Elijah nor Hosea nor Isaiah nor John the Baptist. For these men were voices, not echoes. Voices in the world are few; voices in the wilderness are rare indeed. A good voice requires leathern lungs and iron ribs and a heart of brass. A voice that shall be heard must gender tempests. A voice that can summon whole cities to repentance must be the eruption of a veritable volcano. Stern, wild and passionate, with an overwhelming sense of his mission; shaggy with camel's hair; unkempt and unperfumed; no reed shaken with the wind, no courtier in soft garments, but the voice of one crying in the wilderness, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord; make his paths straight." He lashes the Pharisees to fury with the whip of his scorn; he makes kings tremble under his denunciation; cities empty whole populations into the desert to hear him, and hearts surrender their cankered lusts at his stentorian command "Repent!" His great heart has rocked with the cyclonic storms of the Holy Wrath of God; his eyes have stared straight into the moral lightnings of Deity; he has held a nation trembling in his drastic grasp. Yet he says, "I must decrease, and he must increase."

It is easy for a pulseless, flaccid, flabby soul to be patient and resigned. It is hard for a tempest to be quiet and listen to the thrush's song. It is terrible for those who have fed on glory to come down to gruel. What, this my splendid strength, my soaring vision, my creative eloquence, my sublime spiritual powers, these to fail and be unfulfilled, and waste away and be imprisoned, and pass away with all my possibilities unrealized?

A FATAL FRAILTY

There is often a fatal frailty in mighty souls, by way of compensation, doubtless. The gigantic qualities breed their peculiar weaknesses. How pitiful is the spectacle of Moses, supreme prophet of Israel, he who brought out God's people from Egyptian bondage, and led them through the terrible wilderness and made them victor over their adversaries and brought the law down to them from the holy mountain and established their commonwealth for perpetuity. Alas, that fatal moment of irritability, that quite usual concomitant of genius. "Shall we bring water out of the rock for you?" Oh, undimmed eye, take thy last look from Pisgah over Canaan, for thou shalt not see it again. O unwearied foot, descend now from the mountain, for thou shalt never climb another. O strong thewed majesty, bow thyself to thy grave and Joshua shall take thy place. I behold Samson, the boyish wrestler with the Philistines. I see him break the lion's jaw. I see him carrying off the gates of Gaza. I see him slaying the enemy by thousands. Then I see him weak and bound and blinded and scorned, toiling in his dungeon at the ignoble mill, grinding corn to feed his enemies. Alas that lust should have destroyed him. And the Israelites still not free. So was it with David, the man after God's own heart—David the mightiest warrior of them all, David the sweetest singer of them all, David the kingliest of them all, David that served apprenticeship to hazard and persecution, who won by faith and merit the realm of all Israel. David may not build the house of the Lord in Jerusalem because he is a man of blood. Solomon shall dedicate the temple.

I do not observe this fatal flaw in John the Baptist, but I remark that same fatal event. He shall not see the fruit of his own labors. He may not round out his allotted purposes. He cannot accomplish his dream-kingdom of God. Another shall take his place, and he shall sleep in the dust. "I must decrease but he must increase." "The king is dead, long live the king." "God buries his workmen, but carries on his work." Here is the peak of manhood, to feel the shadow cover you and to watch the glory coming on another's brow. "In honor, preferring one another." Yet how bitterly often will good men fight for self-precedence, honestly believing that the work will fail unless they lead.

SELF-CONFIDENCE IMPERATIVE

The very requirements of leadership make self-confidence imperative; the very compulsion of event makes self-effacement necessary. How much of the disastrous failure of our American government these last years is due not to a failure of idealism, but to the clash of personalities, each honestly convinced that he is God's prophet called for the issue. The issues are then adapted or effaced so that personalities may have free course and be glorified. How precarious, too, is the situation of notable and worthy reformers, who have all their lives been used of God to further certain reforms, and who in the hour of success are threatened with their own undeserved extinction. Behold, how they are put to great straits to find other evils as vast to be fought, other victories as significant to be won, else their fame and their occupation are gone at one blow. How difficult must it be for great military leaders whose conscientious labors have brought peace to believe that they deserve to be laid on the shelf, and that civilians should take the leadership. How hard it is for good old deacons who have kept the church going these fifty years to imagine that any one can really take their place. How our problem of Christian union is complicated by personalities; how devout secretaries and devoted pastors unconsciously impede the coming of the tides of unity.

LEADERS AND FOLLOWERS

It is a fine art to know when to quit as well as when to hang on. We cannot Oslerize the kingdom of heaven. But we can learn from John the Baptist how to decrease, graciously, honorably, valiantly, ever upholding the kingdom and its leader, who shall increase even if at our expense.

There is a further difficulty about decreasing, and that is the change to new and unaccustomed methods. John came neither eating nor drinking; Jesus came eating and drinking. John came like a storm, Jesus came as a gentle breeze. John cried "Repent," Jesus said "Believe." John would take the kingdom by violence, Jesus would have it gently grow. John appealed, threatened with sanctions for obvious moralities; Jesus allured by miracle, parable and mystic saying. John spake as though in the direct line of prophets; Jesus spake as never yet man spake. It is hard for us to scrap our old machinery, our old methods, and our old organizations. How persistently institutions outlast their intention and utility. The mortar that held these bricks fast in the wall becomes the greatest obstruction when you wish to make structural alterations. And the better the mortar the worse the obstruction. Behold our long heritage of social, political and ecclesiastical organizations. Each has its sacred history, its sublime intention, its immaculate ritual, its eternal necessity.

It is unthinkable that any single one of these could disappear, or decrease, or do anything but grow and flourish forever. Yet if all the leaders should live and continue to lead, we would have very few followers left. And if all the societies which have been promulgated are bound to endure who can escape their nets? We call for volunteers. Among the fraternal orders, who is there that is willing to become a disappearing brotherhood? Let us simplify our fraternity. Out of many let us bring unity. Who will volunteer? Will the Masons, or the Odd Fellows, or the Elks, or the Knights of Columbus be first to say "I must decrease"? Absurd thought, for everyone knows that the Masons, the Odd Fellows, the Elks and the Knights of Columbus stand for such distinctive principles, such illuminative and constructive doctrines, that the suggestion becomes blasphemy. Or shall we invite the Democrats, the Socialists and the Republicans to abolish partisanship and create one great organization for public political service? How dare one so mock the principles of these worthy orders by suggesting amalgamation. Or shall we invite the Allopaths, the Homeopaths, the Chiropractitioners, the Osteopaths and the Christian Scientists to make common cause and unite forces? "Beginning with which?" they all indignantly ask. "I must increase. Let the others do the decreasing that has to be done." The same delightful anxiety to decrease is noted among capitalists and labor unions, among ladies' clubs and social groups. Here is the problem of nationalism in all its grossness. "If somebody must decrease I shall not." And among the hundreds of Christian sects, who is there that steps forward and says, "I must decrease"? Thank God, the spirit of John the Baptist is taking hold of the church today; and there are many voices, whose clarion sounded in the wilderness of human sin, who have seen the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, who have seen the spirit descending like a dove upon another, who have heard a voice acclaiming the Beloved Son, who have heard of the miracles of grace and healing which he wrought, and are ready to say, "I must decrease but he must increase."

JESUS AND JOHN

For this is not the fortitude of compulsion: this is the generosity of spiritual perception. Here is a willing surrender to the larger life and the greater truth. Jesus receives John's disciples. Yet, not only the disciples of John. Every lesser leader is the pedagogue that leads men to Christ. He wins men not for himself but for God. He does not keep them grudgingly, but gives them over gladly to the Master. So Augustine brings his disciples to the Christ; so Wesley makes his glad avowal. Calvin must decrease but Christ must increase; Luther must decrease, but Christ must increase; Peter must decrease, Christ must increase; Innocent must decrease, Christ must increase. Mohammed, Confucius, Buddha, Socrates, these must decrease and Christ must increase. Spurgeon, Parker, Beecher, Brooks, ye must decrease and Christ must increase. Beethoven, Handel, Bach, ye must decrease and Christ must increase. Raphael, Da Vinci and Angelo, ye must decrease, but Christ must increase. Milton, Shakespeare, Dante, ye must decrease but Christ must increase.

Let Christ increase. The Christ the greatest painter could not depict; the Christ the best musician could not sing; the Christ the finest poet could not describe; the Christ, the most eloquent lips could not utter; the Christ the profoundest philosopher could not fathom; the Christ the holiest saint could not imitate. "I must decrease, but he must increase."

VERSE

Our Statesmanship

THE game in every country nowadays
Is killing statesmen. This would seem to be The open season for the breed. All those Who basked in public approbation while
The world was being made so "safe" have gone
To limbo, save Lloyd George; prophetic sharks
Have had him sliding down the ways toward
The dark abyss more times than it would take
To make an end of any nine-lived cat
That ever yowled. He'll land with all the rest
Some early day. And why's this thus? Are these
All felons? Or do mudsills merely vent
Their spleen upon their betters? Do mad mobs
Who pose as democratic potentates
Assert their pulling might by hauling down
The foolish dupes who've trusted their caprice?
Is statesmanship but demagoguery,
And must the rogue who plays the game prepare
To pay the price with his time-serving life?
If that's the answer where do honest men
Get in? Where will the whole fiasco end?
Shan't common folks like you and me agree
The time has come to chuck the puppet show,
Devise some plan more worthy of grown men,
A scheme of things which shows a little sense?

JOSEPH ERNEST MCAFEE.

The Cafeteria

WE dine there. What more shall I say?
At morn, at noon and night, day after day.

We wait there in a slow-progressing line
To claim our portion, spoils of wheat and kine.
We share and share alike and yet have not
One common interest save the steaming pot.

What though we smile in surface pleasantry?
Strangers we are, each time new strangers see.

Sore with its beating 'gainst the bars of fate,
In dull despair, my heart sinks back to wait,
Hopeless, yet hoping for the not-to-be,
Clinging to dreams—all that are granted me.

I grasp my heavy, coarse, food-burdened tray
And seek some quiet corner well away
From shifting crowds and crashing crockery,
From laughter that is like a mockery,

But half successful, the lone meal begin;
There is no real escaping from the din.

Yet sometimes thoughts their refuge offer still
And soothe the chafe by some seductive skill:
The glaring incandescent lights grow dim,
The swarming faces from my vision swim.

Then where a family lamp sheds radiance warm
There comes to me one dear, long-absent form,
And takes his place across the snowy board
And offers "grace" forgotten by the horde;
Then can I relish all that God has sent
Of food for flesh and love for heart's content.

And thus, day after day, year after year,
Till close around us, one by one, appear
Sweet little faces, mischievous and bright
To be our strength and pride when falls earth's night.

What's that? I thought I heard the baby croon
And beat the high chair with his little spoon;
No, just some hasty patron's clinking plate;
The spell is passing; it is growing late.
Unheeded tears fall on the tasteless meat,
I have no appetite, but I must eat.

Come, woman, get your feelings in command,
These staring strangers will not understand.

There Is a Road

THERE is a road 'twixt heart and heart,
Your heart and mine;
Unseen, unsensed by human art,
It links the twain though miles apart.

There is a road that couriers wend
By my design,

With messages of love I send
Each day to you whom I call friend.

There is a road that angels tread
From realms divine,
They whisper words your soul has said,
I listen and am comforted.

There is a road that, straight and true
Leads to my shrine,
Where Love and I have rendezvous,
'Tis in that heart I know as you.

The "Inside" of the British Coal Strike

CHRISTIAN CENTURY readers who are deeply interested in industrial questions will be glad to have a "closer up" view of the late British coal strike than has been afforded them by the newspapers. This account is drawn from information given by men like Ramsay MacDonald, Arthur Greenwood and others who are numbered among the leaders of labor. They are in no wise responsible for the formulation given the subject here, but the writer is under debt to them for the facts here used. The gratifying thing one finds in them is their scholarly, dispassionate manner and their apparent willingness to be more than fair with the other side. The reader may ask why we do not give the employers' side. The answer is that the employers were not on the "inside" in the sense in which we are writing of it. We shall hope to give their viewpoint on industrial matters in other articles.

What the Miners Wanted

The miners insist that it was not a strike, but a lockout. They say that the operators refused to pay a wage that they could accept as a living wage, and the impasse was due to that fact rather than to any action on the part of the miners. They were fighting to retain the standards of living gained during the war. It was not a question of how much money they should receive, but of how much comfort their wage would afford. They were determined not to go back to the low standards of pre-war days. They were willing to accept a wage that would qualitatively guarantee those standards. They knew, however, that such a wage could not be fixed solely with reference to profits in coal and without reference to prices in food, clothing and shelter. Prices in coal had fallen much more rapidly than had those in food, clothing and shelter. The government had made vast profits out of export coal during the time it had managed the business, selling to France, Italy and Belgium at a big margin. It had repudiated its moral contract to continue its management until the coming autumn, and now the miners simply asked that it cover, out of its profits, the hiatus between the broken coal prices and the unbroken prices on food, clothing and shelter. The government had made big money, the operators had made enormous profits, and labor, for the first time in the history of the coal industry, had gained a decent standard of living. Now it seemed that the government, the owners and the operators were stepping out all to the good, and the miner was to be thrust back to the low level of a sweated wage earner.

The real issue, then, from the miner's side, was security. He was offered a sliding scale for three months and no security thereafter. The good mines could pay a living wage but the poor ones could not. Here was where real brotherhood showed itself among the miners of Britain. They demanded that excess profits in good mines should be pooled to cover depressed wages in poor mines, and the better paid, in genuine good fellowship, offered to share their good wage with their less fortunate brothers. The government had imposed an excess profits tax on business during the war, and out of it had remunerated business that did not pay. Now, said the miners, let the same equalizing principle apply to labor in its fight for a decent standard of living. They felt that the reconstruction period was no less important than the war period, that it was just as much a part of the complex of war, so far as national ideals and standards were concerned, and that it was just and right to ask from the coal trade a share of the vast profits on hand, as a security for homes. They held also that continued security for those who must produce the fundamental commodity upon which the industrial life, and therefore the whole life, of Britain depends, was a national as well as a class necessity.

Was Revolution Threatened?

In America we had much talk about fears of revolution. Knowing little of the real facts, the talk of "direct action" by the "triple alliance" and of nationalization caused our newspapers to see a great deal of red. Here in England, that phase of newspaper portrayal seems to have been short-lived and Mr. Lloyd George's violent attack upon labor reacted distinctly against him. Public opinion was very favorable to the miners and grew more so as time wore on, but it was impossible to win in a period of such vast unemployment. We must bear in mind that the right to join unions is no longer an issue over here, and that collective action is no longer feared, and we must also recall that Mr. Lloyd George's nimble opportunism has been repudiated by the Liberal as well as the Labor party, and that the average man of principle no longer takes him seriously on matters of principle. In the great division now taking place in England, with the new social order Lloyd George so eloquently advocated before the war on one side, and the old tory-capitalistic order on the other, his old allies no longer call him comrade. Add to all this the fact that the famous Justice Sankey report asked for nationalization, and the revolutionary elements disappear from the strike.

The nationalization advocated in Justice Sankey's report is taken very seriously by the miners and by a great many other people in England, but it was not, so these labor leaders tell us, a fighting point in this strike. England's industrial life depends upon coal, and mining means driving deep into the earth, out under the sea and into seams that we would not bother with in America. Today much of the coal land is held by landlords who never mine, but to whom a royalty is paid, and it is not difficult to see why there is a demand that government instead of landlords should own this land. The difference in seams makes large profits for some operators and very small profits for others, and the tendency is for the less profitable business to fix the wage and living standards. Thus there is a definite conviction with many besides wage earners that nationalization for so fundamental an industry is the only way out; but they assure us that that problem was academic and incidental so far as this strike was concerned. Incidentally they remind us that there was no violence and no "scabbing."

The Triple Alliance and Direct Action

The triple alliance was bound to fail, one labor leader told us, because it was a sort of fifth wheel in the labor movement and was organized for consultive functions rather than for action. There was not enough in common between miners and transportation workers to give any real hope that the latter would give up their jobs in a time of great unemployment, if indeed at any time, for a purely sympathetic strike. The organization of the alliance lent a tactical advantage in labor strategy as a formidable threat of possible direct action, but direct action is not the British way, and wise leaders know that if they use it when not in control of the government the other side may use it against them when they do come into control.

Revolution is not the British way. One of the foremost Labor party officials told us that he did not wish to win in the next election but wished only to gain a formidable power as the opposition, and to mature both men and policies for real control. He added that on a fifty years "long run" he would stake that method any time against the Russian or the German way. The coal strike was largely lost, but much was won, and the steady-going Briton is not discouraged over it. He knows it must come again, and that he has won much that is fundamental for the human factor when it does recur—if indeed it does not now win a peaceful settlement that will make another strike unnecessary. Evolution is better than revolution and peace far better than violence, and time itself settles many things, for the old order changeth even with the process of the suns.

British Table Talk

RARELY has any public man antagonized so many people, interests and journals as Mr. Lloyd George has done and yet retained position and office. In the political world the majority of those who were his followers are now his opponents. For years he has sought the support of the churches and cultivated the acquaintance of their leaders: now he has flung a bomb in their midst. Addressing, in Welsh, the General Assembly of the Calvinistic Methodists of Wales, he said capital and labor would be the subject of many future controversies, and gave four illustrations of what in his view the churches should and should not do. (1) Strikes and (2) the Irish question were not fit subjects for discussion by religious conferences. Bishops who commented on the coal strike were rebuked for "interfering." On the other hand, (3) it was the "imperative duty" of the churches to "interfere directly" in the temperance question. They should also (4) seek to promote peace and goodwill—but they should not discuss whether the League of Nations or the American proposition was more likely to succeed. Their function was to "create an atmosphere." Anglicans and nonconformists alike deny the validity of the prime minister's distinctions and repudiate his right to dictate. The National Free Church Council promptly passed a resolution asserting the bounden duty of the churches to test the principles that govern the policy and the methods of government administration by the spirit and teaching of the Christian religion, and once more condemned both Sinn Fein murders and official reprisals. Dr. Clifford says that if he accepted Mr. Lloyd George's doctrine he would have to repudiate his sixty years' work in London; while "the churches of the United States changed the legislation of those states with regard to slavery, and later by creating an atmosphere of sobriety brought about the legislation which secured prohibition."

Separation Impossible

The Bishop of Peterborough says it is utterly impossible to separate political, economic, and moral affairs, and points to Isaiah, Jeremiah, the Minor Prophets, F. D. Maurice, Bishop Westcott, and Scott Holland. The Bishop of Chelmsford says you cannot divorce religion and politics without doing injury to both. It is because the moral factor has been blurred, Miss Royden urges, that politics have become immoral, cynical, insincere. Dr. Garvie claims that, while the preacher must not force his opinions on unwilling hearers, he must be free to deliver his message even when it involves the examination of an economic or political question in the light of the Christian conscience illumined by the Spirit of God. Rev. T. Rhondda Williams would sooner give up his ministry than cease to preach on social and industrial matters. Canon Barnes, Dr. Selbie, Dr. Horton, Dr. Scott Lidgett and other leaders have spoken in similar vein. The Church Family Newspaper distinguishes between party wrangles and questions relating to the wellbeing of the community. The Christian World says Mr. Lloyd George's audacity takes one's breath away. The Church Times concludes: "The real truth of the controversy is that governments expect the support of official leaders of religion, and are willing to murmur pious platitudes in exchange. But the moment the church dares to rebuke wrong-doing in high places she is contemptuously told to mind her own business." In earlier days Lloyd George himself opposed the view that the church is concerned solely with spiritual things. Ten years ago, urging the duty of the churches to join in the campaign for social reform, he said, "Let the churches hunt out evil conditions, let them expose them, let them drag them into the light of day, and, when they come to be dealt with, hand them over to the secular arm." The tendency is for the churches to take a much more active part in public questions than heretofore. Pleading that the Wesleyan conference should give more attention to such matters, the Methodist Times, the most spirited of our religious weeklies, accuses Mr. Lloyd George of being "singularly and perhaps deliberately blind to the history of the last twenty-five years," and contends that the churches ought not to speak less but to speak more and speak together. In view of the success of the Temperance Council which represents all the churches, including the Roman, the Times asks: "Why should not a similar council be formed to voice the mind of the church on the great industrial and national and international issues of the day? If the Archbishop of Canterbury and Cardinal Bourne and General Booth and the president of any one of the great nonconforming churches were to meet in conference and to give their blessing to the formation of such an enterprise, an enormously powerful instrument of righteousness might be evolved." That is a form of union easier to bring about than organic oneness, and would have far-reaching results.

Christianity's Social Message

By a coincidence, on the day that the prime minister's speech was reported a circular representing the Anglican, Roman, and nonconformist churches and the Brotherhood Movement was issued, summoning a conference to arrange a demonstration "having the dual object of reminding Christian people that they hold the key alone able to release our imprisoned world, and at the same time of showing Christ as the one sufficient Leader of all who labor." The demonstration took place in Hyde Park on a mid-July Saturday afternoon and was remarkable for the widely representative character of the speakers and their frank and definite utterances. At each of the seven platforms one of the speakers was a Trade Union leader; Bishop Temple spoke from a platform which included a Congregationalist, a Presbyterian, a Roman Catholic priest, a Quaker, and a labor leader. The object of the movement was summed up by one speaker as being "to insist upon the drastic application of Christianity to our social life, and the consequent establishment of a radically new social order." The gist of the fifty speeches was expressed in the resolution, passed at all the platforms, which began with a declaration of "the collapse of our existing economic, industrial, and social order, and of so much blindness in statesmanship," and proceeded to assert that "the present system, being based largely on unrestricted competition for private and sectional advantage, must be brought to an end, since it fosters the sins of avarice and injustice, lays a yoke of thralldom on masses of men and women, and leads almost inevitably to war." Dr. Temple insisted that industry must be organized on the basis of co-operation for public service. He saw in the scandalous differences in opportunities for education the deepest of all causes of class divisions; the cost of remedying the inequality would be paid back in the abolition of prisons and asylums. Internationally, we must learn that the nations of the world are one family. Thus persistent attempts are being made to bring the influence of the churches to bear upon the industrial situation and the social order, and to draw together religion and labor. There remains the problem as to how this influence can be most effectively exercised and how the "new order" is to be brought about. Canterbury diocesan conference has passed a resolution in favor of the workers in industry having adequate control of the conditions under which they work and perfect freedom of organization. "What we need is a Christianized social order," says Bishop Temple; "but we can only have or maintain or give energy to a Christianized industrial order if we have Christians to inaugurate and to work it." "There," exclaims the Church Family Newspaper, "is the church's opportunity!"

The New Evangelism

No time has been lost in starting the personal evangelism campaign proposed by Dr. Clifford. In accordance with the resolution passed by the National Free Church Council last March, "that in the present condition of our churches there is urgent need for the quickening of the Christian conscience towards personal evangelism, i. e. the duty of making disciples," a committee has been set up and initial plans devised. The first step is being taken within the churches. The committee, of which Dr. Clifford is chairman, proposes "a new campaign for disciple-making for our Lord by means of the personal effort of the members of our congregations. It is the one-by-one method which we urge as the most productive." Evangelistic missions in individual congregations are not advocated in the first instance: "We desire that each Christian should be prepared to become a gospeller, a seeker after others," by "testimony and appeal by word of mouth and through personal influence and in the ordinary channels of life." Theoretically, this is of course what every church member is supposed to be doing, but no Christian duty today is more rarely accepted, and it is recognized that some Christians are not only disinclined to it but unfitted for it. The need, then, arising out of our Lord's command and the religious situation of the country, is to instruct and quicken the conscience of the members of the Free churches; to convince them that, being disciples, it is their most urgent duty to make other disciples; and to try to inspire and equip them for the discharge of that duty, as a primary Christian obligation. "We invite failure unless we can secure a fixed determination in many of our members to undergo a course of preparation definitely aimed to make them efficient in their work. The effort to prepare will help to make the atmosphere of warmth and expectancy without which the work of disciple-making is exhausting and often fruitless." Any attempt to frame the precise form of the message is deprecated, church members being urged to speak out of their personal experience of the saving of Christ. But preparation is needed to trace to its roots the prevalent false thinking on life and religion, God and his gospel, the church and its work; to understand better the modern intellectual attitude; and to study the best methods of disciple-making, specially in the Gospels and Acts, but also in the records of Christian activity. Methods advocated are (a) locally, by addresses, fellowship gatherings, and study circles; (b) centrally, by special literature; (c) generally, by visits from headquarters. The master-thought of the campaign is Discipleship of Jesus, not membership of a church or assent to theological propositions. That a new kind of evangelism is needed is undoubted. Today, as Dr. Horton says, men are not consciously atheistic, they simply live without Him, so far as their consciousness goes.

Personal

The Bishop of Southwark in September, accompanied by his chaplain, with his episcopal staff, sets out on a ten days' pilgrimage of 90 miles through his diocese, visiting schools and hospitals and preaching in the open air.—Rev. G. Studdert Kennedy ("Woodbine Willie") has joined Rev. H. H. L. Sheppard's clerical staff at St. Martin-in-the-Fields.—Dr. Shakespeare consults a specialist in September, and if his report is favorable he will postpone his resignation of the secretaryship of the Baptist Union.—In the prosperity of Westbourne Park Church Dr. Clifford finds cheer and ever-fresh hope. THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Discovery of Timothy *

PAUL'S affinity for young men is one of the finest proofs of his genuine worth. We all know that if a preacher can make good before a college audience he must be the real thing. American youth has a way of going directly to the true values. Sometime ago a man whom I know made an awful fizzle before a college crowd. That crowd spotted him and took him at his true value. One time, in Europe, I met two young men who discussed with me the personality of a man we knew. They had his number, afterward I found that they were correct. I like Paul because he won Timothy. Everything we know about that youth indicates that he was strictly high grade. His mother and grandmother were God-fearing religionists, his father was probably a cultured Greek. The youth himself was clean-cut and powerful. When the great apostle came to town he was drawn to him, confessed his faith in Jesus and volunteered for the ministry. Under the loving and wise tutelage of Paul he became a noble preacher and a bishop of souls. It was a big day's work when he found Timothy. Every church ought to have a service flag on which are the stars of those who in that congregation volunteered as preachers or missionaries. Yesterday I heard of two young women who are considering going as missionaries. This morning I talked with a father whose son is considering the ministry. He belongs to another church, but the boy and I have been friends and the father wished to tell me about this important decision. "He's all I've got," said the father, "and if he'll go to college and study to be a preacher or a missionary I'm willing to spend every dollar I'm worth to educate him." This boy has not missed Sunday school in sixteen years. Recently he refused to take a Sunday trip because it would keep him from his Sunday school. Scotch blood flows in his veins and some day the world will hear from that lad.

Something is wrong with a church that does not attract young men and young women. If a church is lacking in young people it is quite likely that the church is a doctrinal church—one of those dry-as-dust affairs where only so called orthodoxy is preached. "Look out for a man who is too orthodox," said a college professor to me, "he might steal horses." When I find a man who is too fearfully pious and who wants to talk all the time about the peculiarities of his church I give that gentleman a cold reception. He is about the least attractive individual in the world to me. Young people just naturally avoid churches where peculiarities of doctrine are the main issues. As well live on a diet of beans! On the other hand, that church makes a big mistake which tries only to entertain young folks. They despise that type of patronage. T. R. Glover says that wherever the church has made much of Jesus, Jesus has made much of that church. It is the heroic note that attracts and holds young folks. They want life; full-rounded, modern life.

The world today is in a critical position. Nothing can save the world but the gospel. In New York our president, choking with tears, cried out over those 5000 bodies of returned soldiers of our republic, "It must not be again." He spoke for all our hearts. Yet, it will happen again unless there comes upon the churches a new urge and passion in preaching and teaching the gospel. One prayer should be made every Sunday in every church among us: "Thrust forth reapers into the harvest." Every pastor should turn Paul and lay his hands upon the potential preachers and missionaries in his church. The very choicest should be selected. Missionaries should be poured into Japan and Mexico. This is the highest statesmanship. There is not an hour to lose. The future belongs to the jingoes or to the gospellers.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Negro "Problem" and the Golden Rule

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have read with profound interest and appreciation your recent editorials on "Letting the Negro on the Inside" and "The Negro as the Acid Test." The frankness with which you discuss your subjects, when added to a similar outpouring of frank discussions that I have read in The Nation, The New Republic, The Central Christian Advocate, et al., reveals an underlying motive of sincere helpfulness which causes me to look upon the Tulsa massacre, with all its savage and fiendish horrors, as the greatest incentive to mental, moral and spiritual awakening that has touched the lethargic white American conscience in a generation.

Ignore it if we will, deny it if we desire, the fact remains that the questions that have to do with our inter-racial relations are the most serious and vital that concern the future peace and happiness of the citizens of this republic, and should be considered in the most careful, just and scientific manner of which we are capable. Believing The Christian Century to be making a sincere effort to formulate plans and mould sentiment favorable to the proper and permanent settlement of these questions, I am wondering if it would permit a member of the Negro race to join it at the "conference table" and make a few suggestions concerning the plans to be put into operation.

White people have for a generation looked upon these growing inter-racial questions as a difficult, if not an insolvable "problem," and this mental attitude has prevented, or at least rendered useless, any and every effort made toward its solution. Now to the scholars and real thinkers of my race, there is nothing either difficult or insolvable about these inter-racial relations. To us there is no problem, except the problem of finding a way to enjoy "the blessings of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," while our neighbors are hurling humiliating protests and the deadliest missiles of injustice upon us.

But, to our white friends and enemies, there is a problem of Herculean proportions. It grows with the years and will continue to grow until they decide to put aside hypocrisy and selfishness and apply the Golden Rule to the problem. In seeking to solve any problem when there is no fixed rule in evidence, the first essential is to establish a working hypothesis and proceed with a logical and consistent course of reasoning and actions. If the results accomplished are in harmony with the ideals desired, the problem will be solved and we then know that our hypothesis is true; but if the very opposite of all that we sought or desired results, and the problem continues to grow worse, we should know that our hypothesis is false and immediately seek for another.

No stronger evidence of the falsity of the hypothesis upon which the greater number of white people base their hopes and actions, in seeking to solve the "race problem," can be introduced than a survey of the present terrible conditions that exist in all parts of the country. And what is that hypothesis? Emerson, speaking of Plato, said: "Plato is philosophy, and philosophy Plato." In like manner there is a world-wide sentiment among white people that "Civilization is white, and white is civilization." The Emersonian hypothesis has never been disproved by the most rigid analysis of philosophical requirements; but the world war, East St. Louis, Tulsa, the peonage and pogroms of Georgia and the entire south, and the thirty years of mob violence that have been permitted to go unchecked and unpunished by the American people, prove that the veneer of civilization is no thicker on white people than on those whom they seek to civilize.

In the face of such sickening evidence, how can any Christian, worthy of the name, claim more than that white Americans, like people of other races and nations, are in a state of becoming civilized? And how can any plan or movement founded on such a false hypothesis, be expected to solve the race problem? The plan suggested by The Christian Century of opening the homes of the best white people at certain times, so that the best class of colored people might enter and learn something of their interior, is, I confess, a new idea. I can see in it much that would be of cultural value, if it could be carried out on the same high and pure motivated plane as marked the mind that originated it; but I also see so much of an opposite nature that I do not hesitate to say that it contains the seed of its own dissolution.

It rests wholly on the hypothesis that "Civilization is white and white civilization." In its zeal to cure existing evils, it overlooks the fact that such a display of artificial formality, endured only for a brief period at certain stipulated times, and with the distinct understanding that it was a gracious concession made by a superior to an inferior, would be lacking in the most fundamental of Christian virtues—love and sincerity—while it would emphasize in the most malignant and, to us, repugnant manner the vices of selfishness and hypocrisy.

The most necessary and essential step for white people to take at this time is to get into closer touch with the home life of colored people and to familiarize themselves with their history and achievements. Far too many white people of the highest type continue to use the eyes and minds of people that lived during the era of slavery in looking at the Negro of the present day and judging of his worth, hence place a very low estimate upon his accomplishments. How many white people read Negro papers, magazines and books? How many ever visit the better class Negro homes, schools and churches? The number is so small that the Uncle Tom and Aunt Dinah type of plantation Negro continues to be the mental concept of the majority of white people in all that pertains to Negro manhood and womanhood.

To suppose that Negro men and women who perform domestic service for white people are, because of that service, incapacitated for leadership or rendered unfit to associate among the best classes of the race, is a point of view that could be held only by those who are in need of reliable information concerning Negro life. There is no such caste or class distinction among us. Napoleon never had a more alert and loyal body of scouts and sentinels—no people ever had a more efficient and reliable bureau of information than the Negro race has in that army of men and women who perform the duties of house servants in the homes of white people. Every one of them is a potential Joseph in the house of Potiphar and may at any time develop such elements of leadership as to win the highest place and sincerest tokens of love within the gift of the people.

It is true that Negroes are great imitators. They have imitated all that is best among the whites, and much that is bad; but have not yet fallen to the level of lynchers, traitors, bank robbers and assassins of officials. What they need now is for the white people to show, by their conduct and character, that they are, at least, equal to their imitators in obedience to law, in respecting the rights of others and in recognizing mental, moral and industrial efficiency wherever found, without regard to color or previous condition. That mental attitude which says, "Inferior, behold thy superior," is not the one best fitted to show those virtues, for it is founded on the old, old story of the "mote and the beam." When the "beam" is removed by introspection, the race problem will be found to be one-third optical illusion and two-thirds mental delusion.

"Interpreting" Jesus

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Brother Yarrow comes back at me in the style of the literalist and writes me down as some form of pagan. I would let it pass were it not that we may convert the literalist into a real expounder and propagator of the true spirit. I will be brief. One or two questions may suffice if backed by the clear statements of Jesus. This is not an attempt to formulate a system, but if we have a system of thought called Christian, can we get it out of statements, clear cut and torn from the context as Jesus gave them to us? On which set of statements must we pin our Christianity?

Statement one: "I came," said Jesus, "not to send peace on earth, but a sword." (Matt. 10:34.) Not to establish harmony, but to set a man at variance with his family."

Statement two: "If any man cometh unto me and hateth not his own father, and mother, and wife and children, and brethren, he cannot be my disciple." (Luke 14:26.) Jesus said these as certainly as he said—"resist not him that is evil." Is this discipleship on hate to be taken literally? Is this a part of brother Yarrow's faith or not, and why?

Statement three: "And he that hath none let him sell his cloak and buy a sword." (Luke 22:36.) What to do?

Statement four: "Therefore I say unto you—every sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men; but the blasphemy against the Spirit shall not be forgiven." (Matt. 12:31.) Mark 3:28-29 is even more emphatic in its paradox. If all sins and blasphemies are forgiven, how can there be any unforgiven?

Does it require any reason to say that Jesus must not contradict himself? And yet repeatedly he does, if we are literalists. And brother Yarrow must not "interpret" these sayings or say that Jesus is unreliable. We could accept both sets of sayings at their face value.

Hate our mother to love Jesus!! Jesus says so and it is not in a parable.

And was Jonathan Edwards as Christian when preaching, "Sinners in The Hands of an Angry God," as when preaching its love of God? Is a boy of fourteen as thoroughly Christian as he may be at 40? We know there is growth in Christianity. Why throw dust in the air?

The minority is generally right if progressive. But I fear that brother Yarrow will have to present better credentials to show his progressiveness. His literalism has gone to seed.

A Growing Appetite

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: For some weeks now, I have had it strongly on my heart to write you a word of warmest appreciation of your splendid paper. I first took it for a short period, now I find I cannot do without it. For years I was a regular subscriber to The Christian Commonwealth, London, England. When that went out of business during the war, I felt a distinct need for a paper of that kind. The Christian Century meets that need amply. I am impressed not only by the attractive style, the print, the arrangement, and general attractiveness of the matter; but by the admirable proportion maintained in the subject matter. You keep the constructive along with the critical with regard to the Bible; the mystical along with the scientific and rational; the national with the international; and, best of all you fearlessly apply the gospel of Jesus to social conditions. It is one of the few papers which comes into my hands which I feel must be closely scanned, if not read from cover to cover. I wish you the ever increasing success which your courageous and much needed paper deserves.

INSTINCTS IN INDUSTRY, by Ordway Tead. Mr. Tead is both an economist and psychologist and makes an analysis here of the relation of fundamental human instincts to industrial organization and management. It is a scientific plea for the recognition of those elemental and oftentimes blind motives in human beings that demand recognition whether rational or not. The works manager of tomorrow will have to be just as skilled in a knowledge of human beings and their instinctive traits as engineers are today of the quality of the materials they work with. Salesmen are now taught how to manipulate the customer; why not teach the managers of men a like art? (Houghton, Mifflin).

THE HIGHER LEARNING IN AMERICA, by Thorstein Veblen. Dr. Veblen's admirers assert that he is the greatest mind in the academic world today. His knowledge is encyclopedic and his analytical powers exceptionally keen. He writes with subtle irony always, using an involved sentence that is difficult until one is familiar with his manner. In this book he analyzes the situation in regard to higher learning under the vogue of great gifts from millionaires and their administration by men committed to corporation methods. It is tremendously significant to know just what the trend is in the world of instruction administered under a financial rather than an academic system. What is happening to academic freedom, to the university democracy, to tenure of teaching position and to that guarantee of unlimited liberty to discover and proclaim truth or any phase of it that may appeal to a scholarly mind? Should the university go on in its evolution toward a corporation system of control or adopt a campus democracy that would make it largely autonomous? (Heubsch.)

RURAL ORGANIZATION. Proceedings of the Third National Country Life conference at Springfield, Mass. Contains addresses by rural life and rural experts, such as Samuel Higginbottom, R. R. Moton, Henry E. Jackson, H. Paul Douglas, Edward de S. Brunner and others. (University of Chicago Press. $2.50.)

THE WRECK. By Rabindranath Tagore. Charming as Tagore's writing usually is, he can hardly be called a success as a novelist. Much more pleasing and instructive are his poetical and semi-philosophical works. The present story presents a picture of certain phases of domestic life in India. The man who ought to be the hero is, however, so lacking in the essentials of self-determination as to be constantly perplexing and irritating to the reader. All of the problems presented in the story regarding his relation to the two women he contemplated for wives are the outcome of his own indecision and lack of grasp upon reality. If a story constructed on so perplexing a foundation can be regarded as stimulating, perhaps this one may take its place with the less significant novels of the present time. As a picture of Indian life and particularly of the place which women occupy in the social realm, it is interesting. (Macmillan, $2.10.)

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Work Still to Be Done in China

In June a cable came from China saying that the immediate needs of the famine sufferers had been met. It was fully known by the American Committee for China Famine Fund that there are always post-famine problems, such as the care of orphan children. However, the committee did not care to undertake this responsibility, believing that it could best be discharged by the missionary forces. It is thought that many churches have in hand famine funds which they do not know how to administer. It is now suggested, with the full approval of the chairman of the China Famine Fund, Thomas L. Lamont, that famine funds in the hands of church treasurers should be given to the denominational missionary societies with instructions to devote the funds to the care of orphans and other famine victims. In this way the wishes of the donors to the famine funds may be best carried out at this time.

Fellowship of Reconciliation Will Hold Meeting

The eighth general meeting of the Fellowship of Reconciliation will be held in Belmar, N. J., Sept. 8-11. The conference will not be confined to a set program but will move in considerable measure according to the wishes of those participating in the discussions. Instead of a program of brilliant lectures, the program committee has prepared a list of searching questions for the members of the conference to ponder over and talk about. Some of the questions are as follows: "Within what limits is the use of force consistent with the program of love? Can the individual dissociate himself entirely from the evil which inheres in our present international, industrial and social relations? Should he take part in a government founded on force? Should he support such a government by taxes or service? Should he hold stock in a corporation not functioning according to Jesus' principles? Should he work with churches or other organizations that are apparently committed to the present social order? Is a general strike to prevent war a Christian use of force?"

Unemployment Secures Attention of Church Leaders

As the number of unemployed men over the land mounts into the millions, and the nation faces one of the worst winters of its history, churchmen are beginning to realize that the subject is one which has religious implications. Ministers are making unusual though often vain efforts to connect up the people of their parishes with positions. Meanwhile the fallacies of an industrial order that can permit so much economic waste and injustice is being challenged. Rev. Charles N. Lathrop spoke recently in Trinity Episcopal church of New York before one of the most aristocratic congregations in this country. His words on that occasion are noteworthy. He said: "Today there are from three to five million people out of employment.

This means that there are from ten to twenty-five million who are feeling the difficulties that come from the inability of the head of the household to earn anything. We need make no pathetic picture. The condition itself denies one of the principles of obligation in a Christian society." As Dean Lathrop further discussed this problem he said: "I think that we are obliged to admit that our society fails of being Christian."

Church Ordains Woman in Spite of Protest

Jackson Boulevard Church of Disciples of Chicago has been very tender in its regard for Mrs. Austin Hunter, widow of its minister who died in June. Desiring to honor her and to recognize her talents, as well as to provide her a place on the staff of church workers, the church board voted recently to ordain Mrs. Hunter. One of the very conservative members of the church called the elders together and read to them the various scripture passages on the subject of woman's place in the church in order to prove that the contemplated action of the church was unscriptural. However, the complainant proved too much. His scriptures were equally useful in keeping women from speaking in prayer-meeting, teaching a Sunday school class or even singing in the choir. On a recent evening, after due deliberation, the church proceeded to the ordination of Mrs. Hunter, with the overwhelming approval of the people of the parish.

Methodist Colleges Raise Money

The Methodists seem to have the habit. After the big centenary fund was raised, some of the pessimists asserted that the big effort would kill Methodist generosity. During the past year a total of nine million dollars has been raised by Methodist educational institutions. The educational leaders assert that during the next ten years it will be necessary to raise $125,000,000 to meet the growing needs of the Methodist colleges and universities, which are now over-run with students.

Prominent Bible Student Dies

Dr. Cyrus Ingerson Scofield is widely known as a popular Bible expositor. He published the Scofield Reference Bible which has had wide circulation. Previous to this achievement, he had the distinction of being pastor of the Moody church at Northfield, Mass. He died at his home on Long Island recently at the age of 78.

Dr. Poling Will Recover

Multitudes of young people over the world have waited anxiously for bulletins with regard to the condition of the associate president of the Christian Endeavor Union, Dr. Daniel Poling. Dr. Poling was hurt in an automobile accident July 4. A lumbar vertebra was fractured which made necessary a surgical operation. He has passed through the initial dangers of this experience, and the surgeons now give assurance that by the autumn time he will be up again leading with his enthusiastic personality the Christian Endeavor forces of the world. He has been treated in a hospital at Northampton, Mass.

Turkish Persecutions of the Chaldeans

The Turk is running true to form these days by inaugurating persecution against the Chaldeans which are said to be more terrible than the persecution of the Armenians. Rev. Joseph Naayem is in this country soliciting funds for his persecuted brethren. He is a priest in the oldest patriarchate in the world, that of Babylon. He has himself been in prison, guarded by Turkish soldiers who prodded him with bayonets whenever he went to sleep. They also plucked out the hairs of his beard.

Religious Day Schools Proceed

The revised plans for the religious day schools in Evanston are in full swing. This year the instruction will be given in adjacent churches instead of in the school buildings. Provision is made also for giving the instruction within the regular school hours so that the pupil taking religious instruction will not be penalized by having a longer school day than other children. The teaching will be done by a young woman who will teach in various parts of south town different hours of the day. Evanston has two school districts, and it is in the south town district that the work is now in process of being set up. It is hoped that later in the year the modified plan may be put into operation in the other school district. Rev. F. A. McKibben is in charge of the set-up and will act during the coming years as Director of Religious Education.

Disciples Have Missionary Success

Morrison spent a lifetime in China with but a single convert, but such work is not so hard any more. The officials of the United Christian Missionary Society report that the past year the baptisms upon the foreign field totaled 3,200, which is the largest record ever made by the foreign force of the Disciples denomination. It is an interesting fact that the preachers on the foreign field now report a larger per capita of baptisms than do the preachers of the home field.

Baptist Women Select New Leader

The Woman's Baptist Home Mission Society has recently elected Mrs. George W. Coleman as president. She has been an active worker in the organization for many years and is known from coast to coast in Baptist circles. She has served in recent years as vice president, and comes into full leadership after being tried in various subordinate positions. She has traveled all over the country, and is well grounded in the fundamentals of her task. Mrs. Coleman is a very busy woman, as may be seen by the fact that she is president of Woman's Baptist Social Union of Boston, president of the Woman's City Club of Boston and president of the New England District of the Woman's Baptist Home Missionary Society. With her husband she is deeply interested in the Forum at Ford Hall.

Disciples Open Work Among Indians

Disciples of Christ have recently begun a large work among the Indians of the Yakima Reservation. Eighty acres of land were purchased and upon this land a building costing thirty thousand dollars has been erected. Christian industrial work will be the feature in this mission. A home for girls is also provided and a house mother. The Indians themselves have made liberal contributions to the building fund, and on the completion of the building they invited their white friends in for a big barbecue. At this feast 700 Indians and 600 white people ate barbecued beef together. Recently a family of six were baptized into the fellowship of the Christian church. A pagan organization of the Indians still persists, and into the community comes occasionally a Roman Catholic priest and a Methodist preacher.

Missionary Stranded on the Other Side of the World

The world war has wrecked many plans, and few of these wrecks are more tragic than the collapse of the hopes of John Sturgis. He came to America a number of years ago, and studied dentistry. While here he became a Disciple and also a naturalized citizen. After announcing his aim to be a self-supporting missionary in Persia, he has for many years practiced his profession and exercised an influence in behalf of Christianity. The war gave enemies a chance to ruin him and he was driven into the mountains to seek protection. Recently he was given passage to Bombay by the British government, where he is now stranded. Though he was never on the pay roll of the Disciples Missionary Society, the latter organization is receiving special contributions to bring him and his family back to America.

Methodist Achievement Stirs Up Other Denominations

The erection of the great building for Wesley Foundation Social Center has been an inspiration to other denominations to do bigger things at the University of Illinois. The Disciples have a considerable fund for work at this university, and to this was added recently one gift of a hundred thousand dollars. The Disciples have a two million dollar campaign on in Illinois, forty per cent of which goes to work at the state university. The Unitarian denomination through the Laymen's League has purchased a lot adjacent to the church on which a parish house will be erected for the use of the students. The Presbyterians hope to add to their staff of university workers soon a specialist in religious education. The State Society of Catholic Laymen finance a work at the University of Illinois and provide the salary of a priest.

Well-Known Preachers at the University of Chicago

The Sunday pulpit continues to be one of the great features of interest for the thousands who are in attendance at the summer quarter of the University of Chicago. The university preacher for the first Sunday in August was President Ozora S. Davis of the Chicago Theological Seminary. The following Sunday Rev. J. Bradford Pengelly of St. Paul's church, Flint, Mich., is the preacher. Dr. Carter Helm Jones of First Baptist church, Philadelphia, will serve on August 21. He will remain in Chicago to deliver the convocation sermon on August 28.

Board of Promotion Sets the Mark High

The Board of Promotion of the Northern Baptist Convention has set the mark high for the Baptists the coming year. At a meeting in Des Moines June 25 the following goals for the coming year were fixed: First, 200,000 members added to the churches by baptism and restoration. Second, 200,000 members enrolled in stewardship leagues. Third, 1,000 churches paying the pastor's pension premium (in the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board). Fourth, a total of $87,500,000 pledged toward the $100,000,000. (This means $29,675,700.15 in addition to the amount pledged to April 30, 1921.) These additional pledges must be secured before May 1, 1922, if conditional pledges of $3,000,000 are made available. Fifth, a total of $20,000,000 paid on account of the New World Movement.

Expert Speaks on a Neglected Field

Who knows anything about Siberia, the land of vast areas and meager population? The Mount Hermon Federated School of Missions, which held its annual session on Mount Hermon in California July 9-16, was determined to find out something about this neglected section of the earth. Dr. H. H. Guy, a former Disciples missionary to Japan who now teaches in the Berkeley Union Seminary, was brought to the School of Missions to lecture on Siberia. Dr. Guy served as interpreter during the war for the United States government, and he was located at Vladivostok. He gave lectures full of information about the eastern domain of the Russian empire.

Hotel for Retired Ministers

A hotel has been purchased by the Retired Ministers' Association of the Methodist Episcopal church which will be put at the disposal of the members of the association. It is located at Eustis, Fla., and will accommodate 130 people. The purchase price was fifty thousand dollars, twenty thousand of which was subscribed by the people of Eustis. If the rooms are not demanded by the ministers they may be let out to other peo-

Disciples General Convention Program is Announced

THE program for the International Convention of the Disciples of Christ to be held at Winona Lake, Ind., August 28-September 4 is now in the hands of the printer. On Monday board meetings will be held and the convention proper will open on Tuesday afternoon in the large tabernacle, which will seat nearly eight thousand people. At this afternoon session the annual reports of the various organizations participating in the convention will be presented.

A feature of the week will be a series of vesper services held on the hill out of doors. This will be directed by Rev. Jesse M. Bader, secretary of evangelism. The speakers will be Rev. M. A. Hart, Rev. Jesse B. Kellems, Rev. J. B. Hunley, Rev. Harry G. Knowles and Dr. Herbert L. Willett. The president's address will be delivered Tuesday evening by Rev. George A. Miller of Washington, D. C.

Wednesday and Thursday will be given over to the work of the United Christian Missionary Society. Addresses interpretative of the different departments of the work of this organization will be presented. Friday will be the day for special interests not represented in the work of the United Christian Missionary Society, including the Board of Education and the Board of Temperance and Social Welfare. One of the interesting features of Friday will be two addresses by Dean Charles R. Brown of Yale Divinity School. His topic in the evening is: "The Primacy of Education in Building the Kingdom of God."

Saturday will be a day unique in Disciples convention history. On this day there will be an open forum through the forenoon during which an hour will be devoted to each of three different questions. These are "Was the New Testament Church a Community Church?" "What Should Be the Attitude of the International Convention and of Local Churches and Other Agencies to the So-called Independent Missionary Agencies?" "What Shall Be the Attitude of the Church of Christ to Members of Other Communions Who Seek Fellowship With Them?"

Sunday will be a day of spiritual privilege. Rev. Earl Wilfley will preach in the morning. In the afternoon a communion sermon will be preached by Dr. George H. Combs and the communion service will be presided over by Dr. A. B. Philpott. The evening meeting is devoted to the interests of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity. Rev. J. J. Castleberry will speak on "Christian Unity," and Rev. Charles Clayton Morrison will speak on "Christian Unity and World Peace." The convention will close with the Sunday evening session.

ple. When the ministers stop there with their families they may have accommodations at the rate of three or four dollars a week. A cafeteria is operated in connection.

Fanatic Religionists Lead on to Death

The perversion of the Christian faith sometimes leads to some very grotesque and terrible occurrences. In South Africa recently a sect sprang up among the natives called the "Israelites." This group was led by a man who called himself the Prophet Enoch. They took possession of government land near Queens-town and defied all the government authorities. A force of 800 police was sent against the sect with orders to proceed diplomatically if possible. The "Israelites" attacked the police with long steel daggers and when the fray was over 199 of them were killed and 125 were fatally wounded. This has ended the trouble with them. The native opinion in South Africa is said to defend the police and to condemn the action of the religionists. The "Israelites" rushed to death with the recklessness of dervishes.

Church Establishes Court to Hear Boys' Disputes

Boys need a court in which to settle their disputes before there is an appeal to physical force even more than men do. An ardent worker of First Christian Church of Lincoln, Neb., has established such a court. Some newsboys recently brought to the court a question which was rending their group. One boy had lost money by being overstocked with papers by another boy. The boy losing the money had taken a baseball and sold to settle the account. A jury was impanelled, two attorneys were appointed from the circles of the boys, and a layman of the church was chosen as judge. The jury was out ten minutes and brought in a verdict which settled the case in justice and equity. This group of newsboys is led by a layman known as Dick Case, and his "gang" meets in the church basement at stated intervals.

Catholics Spend Large Sum on New University

The Roman Catholic church has very ambitious plans for the Catholic University at Washington. The Shrine of the Immaculate Conception is already under construction at a cost of five million dollars. Construction will soon be begun on a great library which will cost a million dollars. The new university, one of the youngest in America, already has one of the largest university libraries in the country and is said to have the finest collection of books on Latin America in existence. A stadium will be built for the university, modeled after the Harvard stadium, which is to cost a half million dollars. While many Protestant denominations look to New York or Chicago as a national headquarters, Roman Catholics persist in their traditional policy of establishing themselves firmly at the national capital, making church administration coincide in large measure with the administration of the affairs of state.

Archbishop of Canterbury Visits Scottish General Assemblies

The "Kirk" of Scotland is the established church of that country in the same sense that the Episcopal church is the established religious organization of England. Recently the Archbishop of Canterbury visited the General Assembly of the Scottish church, a thing unprecedented in British annals. He spoke with regard to the Lambeth proposals for unity. Furthermore the archbishop visited the General Assembly of the United Free church. Many Britishers cherish the dream these days of an all British church that would include practically all those non-Romanists who hold to the historic faith. The two great Scottish communions are drawing very near to a union of their forces, and when this is accomplished the Scottish people, once the most sadly divided religious people in the world, will be among the most united and harmonious.

Christian Student Movement Marks Quarter Century

Dr. John R. Mott has recently put into book form the story of the World's Student Christian Federation. Six leaders met in August, 1895, at Vadstena Castle, Sweden, and laid the foundations of the movement. A three-fold aim was laid out. This was "to lead students to become disciples of Jesus Christ as only Saviour and God, to deepen the spiritual life of the students and to enlist students in the work of extending the kingdom of Christ throughout the world." When originally formed it united five distinct movements. Today there are twenty-six constituent organizations. There are now 2,500 local organizations which have a membership of 200,000 students.

Ministers Petition in Behalf of World Peace

The Committee on Reduction of Armaments of the Church Peace Union recently presented to President Harding a petition signed by 20,503 Protestant ministers, Catholic priests and Jewish rabbis, asking that the president call an international conference to discuss reduction of armaments. The signatures were gathered by mail from all over the country. Of the various religious leaders approached on the matter of the petition, only 209 refused to sign because of an opposite opinion. The northern Methodists lead in the signatures with 4,950 and the Baptists are a close second with 3,650. The denominations that follow are: Presbyterians, 1,950; Lutherans, 1,900; Methodists, South, 1,500; Episcopalians, 1,400; Disciples, 1,400; Congregationalists, 1,150.

Rebukes Methodists for Immodesty

Most denominations have pet adjectives with which they describe themselves. These phrases grow sufficiently hackneyed to arouse the mirth of the ungodly, and to occasion discreet smiles among the saints. The editor of the North-western Christian Advocate administers a rebuke to a minister who spoke in his prayer of the "great Methodist church." The editor suggests, "From the upper side the qualifying adjective might not be absolutely appropriate."

Two Hundred Daily Vacation Bible Schools at Work

The Daily Vacation Bible school movement has made great growth again this summer. For a long time social workers have felt the need of doing something for the children who were turned on the streets at the time of year when juvenile delinquency mounts to the highest figure. The public schools were without funds for any summer program and the church program is therefore welcomed by all sections of the city. Last year there were 164 schools in operation with a total enrolment of 21,000. This year the figure is growing greater. There are over 200 schools with an enrolment running beyond 25,000. These schools have a central organization through which common methods are brought into operation. The two thousand teachers come together once a week for instructions in the various kinds of work which they

Butler College Secures a President

BUTLER COLLEGE, located at Indianapolis, has been without a president for months and the attention of Disciples of Christ has been centered upon this situation, for Butler is a school of central importance in this fellowship. Dr. Robert Judson Aley, president of the University of Maine, has been called to the presidency of Butler quite recently and has promised to accept. He will move his family to Indianapolis by September. Dr. Aley is an Indiana man, having been born in Coal City, and he was educated in Indiana institutions for the most part. He secured a B. S. from Valparaiso University, an A. B. and an A. M. from the University of Indiana, and a Ph. D. from the University of Pennsylvania. He has carried on special studies at Leland Stanford University. As an educator he has filled every position from country school teacher to university president, his special subject being mathematics. He taught in the University of Indiana, becoming head of his department and later state superintendent of public instruction. With the calling of a president the board of trustees is discussing some ambitious projects for Butler college. It is proposed to enlarge the school into the University of Indianapolis. A change of location to Fairview park is also one of the items in a program of enlargement that is being considered. Five faculty positions are to be filled at once so the new president comes to grips at once with real problems. He is fifty-eight years of age, at the height of his powers. The board of trustees assures its public that the parents of the new president were Disciples, and that Dr. Aley has throughout his life taken an active part in the affairs of the church.

are doing. These daily vacation Bible schools are giving more Bible instruction in two months than the average Sunday school is able to give during the whole year. Besides the Bible instruction there is manual training, educative games and an Americanization program which commends the schools to all public spirited citizens.

Keeping in Touch with Isolated Christians

Many Christians do not feel at home outside of the communion of their fathers. Universalists are carrying on a publicity program to locate the isolated members of their flock, and these will be put into touch with the movement through literature and letters. The most ambitious undertaking has been that of the Protestant Episcopal church. A Church League of the Isolated has been formed, and the idea has met with a most encouraging response. The bishop of South Dakota sent a Christmas message to the members of the league in his state last winter. In some cases a number of people are found in one community, and the rector of the nearest church makes periodic visits, holding a religious service in a home.

Episcopalians Revive Their Personnel Bureau

The problem of locating ministers congenially is one of the big tasks of the Christian church. The Methodists do this through the bishop, but with much dissatisfaction and much leakage from their ministry into that of other denominations. The loosely organized denominations have so little machinery for this that good men are often out of work in spite of the demands of the churches for men. The Episcopal church is reviving its Personnel Bureau which has in the past proved so effective in its work of serving the churches. This bureau undertakes to put each man into the field where he is best suited, with the cooperation and approval of the bishop, of course. In twenty-two months the original bureau, an experimental affair, received applications from 187 clergy and applications from 31 parishes. The bureau located organists, curates and various lay workers as well as rectors of churches. In some denominations ministers are urged to advertise for positions, but the Personnel Bureau is a very much more dignified and effective means to the end of making men efficient in their life work.

Fluctuation in Ministerial Supply

The Congregationalists are known among the Christian organizations for their care in the gathering of statistics. Deductions drawn from the figures published in their year-book have more authority than those from some similar publications. The matter of ministerial supply in this denomination has been studied for a long time. In 1865 at the close of the civil war the proportion of Congregational churches in this country without pastoral care was 19.3 per cent. The year when conditions were the very best the percentage of churches without oversight was 16.6. The figures in the last year book show that 22.4 per cent are now without care. This is a high percentage, but is not as high as some church leaders have believed it to be without consulting the statistics. Rev. Marion J. Bradshaw, student secretary of the Congregational Education Society, insists that it is bad psychology to be talking continually about a meager supply of ministers, holding that the laymen of the churches will not espouse a dying cause, but will respond to an appeal to join in with a going enterprise.

Southern Presbyterians Favor Racial Peace

The southern people are alert to the dangers of interracial strife and are co-operating with all wise movements to bring about better feeling. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States which met in St. Louis recently, passed resolutions pledging the support of the denomination to the Interracial Commission which is working valiantly toward better conditions. The problem is neither northern nor southern any more, and in both north and south there is need of studying the ten million black men and becoming acquainted with their aspirations and ideals.

Employers Defend Freedom of Christian Pulpit

Not all employers are ready to stand with their confreres of Pittsburgh. The Federal Council of Churches is in receipt of a communication signed by some of the greatest employers in the east in which they approve the social attitude of the Federal Council. With regard to the Pittsburgh difficulty, they speak right out in the following words: "We especially deplore any financial boycott of the church bodies as unethical and highly inexpedient. The United States needs the church in these days; and the church it needs is not one that is timid and colorless but one which, while judicious, is aggressive and courageous."

Ministers Will Retrace Paul's Steps

Walking in the steps of the Apostle Paul is the privilege of twenty-six ministers and seminary professors who have gone to the near east to study the life of Paul on the spot this summer. At the present time no theme is yielding so many new facts as the life of Paul. In Corinth an American archeological expedition is unearthing a synagogue. Near Athens a temple has been found which has significance for the Christian story. When these students return with their pictures and lectures, there will be new interest through the whole church in the life of Paul.

Four Thousand Moving Picture Machines in the Church

While most ministers are still debating the matter and some are actively hostile to the innovation, four thousand churches in the United States are operating moving picture machines. Just what effect this will have upon the commercial movies is problematical. It would seem inevitable that the effect should be felt in many communities in a decreased patronage of the commercial houses. Many of the churches that employ this method are Congregational, Methodist and Disciples churches.

Church Organists Are Now an Organized Guild

Every profession and calling has its organization these days and the church organists have not lagged behind. Their fourteenth national convention was held in Philadelphia during the latter part of July. There were discussions about purely musical topics, but some of the papers were on such every-day themes as how to get on with the minister.

Work Starts on Bahai Temple

The world temple of the Bahaist religion is already in construction at Wilmette, a suburb of Chicago. On a hill overlooking lake Michigan a temple is being erected which when completed will cost a million and a quarter dollars. The architect is Louis Bourgeois. The architect has drawn plans which have aroused the most favorable comment and he asserts that his ideas came by divine revelation. He is of course a member of the Bahai faith. The symbols of all religions will be found upon the temple since the Bahaist religion claims to supersede all other forms of faith. The great dome of the building will be 162 feet high. Rooms will be provided for the followers of the various religions to meet for their own peculiar kind of worship. The Bahaist religion sprang out of

Disciples Promoting Church in the Oil Fields

The lure of oil these days is much like the lure of gold in a former time. Men from all over the world are to be found at Breckenridge, Texas, in the center of the big fields west of Ft. Worth. A Disciples church is already planted in that pioneer town, backed by First Christian church of Ft. Worth. Electric fans have been installed in the church to keep it cool during the summertime. A parsonage has already been erected and the minister has the advantage of the very latest city comforts in a pioneer city. The workers in an oil country have the virtues and vices that used to characterize a mining town.

El Paso Now Belongs to Roman Catholics

The city of El Paso, Texas, is the gateway to Mexico. In a population of 85,000 there are 35,000 people of Mexican extraction. The growth of Protestant propaganda among these Mexicans aroused the church authorities and the Roman Catholic bishop planned a typical medieval counter movement. A great parade was arranged in celebration of the dedication of the city to "the Sacred Heart of Jesus." This parade was resplendent with the barbaric glory that characterizes a Mexican social event. Some members of the Knights of Columbus order held up a canopy and underneath this canopy marched two bishops, one from El Paso and the other from Chihuahua. All the people witnessing the parade were ordered to take off their hats in honor of the church. The Methodist and Presbyterian gymnasiums and schools are for the moment deserted by large numbers who have returned to old loyalties, but one wonders if the parade can hold these permanently to the old mother church.

Church Would Not Bless His Marriage

Secular papers have featured the difficulties of a young man in Sault Ste. Marie, Mich. He decided he wanted to marry a divorcee. The priest of the Catholic church to which he belonged would not marry him, so he tried out one by one the Protestant ministers. These also refused to a man, and at last he was driven to the office of the town squire, where he had the civil ceremony. There is a tightening up on the part of the ministers with reference to divorce.

History of Iowa Disciples Will be Written

Though they have less than a hundred years of separate denominational history, the Disciples have in recent years been developing considerable interest in their early history. The state convention of Iowa has authorized Rev. Charles Blanchard to write the history of the churches of that state. Mr. Blanchard has spent most of his life among the Iowa Disciples, being connected with their journalism, and in many other ways familiar with the life of the churches. When his book is written it will be published at the expense of the Iowa Christian Missionary Society.

Presbyterian Sunday Schools Are in a Healthy Condition

The statistics of Presbyterian Sunday schools indicate that the past year has been a very encouraging one in the life of that denomination. A grand total of 1,646,068 are now enrolled in the Presbyterian Sunday schools. Last year the number of new pupils added were 140,767, exceeding that of any previous year. The giving of the Sunday school people is also remarkable, the gifts to Presbyterian boards averaging $1.50 per person.

Canoe Load of Converts Drowned on the Congo

Rev. Charles P. Hedges, who is on furlough in this country after a term of exacting missionary service upon the Congo, was in receipt of a very sad letter recently. A canoe containing eleven of the native Christians of Monieka, ten men and a woman, who were making a trip to saw lumber for the mission, were thrown out of their dugout canoe into the water and drowned. The loss is a very serious one for the infant church, as some of the most stalwart leaders were in the group. Mr. Hedges draws a moral from the sad incident that the Disciples denomination should no longer delay in providing steam launches with which to make the trips up and down the river. Several years ago Rev. Ray Eldred, a missionary from the state of Michigan, was drowned in the Congo, an event which could have been averted by adequate modern equipment.

How Shall I Get Ready to Preach?

A church college gives religious training a state school may not give. A state university gives a broader and more thorough training than the average church college can give.

At the Bible College of Missouri a student obtains an intensive religious training while getting the educational benefits of the University of Missouri. Attending both schools at once, he combines the merits of both.

Ministerial students earn their way preaching for near-by churches.

A New Feature for the

Bethany System of Sunday School Literature

WHEN, three years ago, announcement was made of the early publication of the 20th Century Quarterly, which covers the International Uniform Lessons in an up-to-the-minute, red-blooded, masterful way, a hearty welcome was given the new publication as meeting a real need of the modern Sunday-school. The immediate success of the Quarterly was indicative of the fact that the publication was no disappointment to those who had expected much of it. And the enthusiastic appreciation of it through the three years of its history has been a matter of wide comment.

Some of the leaders who have used the Quarterly have expressed the desire that The Christian Century Press follow up this achievement with the publication of a Quarterly of similar character for the use of the Intermediate Department, pupils of from 13 to 16 years of age. The publishers respond sympathetically to the suggestion that for this most critical age there is needed a Bible study manual that really "gets under the skin" of the young people.

We take pleasure in announcing that, beginning with the autumn quarter, in addition to the Senior Edition, the 20th Century Quarterly: Intermediate Edition begins publication. We say but one thing regarding it here: It is the most modern and vital aid to effective Bible study (International Uniform Lessons) ever published for the Intermediate Department. Other announcements will be made later.

Mail your request for free sample copy of the new Quarterly at once, and same will be sent to you as soon as published

Denominational Evolution

Fifteen Cts. a Copy August 18, 1921 Four Dollars a Year

What We Did

WE DID the largest volume of business from last October 1st to June 30th this year ever done in nine months, in thirty-three years' work of Church Extension. Sixty-six churches received help, with loans totaling $462,580. This made possible new church buildings for the Disciples of Christ valued at $1,387,740.

WE DID this, however, by borrowing heavily at the bank in St. Louis, in order to keep faith with the churches promised the loans.

What We Did Not

WE DID NOT, and as yet have not, closed loans totaling $398,550 granted to forty-two churches prior to October 1st, 1920.

WE DID NOT, and as yet have not, granted loans to fifty-one churches that have filed applications since October 1st. These loans asked for total $418,750.

WE DID NOT permit sixty-three other churches that wrote asking for help, to even file applications for loans. The reason is obvious.

WE DID NOT permit still other churches writing us—fifty-nine of them—to file applications for loans to build parsonages, even though the National Convention of last year authorized the Board to help build homes for ministers. Same reason!

What We Need

WE NEED at once a half million dollars to close the loans already granted, to be able to grant the applications now on file, and pay the bank what we borrowed.

WE NEED within the next few years an additional million dollars to be added to the $1,800,000 we already have in the Church Extension funds, to meet the demands of the greatest building campaign, now setting in, that our brotherhood has ever experienced.

WE NEED, therefore, a great offering in September from all of our churches. The opportunities are unprecedented, the needs are real and urgent, the appeals are heartfelt. What will your answer be on Church Erection Sunday in September?

Ambassadors of God

By S. PARKES CADMAN

In this book, just from the press, Dr. Cadman, well-known Brooklyn preacher, maintains that the outstanding truths for preachers to proclaim are few, simple and experimental. He bids them find these truths in the Scriptures and shows how their greater peers in the Christian church through all the centuries have taken this Scripture material, and shaped it, each to the needs of his own generation.

New Versions of the New Testament

MATTHEW ARNOLD once wrote to Charles Reade, the English novelist: "The old Bible is getting to be to us literary men of England a sealed book. We may think that we know it. we were taught it at home; we heard it read at church; perhaps we can quote some verses, or even passages; but we really know very little of it. I wish, Reade, that you would take up the Old Testament and go through it as though every page were altogether new to you—as though you had never read a line of it before. It will astonish you."

The reason of the wide popularity of the recent versions of the New Testament is simply that they aid the reader in coming to its messages with a sense of freshness. The pages glow with new interest. We recommend as the very best new translations the following:

Moffatt's New Testament, $1.50 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, gilt edges, $1.75, plus 8 cents postage).

Weymouth's New Testament, $2.00 plus 12 cents postage. (Pocket ed., $1.35 plus 8 cts.

"England Has No Time for God"

DOLEFUL indeed are the voices that reach us from England today. Moral collapse, spiritual indifference, industrial chaos seem to have settled over the motherland like a blight, filling the finest minds with a disappointment akin to dismay. James Douglas writes for the London Daily Express a vivid article with the refrain, "England has no time for God," and the picture he paints is dismal to the point of despair. "Never in my lifetime has religion ebbed so low. Never has the spiritual pulse of the nation beat so feebly." Churches and chapels, with few exceptions, are empty. Something like soul sickness has seized the people, all classes alike, driving them mad for pleasure in which there is no joy, a mania for materialistic indulgence, for stimulation of the senses, for exasperation of the nerves. Hard, set, serious faces bent upon some witless delight, some brainless sport, are seen in every rank of life. The time is devoid of tenderness, wistfulness, merriment, and young people hurry from dance to dance, from game to game, like haunted automata." Bishop Hensley Henson, in an interview in the London Telegraph, confirms this drab, spiritless outlook, describing modern society as the anti-Christ: "I confess I see a dark hour for the higher life of humanity. We are living in an age which has rejected religion. It is not only indifferent to Christ, it is anti-Christian. Materialism has for the moment triumphed, and it can only work destruction." With which Dr. Selbie agrees, declaring that "England is pagan. The people of this country do not know what Christianity is. Nonconformists have played the fool." Mayhap it is the black hour before dawn, but it is surely a "dark night of the soul" through which England is passing; and not unnaturally it has provoked a revival of apocalyptic religion. How much do these descriptions of English life differ from American life? America, too, is ill at ease, vexed of soul, bereft of great moral leadership, and distressed by a profound spiritual malady. But the tide will turn. There will be a great slump in immorality, a panic in the pig markets of sensual cynicism. There is hope in the very vileness of the times—they are too bad to be true. England and America must find time for God!

The Glory of Organizing New Churches

A CITY mission secretary of a mid-western city claims the glory of organizing a hundred new churches for his denomination through a period of years. He was called a success by all of his confreres on the city mission board. When his successor came to the office, he worked himself literally to death. This man declared confidentially to his friends: "I spend nearly all my time sitting up with sick churches." Some of these churches died, and he had to conduct the funeral services. When this city mission secretary died from overwork, few heralded him for the great man that he really was. He had not been a church-organizer. Instead he had favored the policy of merging a number of needless churches with churches of other denominations that were adjacent. In days gone by all that was necessary for the organization of a new church was the determination upon the part of some ecclesiastical official that a given city or neighborhood should have a church of Blank denomination. A canvass was instituted, the faithful were gathered together in a hall, missionary funds were appropriated and the denomination planted itself in advance territory. In some of the larger cities comity commissions of the city federations now prevent this waste of church resources. A few states have developed the comity idea so that it is no longer permitted to organize churches in rural sections by such hit and miss methods. Probably no comity commission has ever resisted a bonafide demand of any-neighborhood to have the kind of church that it wanted. Local demands usually take another form than the increasing of the number of ecclesiastical institutions. Most neighborhoods want fewer and stronger churches. Meanwhile what about the hero who continues to organize churches hit and miss, sometimes in defiance of all comity agreements of his denomination? Shall we continue to crown him as the most loyal and successful of all the sons of the church? Is it not time to curb the activities of such churchman as divert their functions from proper kinds of church extension to the improper?

"China, Captive or Free?"

THE story of modern China, and the dealings of other nations with it, suggest burglarization as a synonym for civilization. No one can read the carefully documented history of that long-continued pillage, plunder, and outrage, as the facts are marshaled by Dr. Gilbert Reid, director of the International Institute of China—an enterprise worthy of the friendship and support of all men of goodwill—without a blush of shame and disgust. From the time when opium was forced upon China to the present, it has been one robbery after another. The notable volume by Dr. Reid, asking the question, "China, Captive or Free?" comes at a timely moment, in view of the proposed parley about problems in the Pacific, and ought to be read all over America, if only to show our people the unhappy part which our own government had in the intrigues which now involve China in a net of difficulties and dangers to herself and for the world. Now that it can be told, the telling shows that no government on earth can be trusted when it works in secret, without the discipline of publicity. It divulges acts hitherto kept hidden, revealing the ruthlessness with which China has been treated by those who feigned to be her friends, and all for grab and gain. It is a stirring appeal for justice, and a stinging indictment of the complacencies of modern religion which seeks to Christianize China at the expense of its political and economic enslavement. Dr. Reid has given his life to China, and he is more widely acquainted with the official and literary classes of the country, both the old mandarins and the leaders of Young China, than almost any one else. He writes a calm, impersonal, impartial record, and the bare facts make an eloquent appeal in behalf of common decency and against exploitation and brigandage.

Imported Americans at Ellis Island

MR. FREDERICK A. WALLIS, commissioner of immigration, in an address at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, recently, discussed the work which he has in charge in a most illuminating manner. The immigrant, he said, is here, and has always been here, thirty-four million people having entered the United States through that gate. Indeed, it was the immigrant who founded the country, developed it, fought for it, and made it what it is. At present three thousand immigrants enter our country every day, and the problem is to select the kind we want and can assimilate. Selection on the other side is better than rejection here, since it saves untold hardship and disappointment. Greedy steamship companies and passport forgers, working together, make for misery and tragedy to poor, ignorant people. Another problem is the distribution of immigrants when they are admitted. Today, if a line were drawn from the northwestern corner of Minnesota down to the lower corner of Illinois, and then eastward to the Atlantic, it would mark the area where eighty per cent of the immigrants stop. Only three per cent percolate into the southland. Some means must be devised for sending the newcomer where he is needed, and where he will be happiest, and where he would find more favorable conditions under which to rear his family. Americanization, said Mr. Wallis, is a work of patience, not of pressure; and we must begin it by admitting only such people as are sympathetic with our ideals, or can understand them. At any rate, the commissioner has cleaned up the island, made it more homelike, adding the human touch to official routine, and furnishing entertainment to beguile the tedium and suspense of waiting—especially music, which is the universal language of the world. He insists that the whole question of greeting and receiving these newcomers to our shores must be taken out, and kept out, of politics, and that they be treated in a manner worthy of the dignity of our nation and of their worth to it.

Get Ready for a Hard Winter

FAMINE stalks in the alleys of the great cities. The liberty bonds and small savings accounts have been gradually consumed and many families are even now, in the middle of the summer, next door to want. The Commission on Immigration and Citizenship of the Chicago Y. M. C. A. has decided to inaugurate a campaign of publicity to prepare the public for the dire things that seem about to happen. This commission is authority for the statement that on July 1 in some parts of the state there were as many as five men for every opening for employment. The city of Chicago has large numbers of men sleeping out of doors and begging their daily bread. The first touch of real winter will drive these men indoors. The commission urges that the lodging houses of the city, which have fallen into disuse during recent years, be made ready for the demands that are sure to press upon them during the coming winter. The churches are also warned that they too must prepare to lend a helping hand. Where it is possible to do so groceries should be bought up at the summer prices against the need of the coming winter. In the city of Chicago it is prophesied that there will be at least two hundred thousand men out of employment when the snow flies. These must have a minimum wage of a hundred dollars each to get through the winter. This means that special plans for employment must be devised, which will cost $20,000,000, a sum of money rather staggering when one begins to grasp its meaning. Meanwhile every influence should be used with congress to seek the cause of the present depression and adopt adequate remedies. The goods of the United States are being driven out of the world markets by the competition of reviving European countries. Nations that would buy of us are unable to do so because of unfavorable exchange rates. If these rather common assertions about the economic situation are not correct, then the truth should be found and some kind of remedy devised. Poverty in the richest nation of the world is an absurdity amounting to a social crime.

R. J. Campbell's "Life of Christ"

OFTEN during his ministry at the City Temple, Dr. Campbell was urged to write a Life of Christ, no doubt because he had made Christ a living reality to so many seeking and hitherto baffled souls. Now at last he has fulfilled that request; but it is not the great Life of Christ for which we have been waiting—for that he has neither the scholarship nor the literary gift. In many respects the present Life is different from what it would have been had he written it while minister of the City Temple. His attitude, his point of view have changed. Unfortunately the book is abridged, owing to the exigencies of the printing situation; but that is hardly to be regretted, since the homiletic instinct prevails, and he promises to follow this volume with a homiletical commentary on the Gospels. The book is inscribed to his old friends at the City Temple, and to the members of Christ Church, Westminster, of which he is now vicar. No doubt every man unconsciously portrays that in Christ most akin to himself, and so we find Dr. Campbell at his best when interpreting "the wonderful winsomeness" of the Master, as Papini, who fell in love with Jesus while reading the Gospels to the peasants, sees him as "terribly and fearfully alone, unable to make his immediate followers understand." The book is rich in insight, in spiritual charm and beauty, making us feel the majesty of the Master, the spirit not of this world, the unearthliness that clung to his every word and gesture. What we need is a Life of Christ for our time—scholarly, popular, spiritual, written with artistic stroke, in full light of modern knowledge and ancient faith—to be for us what Canon Farrar's Life of Christ was to his day. Who is sufficient for such an undertaking? Can any of our readers name the man for the task?

The Gospel of Safety First

THE good doctrine of safety first has developed in modern industry an order of preaching friars who are going through the country expounding the duty of taking no risks. A number of years ago Mr. Charles B. Scott, a business man of the little city of New Albany, Ind., saw some children dragged out from under a street car that had run around a dangerous curve. The horror of that day set his mind working on the task of preventing similar accidents. His suggestions to the street railway company embodied the fact that not only should the railways provide for public safety, but the people themselves must be taught not to take needless risks. He now has a safety bureau in Chicago and his agents talk to electric line operatives all over the middle west. The electric lines can afford to maintain this organization, for the reduction in the number of accidents makes it good business. Other lines of business now have their safety first program. The iceman is confronted with a sign warning him of slipping under a heavy load of ice, or counselling him not to carry his pick where it will injure his fellow workman. In the steel foundries there are signs that warn of dangerous spots in the factory. Through this safety first propaganda thousands of lives have been saved during the past few years. The education of the public has proved more difficult than has the education of the workmen. The "jay-walker" still wanders across the street in front of moving traffic. People still get off the street car backwards or bathe in spots where warning signs are placed. The children can be reached in the public schools, but the problem of the adult is more difficult. The classes and forums in the local churches might find in this cause a source of interest, and might help forward a movement which still has much to do to make human life as safe in this country as it ought to be.

Denominational Evolution

IF it is not strictly true, as our more modern psychologists and sociologists affirm, that the growth of the individual recapitulates the stages of development of the race, it is at least obvious that the evolution of society is much like the progress made by the child in the attainment of maturity and culture. It is not a rapid process. It has in many instances unpromising beginnings, and along the way there are times of reaction and apparent futility. It is only by struggle and self-discipline that the fair objectives of competent knowledge and serviceable character can be reached.

A denomination is not different from any other form of social organization in this regard. It usually takes its rise from some impulse or necessity on the part of a group of devoted people, or a single strong personality. It is the response to some deeply felt want in the area of religion. But it generally passes through many phases of partial realization of its ideals before its purpose is won, if that time ever arrives. And those of its adherents who survive to study its history in the long perspective of years may find much to give pause to their enthusiasm in its divergences from its first motives.

The Disciples of Christ are an admirable example of this evolutionary principle. They have many features that make the study of their career of interest to the student of contemporary religious history. They are of American origin and growth. From the beginning they have partaken of the vigorous life of the central and western portions of the country. They have had no formulated creedal statements to shape or safeguard their doctrinal development. They have had little of the academic temper. They have tended to the practical enforcement of a few comprehensive ideas, and the expansion of their influence by evangelistic rather than by academic means. It is of interest therefore to observe the variety of subjects with which they have busied themselves, with the naive conviction that these were in some manner related to their central and historic purpose—the advocacy and promotion of Christian union.

One of the first phases of their growth was a curious aversion to such organized forms of Christian service as those performed by the Bible societies and the Sunday schools. Convinced as they were that the union of Christians was the dominant need of the hour, they conceived all human devices and institutions as hostile to the primitive simplicity which they associated with the apostolic, and as they believed, united church. It did not seem to them possible that modern plans of operation and instruments devised for the promotion of religious work could be anything less than departures from the ideals expressed in the New Testament. For this reason they not only refused participation in the activities of these cooperative organizations, but denounced them as human schemes which were in direct opposition to the spirit and program of the gospel.

In a similar manner they declined to commit themselves to any missionary organization, whether interdenominational or of their own creation. It was many years before their first missionary society was projected, and then only after a long campaign of instruction, which had to overcome the prejudices aroused by the first mood of reserve. One of the reasons why missionary education proceeded so slowly among them, even after the leaders of the movement had committed themselves to the enterprise, and even Mr. Campbell had been made the first president of the organization, was the hang-over of the first mood of antagonism to any plan which could not produce a New Testament precedent.

Like most other religious bodies, the Disciples passed through a period of millenarian interest. Fortunately for their later intellectual development, this came early, and once safely endured, like the mumps and the measles of childhood, it has never seriously affected them since. The Millerite movement was at its height in the days when the Disciples were just maturing their strength. Mr. Campbell was influenced to no small degree by these speculations. But he could never accept the interpretations of the premillennialists. His was rather the attitude of expectancy which associated the millennial era of peace and goodwill with the unification of believers. He used to some extent the vocabulary of the apocalyptists without committing himself to their vagaries of times and seasons. In that manner the crisis of millenarian propaganda was safely passed, and never since, in spite of the tides and ebbs of the cult, has it had much significance for the Disciples. In this they have been fortunate beyond some of their religious neighbors, like the Baptists and Presbyterians, for example, who appear just now to be in the throes of this periodic resurgence of apocalypticism.

The Disciples also had their struggle with the problem of adjustment to modern methods of worship. Long and bitter were the controversies waged over the use of instrumental music in the churches. One whole section of the denomination fell away from fellowship with the main body on the ground that organs and missionary societies were human or satanic contrivances. And there are still some congregations who maintain stoutly their right of protest against the unholy thing.

As was to be expected, the Disciples passed through the critical period of controversy over the scientific movement in relation to the world order and the literary and historical investigation of the Bible. In this they were like most of the religious bodies which were in any manner touched by the modern spirit of inquiry. Of them, as of the rest, it may be said that evolution and biblical criticism divided them into two camps, without resulting in any serious cleavage of organization. Those questions have now largely ceased to have significance for them. Even those of their numbers who cling with tenacity to the conservative views find it difficult to interest a generation all of whose younger members have gone to school in the atmosphere of scientific study and the historical method.

But probably the most curious phase of Disciple history has been the settled and obstinate aversion of a portion of the body to the forms of Christian cooperation which the present period has witnessed with growing satisfaction. The one principle to which the Disciples were committed by their origin and history was Christian union. They would have been supposed accordingly to hail with satisfaction all approaches to this desired consummation. Yet surprisingly enough a considerable portion of the body set themselves resolutely to the denial of any interest in any form of unity which did not assume integration with the Disciples as its basis. In this regard they were as determined to force their interpretation of the Bible and of Christian history as the Roman Catholic or the Anglican parties. It was this attitude which for years led the majority in the conventions of the Disciples to withhold their assent to any form of church federation, even as a step toward the unity they were advocating. It has been this spirit which to the astonishment of friends and the dismay of progressive missionaries has made the Disciples the one outstanding non-cooperative force in certain movements toward unity on the mission fields.

But none of these attitudes of mind really interpret the spirit and temper of the significant and growing portion of the Disciples. With the increase in the spirit of devotion to education, and with the larger emphasis upon the principles of freedom and fraternity to which they are obligated by their beginnings and their later development, they are increasingly outgrowing the immaturities and crudenesses which have marked some stages of their history. Were it not so they would invite and suffer the fate which has befallen all stagnant and unprogressive movements in the past.

And this is the story of all the religious bodies that have survived the years of their inception. None of them has escaped the retarding and limiting influences of insistence upon side issues, and the temporary magnifying of secondary ideas to places of primacy. Every denomination would do well at times to study its history with a humbling sense of the effort, time and money that have been wasted upon futilities which had nothing to do with its central purposes, or with the promotion of Christianity. In the light of such by-products of the spirit of partisanship and obscurantism the real progress made can be the more readily discerned. And in like manner the great objectives may be disengaged from obstructing and subordinate issues.

The Night Blooming Cereus

A Parable of Safed the Sage

WE have a friend who rang our Telephone Bell, and spake thus unto me and Keturah, Come over to our house, and see that ye hasten; for behold, our Night-blooming Cereus is about to Bloom.

Now if he had called the half of an hour later, my Night-blooming proclivities would have been hard at work in slumber: for it was Bed Time.

But we put on our Wraps, and went over. And Keturah dolled herself up a little, but not too much. For she knew that there would be others present. For the friends who invited us warmed up the wires and called in all their friends. And there was quite a Bunch of us when we all arrived.

Now it had been many years since I had seen a Night-blooming Cereus in Bloom, and I had rather forgotten what manner of plant it was. And when I beheld it, it was as uninviting as any Cactus before Mr. Burbank laid hold upon it and sheared off the spines thereof. For this was by no means spineless.

But while we waited, the plant got busy, and there Bloomed a Marvelous wax-like flower, which opened its graceful petals in such beauty as I had seldom seen. And all who were present admired it with much rejoicing.

And I wondered at the creative wisdom which had put so lovely a flower on so uninviting a stalk and caused it to Bloom in the Night.

And I considered some men that I have known, who are rough and crabbed and unattractive, but whom I have detected doing kind deeds, and acting as if they were ashamed of it. And I once knew a man who was thought to be a Miser, but who was secretly generous. And I knew a man who was gruff and repellant, but who was kind of heart, and who hid his good deeds.

And it came to pass, once upon a time, that I knew a man whom every one counted the Meanest Man in town. For his disposition was like unto the Cactus, and no man dared come nigh unto him. But there came a time of calamity, when courage was needed, and he proved himself brave; and a time when kindness was needed, and he proved himself kind; and a time when generosity was needed, and he proved himself generous.

And I said, The wonders of the world are many, and among them, both in the world of flowers and the world of men, is the Night-blooming Cereus. For the night which hideth one sun bringeth out many stars; and the darkness which shutteth up most flowers bringeth out a few. And those few are most rare and wonderful.

On Rereading Keats

THE dew was on your brow, fair child of dawn;
Your vision was unwearied by the day,
Which wears upon us sore who tread the way
From youth to age. Earth's woe lay light upon
Your buoyant heart, which had the native grace
To carry spring into the winter drear.
Life's discords changed to music for your ear,
As sorrow bloomed in smiles upon your face.
Ah! would your gift were ours, whose souls are dead,
Slain by the subtle fiends of greed and pride;
Love on a golden cross is crucified,
And from the harp of life the song has sped.
Breathe into us, who faint, your vital breath;
Release our spirits from the gyves of death.

Prayer

DENY me, Life, the prize of gold
And fame's alluring gleams,
Then, if you must, hearts' love withhold,
But leave to me—my dreams!

Knowledge

THEY list for me the things I can not know:
Whence came the world? What Hand flung out the light
Of yonder stars? How could a God of Right
Ordain for earth an ebbless tide of woe?
Their word is true; I would not scorn their doubt,
Who press their questions of the how and why.
But this I know: that from the star-strewn sky
There comes to me a peace that puts to rout
All brooding thoughts of dread, abiding death;
And too I know, with every fragrant dawn,
That Life is Lord; that, with the winter gone,
There cometh Spring, a great, reviving Breath.
It is enough that life means this to me;
What death shall mean, some sunny Morn shall see.

Friendliness

THE wonder of the mighty pyramids,
The stateliness of Athens' noblest shrine,
The majesty of Taurus, grim and old,
The grandeur of the castles by the Rhine—
I quite forget them all, if I may hear
The purple martin's note of friendly cheer.

Justice Through Fellowship

By Richard Roberts

THE mind of Jesus was much occupied with the question of offences and their forgiveness. William Blake was right when he said that "the religion of Jesus is perpetual forgiveness of sins." So largely did this matter of forgiveness loom in the thought of Jesus that when he was teaching his disciples to pray, he added to the petition for forgiveness the clause—"as we forgive those that trespass against us." And in order that there may be no mistake about the matter, he returns to the point at the end of the prayer—and it is the only point that is so emphasized—"But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." Only the forgiving are forgiven. We are to forgive seven times in the day, and unto seventy times seven. And Jesus was only living out the logic of his own precept when he prayed on the cross—"Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

But what is forgiveness? It is plainly something more than a forgetting of injuries, merely letting bygones be bygones. In the parable of the two debtors Jesus likens sin to a bad debt and the forgiveness of sin to the writing off of a bad debt. But this does not convey a complete picture of what forgiveness is on Jesus' own showing. The creditor might write off the debt simply because it is no longer any use to keep it on his books. But forgiveness means that he begins to do business again with the man on the old terms. Forgiveness is not the obliteration of the injury; it is the reconciliation of the parties. It is the resumption of fellowship.

THE GRACE OF FORGIVENESS

Is the duty of forgiveness unconditional? The answer is plainly No. For Jesus speaks of repentance as the condition of forgiveness. "If he repent, forgive him." But there is after all something much greater than the duty of forgiveness; namely the grace of forgiveness. The grace of forgiveness does not wait for the repentance but goes out to provoke the repentance. This is the essential meaning of the hard sayings about the other cheek and the second mile. Jesus was not laying down specific injunctions to be obeyed literally. That was not his way. He was dramatizing a very important and far-reaching principle. What I have to do with an offender is not to break his head, but that much more useful and tremendous thing, to break his heart. That is also Paul's point, when he bids us feed and give drink to our hungry and thirsty enemy. "For in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head." It is the Christian purpose towards an enemy to turn him into a friend.

So that we come to something that looks like an absolute principle of conduct. So far as we may speak of a law in Christian ethics, there is a law there. It is the Christian thing to forgive unconditionally and utterly—to forgive not on repentance, but to forgive in order to bring repentance. And from this it is no unfair inference that Jesus regarded the restoration of a broken fellowship as a permanent and characteristic reaction of the Christian spirit. The emphasis that he lays upon redress and restitution by one who has offended his brother points the same moral from the other side. Perhaps here we have a clue to the radical principle from which the ethical philosophy of Jesus has its source.

We can best perhaps follow the matter up by contrasting Jesus' prescription for the treatment of offenders with the current conception and practice of justice. The popular idea of justice gathers around a doctrine of rights—rights of the individual or of the group. In effect, it resolves itself into an affair of safeguarding or redressing the balance of rights. It is concerned with the balancing of conflicting claims, with matching offence and penalty, injury and redress. Law is in the main the definition and orderly arrangement of a body of equities,* and the administration of justice has to do with the restoration of the equities when they are broken or, as in the matter of "injunctions," with forestalling a threatened violation.

FAILURE OF JUSTICE

Of the value and the limitations of this popular conception of justice as an organ of social progress, this is perhaps no place to speak. Two remarks may, however, be made somewhat summarily: first, that it inevitably makes even at its best for a static condition of society, for its concern is with the defence of the existing social equilibrium; and second, that in its application to crime, it has not only notoriously failed in diminishing the volume of crime, but has succeeded in creating a criminal class. In punishing crime, it appears to be preserving a superficial equilibrium, but it actually aggravates the subcutaneous moral anarchy that leads to crime.

The conception of right† which underlies the popular view of justice is the integrity of personal or group rights. Justice which is the affirmation and vindication of these rights works chiefly by means of prohibitions and deterrent penalties. I suggest that the real distinction of the Christian ethic is that it repudiates this doctrine of rights and substitutes another for it.

Jesus was once asked to compose a family dispute about a dead man's estate and to restore the violated equity of the position. Jesus declined to do so, and his comment on the affair was: "Beware of covetousness." Plainly the right that he saw was not vindicated by the adjustment of conflicting claims; and the real and ultimate right required conduct that removed the moral root of the conflict. The justice that he desired is not satisfied with securing the outward equities of the case, it requires the reconciliation of the parties in the case. Obviously in such an event the equities will take care of themselves.

*It is perhaps necessary to say that the term equity is not used in this paper in the technical sense which it has in law.

†It may be as well to point out that the difference in meaning between right and rights can best be grasped by remembering that the antithesis of right is wrong, while the antithesis of rights is duties.

The ethic that derives from this conception of right may be defined as the practice of reciprocity, mutuality, fellowship. The ethically right is that which creates, deepens, expands fellowship and restores it when it is broken. The ethically wrong is that which denies and hinders fellowship. Beneath this is an assumption of human solidarity with its corollary of the continuity and therefore the radical identity of all personal interests. Our common life today is ordered, and justice is administered on the basis of a doctrine of individual rights that are always potentially in conflict. The ultimate right as Jesus saw and taught it, was based on a doctrine of human interests that are always in fact identical. The Christian ethic is essentially the practice of self-identification with the other man—what the New Testament calls love. And the love of enemies, as Dr. Forsyth has well said, is but love being true to itself through everything. An understanding of the redemptive power of forgiveness is the best clue to a proper valuation of Jesus' ministry.

RIGHTEOUSNESS AND PEACE

It should now be plain why the Christian ethic is incompatible with war. While the war was on, we heard much about righteousness. Some of us were charged with preferring peace to righteousness. To which we made answer that our objection to war was that it only brought peace and never did or could bring righteousness. The difference between us and many of our friends was not a difference of preference between peace and righteousness but a radical difference in our conception of righteousness. They accepted a conception of righteousness that was based upon the sanctity of rights that are always potentially opposed to one another and a conception of justice which requires the violent vindication of violated rights. But it is intellectual confusion to call this righteousness Christian. It is Judaic, individualistic, anything but Christian, if the New Testament is the norm of Christianity. For the New Testament righteousness is love, fellowship, solidarity, reciprocity; and war both in its processes and results is a denial of this righteousness all the time. And if any one questions the truth of this view, well, let him look out upon the world as it is today in the wake of the recent conflict.

But the same ground leads to criticism and opposition to the present penal methods which are the rule in the whole of Christendom. A Christian society may exercise a "redemptive restraint" upon a criminal, but it will not at all be concerned with punishing him for his crime, but rather with curing him of his criminality. It will endeavor to restore him and fit him for fruitful fellowship with his fellowmen. Indeed the first thing that a truly Christian society would do would be to establish a new diagnosis of the economic and moral misfit in society. It would treat all moral anarchy not as a danger to be suppressed but as a disease to be cured. It looks indeed as though Samuel Butler and the pioneers of the psycho-analytic method were yet to be proved to be more Christian than the Christians in their attitude to this particular problem.

The application of this principle to the racial problem is obvious enough. It is certainly a denial of Christianity that any nation should permit within its society the existence of a class or race condemned to do its menial work in perpetuity. The denial of fellowship to the colored people in America by their white fellow citizens is not alone a failure to live up to the logic of the proclamation of emancipation; it is also a denial of the essential and obvious Christian principle of solidarity. In a community in which any class has to fight for its rights as against another class, it is palpably impossible to speak of its Christianity. And if the difference between the cultural level of the two races be a barrier to fellowship, then it is the plain duty of the white man to give the black man a full opportunity to rise to his own cultural level in order that there may be fellowship. The standard of Negro education in some of the southern states is very much to the point in this connection.

The international problem will find its solution only by the acceptance of Jesus' doctrine of right. More than a century ago, Adam Smith saw that even the economic interests of the nations were really identical, that the prosperity of the one was the prosperity of all. That was why he advocated the removal of all barriers to the free exchange of commodities and became the exponent of free trade. But free trade became competitive trade, and lost that character of free reciprocity which Adam Smith had in mind. Free trade as we know it is not the Christian ideal for international economics. We shall have to establish a more positive and orderly reciprocity. Laissez faire is certainly not a full interpretation of the law of love.

INTERESTS ARE IDENTICAL

The fundamental problem at this point is to persuade nations that their real interests are after all identical. The peace treaty has been fashioned wholly on the assumption that while the allies have certain immediate common interests, they have no interest in which the central powers have any share. And for that reason the peace treaty is a treaty of anything but peace. And the fact is and remains that there can be nothing that can be described as peace until the nations have accepted a doctrine of common international interests as the governing principle of their foreign policies. Here we are of course confronted with a problem of education. There will, for instance, have to be a revolution in the teaching of history and geography—a teaching of history which will lay the major stress upon the elements that have made for human unity rather than (as is at present the case) upon those which have made for conflict and war—and a teaching of geography which will assume at the start that a frontier is a line at which the peoples meet, and not a wall by which they are separated, a rendezvous rather than a partition.

This memorandum can do no more than outline the general direction which must be taken if the ethic of Jesus is to be translated into policies and programs of social growth. The one point that must be clearly kept in view all the time is that the Christian aim is the creation and the stimulation of fellowship in every part of life. The opening message of Jesus was the proclamation of the great prophet of the exile: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovery of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." And his closing word in prayer with the disciples before his crucifixion was that they might all be one. The region of life in which this problem presents the greatest difficulty at the present time is that which we broadly designate as the social, with special reference to industry. Here we are confronted with the great class-antagonism which has been created by the modern capitalist system of industry.

THE REAL PROBLEM

It is frequently said by benevolent capitalists that the interests of capital and labor are identical. But while industry is regulated on the profit-system and while labor is subject to the wage-system it is difficult to see how the interests of capital and labor are identical. Of course, the real interests of members of the capitalist class and of members of the working class are identical; but these are not the interests referred to in the current discussion. But neither the human interests of either class nor the material interests of the working class are served by the system as it operates today. It is plain that there can be no fellowship in this region until industry is organized upon a basis other than the profit-and-wage system on which it is organized today. Our problem therefore is to remove this hindrance to fellowship without denying fellowship in the act. For it is as sure as anything can well be that any attempt to reorganize industry upon a basis of something nearer equity even (not to speak of fellowship) will be bitterly resisted by large elements of the possessing classes. It does not belong to the present paper to discuss the solution of this difficulty. Here it is intended only to state the problem.

TRANSVALUATION OF VALUES

It has, however, to be pointed out that it is useless to speak of interests that are identical to all men without some attempt to define them. Yet the definition is full of difficulty and it can only be attempted in very general terms. It is clear that if the basis of our common life is to be shifted from the present doctrine of particularist rights to a doctrine of universally identical interests, there must be something of the nature of what Nietzsche called a transvaluation of values. And speaking roughly the translation must be from the material to the spiritual values of life. Men will never see that their interests are identical so long as those interests are conceived in terms of money-values as they are conceived today. If it is my interest to get as large a portion of the cake as I can, then by no showing whatsoever can my interest be identical with that of my neighbor who also wants as big a bite of the cake as possible. For the cake is after all at any particular moment very definite and limited in size. Men's interests are identical only in those regions in which every man can obtain all that he has capacity to receive without impoverishing any one else; and when a man reaches sufficiency in these things, he inevitably relegates to a subordinate place the material goods in the acquisition of which the good of life is today supposed to lie.

The ascendancy of the economic motive provokes and perpetuates conflict; and it is only as men receive the sovereignty of spiritual values that the economic motive can be dethroned. And the sovereignty of spiritual values implies practically two things—first, that the acquisitive life is supplanted by the creative and redemptive life, that the chief end of life is seen to lie in the doing of works of love and beauty; and second, that the priority of life is established as against every institution, political or religious, every dogma, theological or economic, every system whether of business or of government. It is a recognition of the centrality of the soul for thought and action; and a refusal to subordinate the human spirit to the requirements of church or state or market. Such a recognition is dynamic. The awakening of the soul to the sovereignty of spiritual values inevitably leads it to a crusade against those conditions, economic, political and social, which restrict it in its creative growth.

The Lion in His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

THE Lion owned a comfortable cottage by the sea and here he spent most of his summers. The matter of travel was always a painful and trying experience, but this virile invalid insisted upon taking certain journeys in spite of the suffering they involved. He was always particularly bright and keen when traveling. Then you were sure to see what I once called his "soldier's smile." He flushed a little angrily when I used this phrase and I never brought it out in his presence again.

This particular afternoon he was lying on a couch by an open window overlooking the Atlantic. Beside him was a table with the usual assortment of books and papers and magazines. There was a little sparkle in my friend's eye as I entered the room. He went at once to the subject in his mind, as was his way.

"I've just finished reading William E. Dodd's book on Woodrow Wilson," he began. "This professor in the University of Chicago has done a notable piece of work."

He held the book in his hand, turning the pages easily for a moment. Then he went on.

"Professor Dodd is a man of the south with the instincts and attitude of a southern gentleman. He is a democrat whose democracy is deep in his blood. He is a man of social enthusiasm, awake to all the fresher currents of contemporary life and thought. His style is direct and energetic. There is very little charm of phrase, and there is no subtle or delicate coloring in the writing of paragraphs. But he has a story to tell. He has made a long and careful and industrious and scientific investigation. And he tells the story with conviction and with power."

Once again my friend waited a moment. Then his voice became a bit more vibrant.

"What a story it is!" he said. "This tale of a man who dared to take the ideals of a Presbyterian parsonage into the councils of the nation. It is the story of the greatest dream which has been dreamed in our time, and he found the dream in the New Testament."

" 'One man with a dream at pleasure,
Can go forth to conquer a crown,
And two with a new made measure,
Can trample an empire down,' "

I quoted. The Lion listened with friendly sympathy to the familiar words.

"But he didn't conquer a crown, unless it was a crown of thorns," he said.

"And why did everything go wrong at last?" I asked.

"That's what Professor Dodd's book tells you," replied the Lion. "At least he tells you a part of it. And you have a better understanding of the story of our own times in America, and of many a subtle relationship of European politics when you have finished the book. Against what odds Wilson fought! He was crushed between the partisan politicians at home and the sordid diplomats of Europe. But it was a magnificent failure. It was the sort of failure men cannot forget. Wilson will capture men's imagination. He will haunt their conscience. He will keep coming into their minds. And because they cannot forget, some day they will set about doing the thing for which he gave his health and almost gave his life."

Fresh breezes were blowing in from the ocean while we talked.

I picked another volume from the table. It was Paul Haworth's History of the United States in Our Own Times.

"You are going in for contemporary America rather vigorously," I observed.

"It's a good piece of writing," replied the Lion. "You get a very intimate view of the development of the United States from the close of the civil war to the close of the European conflict. There is a particularly clear and cogent account of the social and economic development through which we have been passing. There is more to be said. But this book gives you more than most Americans have clearly in their minds. I'd like to have every leader of men and of movements in this country read it. And if people on the other side of the sea could be persuaded to read it they would understand us better."

The Lion moved his head a little impatiently on his pillow.

"Most Americans know very little about American history," he said. "A man ought to read Wilson's exquisitely written 'History of the American People,' with its clear and luminous picture of Europe in the background all the while. He ought to read Rhodes' volumes about the period when we approached our greatest conflict, the period of its waging, and the period of its aftermath. Then he ought to read Haworth's book to see the rise of new problems, and Dodd's biography for the stage setting of our own day."

As I walked away from the house along the shore I thought a little wistfully of this meditative invalid living over the past of our nation and peering forward to decipher its future. After all, a busy, active man could also find time to read and to think if he really set himself about it.

The Christ We Do Not See

By Ervin Moore Miller

THE fourth chapter of Luke tells the story of the return of Jesus from Judea to Galilee; and how, while on his way to Capernaum, he stopped over for a week-end visit in his old home town of Nazareth. When, on the Sabbath, the hour for worship came, Jesus went to the synagogue and there took the opportunity to announce his mission and his message to the friends and acquaintances with whom he had spent his life. He made the announcement in these words of the prophet Isaiah: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he anointed me to preach good tidings to the poor; he hath sent me to proclaim release to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord."

The eleventh chapter of Matthew also records a statement from the lips of Jesus in which he sets forth the meaning and significance of his work and preaching. John the Baptist got his feet tangled up in the net of Herod's marital affairs, and tripped and fell into prison. In prison he had new time for reflection. He looked back upon the immediate past, and forward to the growing certainty of punishment or death at the hands of Herod. These thoughts were food for doubt. It was fast becoming evident to him that the kingdom was not coming as he expected, nor was Jesus doing what he wanted a Messiah to do. In his perplexity he sent some of his friends to ask Jesus if he was the true Messiah or must he, John, be subjected to disappointment. Jesus said, "Go tell John the thing which ye hear and see: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached to them."

SHEEP AND GOATS

These two statements from the lips of Jesus, setting forth what he thought was the meaning of his life and labor, provide favorable atmosphere into which may be introduced the unknown Christ of the familiar judgment scene in the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew. The folks in the judgment scene, sheep and goats alike, meet the surprise of their lives when they are told that they had ever seen their Lord in need in any place at any time. When they are told that they had seen him, clothed him, and visited him or that they had failed to do so, they are unable to restrain their shocked sense of unbelief, and ignorance. "When, where, how, O Lord!" they say. "Surely there is some mistake! We never saw thee in prison, or sick out of prison; we never saw thee naked, or hungry, or thirsty, or anything else! How can such things be?" Then comes that unforgettable answer: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it unto me."

This is the unknown Christ; the Christ in human personality. Who knows, and loves, and honors him? We know the kingly Christ with whom we hope to stand in and get by on the judgment day. We know the Christ of theology, of tradition, of controversy; but this Christ who dwells in the humble lives of our human brothers—this Christ we do not know! It is not difficult to recognize Christ sometimes in human life, if bank accounts are big, clothes up to date and manners above reproach; where social standing links us to the most select social functions during the week, and to the classy church on Sunday. But to know Christ in humbler human lives is not so easy. To see him in the rags and wreckage of poverty and vice; to recognize him in the lives of the lowly, the disgraced, the diseased, the backward, the beaten, and the unfortunate—this is no easy thing. Here is the unknown Christ; and it is only love for men in our human hearts that can reveal to us this Christ we do not know. He can be seen only as he himself saw, by knowing and recognizing the sacredness of human life wherever, and under whatever conditions of life it may be found! The barriers and chasms that mark the boundaries between the different areas on the map of human society will pass away if we ever truly recognize this human Christ.

THE JUDGMENT DAY NOW

We may have the judgment day any time when we are willing to apply to our lives this test: "Inasmuch as ye did, or did it not, unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it, or did it not, unto me." Now is the time to make the application. How do we stand in the light of this? Where are we? What are our interests? How have we behaved? Have we not said with pious pride, "Lord, Lord, we have believed what the fathers have taught us about thee without question; we have sung praises to thee in season and out of season, and have highly exalted thy name above every name! We have prophesied and prayed diligently in thy name; we have kept with jealous zeal the ordinances, and now we are ready to enter into our everlasting reward with thee!"

It will be well and wise for us to forget all this for once and line up his own basis of division and reward which is this: "Inasmuch as ye did it, or did it not, unto one of these my brethren, ye did it, or did it not, unto me." It will be extremely embarrassing to us if we go through life thinking we are sheep only to find that we have all the time been goats. It will be extremely embarrassing to go through life claiming that we have the only true and infallible knowledge of the Lord; and to busy ourselves pointing out the goats of unbelief and heresy in religion, to find ourselves cast out as never having known the Lord at all! There will indeed be many in that day who will cry, "Lord, Lord," only to learn that they have been workers of iniquity who did not know Christ in real life!

Inasmuch as we do it unto one of these least we do it unto him! What does it mean? Does it mean that we have just as much right to call an Italian a "Dago," or a Negro a "Coon," as we have to call Jesus Christ a "Sheeny"? Does it mean that we have just as much right to cause Christ to suffer as we have to ill treat these? No! It means more than that; it means that what we do to these we do to him!

In a great address by a Negro leader of the south, Dr. A. M. Moore, is material which every American should read and ponder upon. The address was delivered before a religious convention in the south. Dr. Moore, a Christian business man deeply respected by the people of his own race, attempts to exhibit the Negro as a person and not as a problem. He brings many interesting and illuminating facts to our attention. He tells of our treatment of the Negro in and after the war, as indicative of our characteristic attitude toward him. In the great parade in Paris, which celebrated the victory of the allies, the American army leaders forbade participation of the Negroes! And again in a great painting in the Pantheon of War in Paris where the deeds of valor of the allies are made immortal, the face of no colored man was allowed to appear among the Americans.

CHRIST IN A COLORED SKIN

It evidently takes great faith on the part of some white persons to see Christ in human personality, when that personality is covered with a colored skin. It takes great faith to see Christ in human personality when that personality speaks a different language, eats different food, practices different customs, lives in a different environment, or belongs to a different branch of the human family from that of which we are members.

But is hunger, or thirst, or sorrow, or pain, or disappointment, or sacrifice any less real to one human being than another just because there are superficial lines of division among them? Is the sorrow of an Armenian family, or the hunger of a Syrian village less real than the hunger and thirst of Americans? Is the sacrifice that gives life itself for one's friends and homeland less real or less worthy of honor and respect because the one making the sacrifice looks different on the outside? Is human personality less sacred or less in need of the sympathetic help and compassionate interest of the strong because it is hungry, in poverty, ignorant, in prison, lame, blind, diseased or full of sin? "Inasmuch as ye did it, or did it not, unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it, or did it not, unto me," means that however human personality is or seems to be, it is always to be treated as though it were Christ himself. Whatsoever we do unto a human personality we do even also unto him!

The owner of a dark and dirty old tenement house in an eastern city rented it to a family diseased with tuberculosis. After a member of the family died there of this disease they moved to another locality. The tenement was rented to another family just as it was left by the diseased family. This new family was composed of a husband, wife and one child, all in good health. In this tenement the child contracted tuberculosis and died. When an investigation was made, and the owner of the tenement was asked why he did not have his building thoroughly cleansed after the tuberculous family left, he said that he could not afford the ten dollars that this precaution would have cost. Think what ten dollars would mean to you bought at such a cost as this! Especially if you love children at all!

The owner of that tenement and many more like him may be church members, and on intimate terms of acquaintance with the traditional and theological Christ; but the Christ in human personality they do not know. The true visitation of Christ to their lives comes in the form of these poor, sick, homeless and unfortunate ones for whom they have no love and less concern! How different society would be if men regarded human personality everywhere as though it were Christ himself!

SACREDNESS OF PERSONALITY

Does the land owner whose land is worked by people who can never hope to own land themselves, or enjoy the privileges and blessing which he enjoys, see Christ in the human personalities over which he has control? Does he desire the rights, privileges and opportunities which he craves for himself and his family to become the possessions of his tenants? Is he interested more in their personalities than he is in their power to produce profits? Most likely the sacredness and value of their personalities has not yet occurred to him! One easily hears him saying, "O Lord, when did I ever see thee in need of life, liberty, and the freedom necessary for happiness? When saw I thee in the prison of unequal opportunity, and I did not visit thee?"

He who discerns Christ in human personality is indeed far nobler than he who sees in men only means for furthering his own schemes for power, wealth, and ease! He who discerns Christ in human personality is more truly Christian than he who knows all the other Christs! It is Christ in human life the knowledge of whom saves men from selfishness and enables them to live as brothers and servants one of another! Christ cares much more for the interest we manifest in him when we find him in the least of these than any other interest we may have for or about him. Only by our recognition of him there can the kingdom of God which he taught, and for which he died, be made to come on earth.

Take another look at life and see if you can discern the face of Christ in the faces of men. Do we know the Christ who comes to us whenever experience presents us with an opportunity to serve one of these least, his brethren? Do we deal with human personality as though it were Christ himself? Do the forces of our society tend toward producing a more perfect manifestation of this Christ in human life, or are they using personality as building material in a kingdom of things?

The church must never forget that Christ came to preach good tidings to poor people, to strengthen and restore the weak and suffering, to bring liberty to those who have it not, and to bring human personality to its fullest and highest realization of life. If he succeeds in doing this the manifestation of himself in the life of humanity will be complete.

Have you heard of this Christ, who is one with the weak;
And the bound, and the bruised, and the poor, and the meek;
Who dwelleth alike in the Jew and the Greek?—
He's the Christ of mankind! He is one with all men!

May his words and his life be forever proclaimed,
Till the lonely, the sad, the distressed, and the maimed,
Shall be lifted to God; their lives all reclaimed,
By the love of this Christ who is one with all men!

Let the men in the streets, in the shops, and the mills,
On the seas, in the fields, on the mountains and hills;
Hear this news till the heart of humanity thrills,
With the knowledge of Christ who is one with all men!

Peal it out from the iron-tongued bell of your church,
That the pious who come there to pray, and thank God
That they are not as their neighbors, may hear and repent!
For their neighbor is Christ, and they don't know it yet!

VERSE

Eucharistia

"He took the cup and gave thanks."

O LAMB OF GOD, I silent stand
Before this mystery;
Thou gavest thanks with cup in hand,
For thine own agony!

O love unmeasured, love unknown!
How couldst thou thankful be,
To leave thy glory-circled throne,
To shed thy blood for me?

How shall I dare this cup to drain,
Unless it mean for me
A holy passion to be slain
To save a world with thee!

O blood of Christ, transform in me
This selfish heart of mine,
Till I shall wish my blood might be
A lost world's saving wine!

Lyric

MY house is much too small to entertain
The dark-browed Hate, but there's an upper room,
Next door to Love's, a chamber neat and plain,
And set with little pots of fragrant bloom,
That's ever ready held for Joy, or Mirth,
For Valor, Hope, or any other one
That Life delights to have a guest of earth—
For those who love the Muses and the sun.

The Social Gospel in Hyde Park

WE have heard much about the open air speeches and demonstrations in Hyde Park, London. They are unique in the freedom of their platforms both in the matter of the addresses and in the latitude of their personnel. They have been especially remarked upon in these hectic days in America when certain self-appointed guardians of men's minds and ideals have dubbed themselves "100 per cent American" and proceeded to censor all who with differing ideals and ideas dared to think of themselves as soundly patriotic Americans. In Hyde Park any one may get a license, take a box, set it up under police protection and proceed to speak his mind so long as he does not advocate crime. The English theory seems to be that steam is not dangerous so long as it is allowed free vent; when it is pent up under compulsion there is danger. So the gravel near the Marble Arch at the Oxford Road entrance to Hyde Park is an interesting place on almost any clear evening, but especially on Sunday afternoons and evenings. On special occasions great processions are formed on behalf of some cause, and thousands march out to hear the foremost orators and distinguished men of the realm argue the case.

The Demonstration for Social Christianity

Last Saturday afternoon such a processional and demonstration on behalf of the application of the gospel to social problems was held by church folk. It was organized by the Fellowship of Reconciliation but not to promote its peculiar tenets. In the parade, which formed at Bedford Square, church groups marched under banners and mottoes the full mile to the Marble Arch and on into the Common. Trucks were drawn up in a circle and seven speakers were assigned to each of seven impromptu truck platforms. The groups in the processional represented all church organizations—Catholic, Protestant, Episcopal high and broad, non-conformist of various brands and Dr. Orchard's new congregationalist catholic order. The speakers included several bishops, a number of equally prominent non-conformist clergymen, members of and candidates for parliament; on each platform also was one important labor leader. Each speaker was given ten minutes and thus one could go from platform to platform at ten minute periods and hear his various favorites.

Practically every one of the forty-nine speakers started with the same presupposition, namely, that our present social order is built fundamentally upon selfishness, in that possessions and profits and personal power are its dominating motives; it was argued that the present order would have to be transformed into the more Christian terms of service, "humanity first" and mutual help and good will, or it would destroy itself by forcing the dispossessed to revolution. No one seemed to doubt that revolution is inevitable in the industrial lands of Europe unless there is provided a more equitable distribution of wealth and profits and an unequivocal promise for industrial democracy. Naturally, various speakers differed in their temper and emphasis, but they did not differ in this fundamental conviction. One of the foremost scholars and religious educators in England, an Oxford dean, declared with prophetic passion that the present social order is already damned by its selfishness; he said that he prayed daily that Almighty God would put an end to it on behalf of something better. One of the foremost bishops of the Anglican church laid down in calm and logical discourse the principles of a new social order which carried with it a commendation of the things which Anglican bishops and English aristocrats have deemed radical and revolutionary. Indeed, the labor leaders were far from the most radical, though none surpassed them in the fire and zeal of his Christianity. In one thing all were agreed, and that was in their contempt for the prime minister's recent rebuke and demand that preachers let political and economic questions alone.

The Sunday Afternoon Meetings

On Sunday afternoon we went back to Hyde Park to attend the regular open air meetings. The crowds are not large in any one of these unorganized groups; indeed, these speaking places are rather just platforms where the advocates of this, that and the other idea hold forth; perhaps the advocate simply puts his hat on a post and begins to talk, his crowd gathering as it may from the passers-by. For instance, here is a "scientist" with a new system of meteorology; the newspapers and government bureaus will give him no attention, so he brings his charts to prove that he foretold weather when the government's weather bureau failed. There is a Roman Catholic stand where, during the entire afternoon, speaker succeeds speaker in proving to his or her own satisfaction that the Roman church is the only sure repository of truth and salvation. Over there is an earnest chap proclaiming, amid much heckling from the crowd, that truth and religion are from within oneself, that all parsons and popes must be abandoned, and that in a combined crusade on dope, drink, war and preachers is the true gospel to be found. By his side is a fine-looking gentleman preaching the evangelical gospel in tones that prove interesting to one with social ideals. Seeing Americans in his circle he soon has us up making prohibition talks. Still beyond are advocates of socialism on one hand and champions of the hard old Tory policies on the other, with a large man between trying to prove to a very lively group of workingmen, who seem to enjoy poking questions at him, that the economics of Ricardo are like the laws of physics in their inevitableness. Then there is a free religious association, a sort of Anglican church mission, an elderly gentleman making an exposition of a new theory of chemistry with a vital bearing upon health and—others.

The Significance of Such Meetings

In talking with social and religious workers we find that they do not attach much significance to these regular open air meetings. They look upon them as without grip or continuity and as ministering to curiosity more than to solid instruction. They are, of course, much weakened in their influence by cranks and men of one idea who have no regular platform and perforce take advantage of this one. The meetings, no doubt are a symbol rather than a force. Let it be granted that they do not do a permanent work of any kind, yet without doubt they do stand as symbols of that precious principle which must underlie all democracy, viz., freedom of speech and assemblage. The processional and organized demonstrations are tremendously significant. They call together thousands and sometimes tens of thousands, and with the great Albert Hall protest meetings oftentimes register a moral judgment that compels the attention of parliaments and electorates. The one is a sort of ragged fringe of the democracy, the other is the organized protest of a democracy's conscience.

Much more significant than the open air platforms of Hyde Park are such open forums as the one we were privileged to attend at Toynbee Hall, where we are living. Here in the crowded East End, there gather each Thursday night several hundred of the "neighbors." They are seated in an open court and are addressed by some invited speaker upon questions of the day. The brainiest of Britain's leaders come gladly to speak to these men from the shops and factories and the crowded tenements of Whitechapel. It seems to matter little what the chosen theme for discussion is, the speaking almost inevitably veers around to socialism, which is the favorite doctrine of the thinking section of these wage earners. There is a period for questions, then a series of short talks are given by members of the audience and this is followed by a summary and rejoinder by the speaker. The address is always constitutionalist and the hearers include communists, liberals, and other sorts. but the give and take of the meeting is thoroughly good natured. The government of England is much safer by upholding free speech and assemblage, and meeting radicals in honest, open argument than she would be by suppressing them and driving them into hate and subterranean activities.

British Table Talk

London, August 1, 1921.

WHILE there are many hopeful features in the present religious outlook, organized Christianity is confronted with a serious problem for which a solution must be found if the churches are to "carry on." There is a growing lack of candidates for the ministry, both Anglican and nonconformist. The number of ordinations in England last year was 158, and 161 in 1919. These figures are far below the pre-war average; in 1912, they were 626; in 1911, 640. On Trinity Sunday at Birmingham, a diocese containing a million people, only three deacons and two priests were ordained; and at Durham, with a population half as large again as that of Birmingham, there was only one deacon. It is estimated that the Church of England is 2,372 clergy short. The "Challenge" states that the supply of men from the public schools and the older universities is dwindling almost to nothing, while the "Christian World" points out that the shortage is as pronounced in the non-creedal churches as in those which demand subscription to a creed. The Bishop of London says: "I go to all the public schools in England, and I find that there is hardly a boy allowed by his parents to give his name for ordination, and a very few at the universities." In the Wesleyan connexion, the "Methodist Times" laments that "the more privileged sons of our church are sending few representatives into the ranks of the ministry. There are only three graduates among this year's candidates." The conference committee states that the shortage of young ministers and the growing practice of circuits inviting younger ministers to be superintendents have added considerably to the difficulties of stationing. Small stipends are partly but not wholly responsible for the present dearth. The headmaster of Eton, preaching in Westminster Abbey, said that an almost unbelievable change has come over the standard of clerical life since the days depicted by such novelists as Jane Austen and Peacock. No satirist now would suggest that a man took holy orders to secure a life of comfort and luxury. Today large numbers of the clergy live a life of poverty; no class in all our hard-pressed society is suffering more. One hears of a vicar who has given up his orders and started a greengrocer's shop in Oxford in order to provide for the needs of his family. Bishop Winnington-Ingram is aiming to raise the income of every beneficed clergyman in London to 400 pounds a year, with a house free of rent and rates. The "Guardian" expects little improvement until a definite scheme of assessment and pooling of resources is initiated from above. Such a practical application of Christian principles would not only benefit the poor clergy but make a great impression on the outside world. The Bishop of Salisbury advocates a more economical and scientific use of the clergy and the amalgamation of small parishes. He would supplement the regular clergy by "the permanent diaconate"—men who, while continuing their secular calling, would be authorized to conduct services, administer the chalice, and preach if licensed. There is a corresponding shortage in the foreign field. The Church Missionary Society reports unlimited opportunity but lack of men.

Anglican Progress

Apart from the shortage of clergymen, the church of England shows many signs of vitality and progress. Communicants at Easter, 1919, numbered 2,291,051, an increase of 38,418 over 1918. The figures for Sunday schools, Bible classes, and confirmation also show increases. Thus in Anglicanism as in nonconformity the decline in membership has been arrested. Financially, there are substantial increases in the contributions for home and foreign missions and philanthropic work. The summer session of the National Assembly was well attended, and the five days' proceedings were marked by much keenness and high resolves. The Assembly was composed of 704 members—38 bishops, 309 clergy, and 357 lay men and women. The able leadership and fine spirit of Archbishop Davidson greatly contributed to the success of the proceedings. Resolutions passed and decisions arrived at indicate a passion for reform. A scheme of free-will offerings was launched, every church member being asked to give systematically according to his or her means. The parochial councils have been invested with additional powers, making for the further democratization of the church. They will now have an effective voice in the selection of incumbents; they can take the initiative in proposing a particular clergyman, or, alternatively, petition the bishop if they disapprove of a patron's choice. A committee was appointed to inquire into the law and practice as to the patronage of benefices and—long a crying scandal—their sale and exchange. Parishioners now enjoy large rights of parochial self-government and are able to co-operate effectively with the clergy in the administration of church affairs and the promotion of the welfare of the parish. Bishop Temple points out that, as a result of the enabling act, the church of England has now reached the testing point. The real work of the church, he says, is done in the parishes, and the Parochial Church Council is the pivot of the new organization. Charged with the duty of considering what the church in the parish is and should be doing, "It should consider what, if any, demoralizing conditions exist, such as bad housing, degrading amusements, etc., and it should consider what action it may best take to remedy the evil. It should consider how far the various types of parishioners are brought into touch with the whole life of the church—men and women, boys and girls—and what fresh efforts are necessary, telling the priest of any who need his special care." Canon Peter Green says that if "plain parochial work" is neglected, the church will die from the roots upwards. There has been an immense development in the machinery of the church, what is now needed is a corresponding advance in spiritual life and power. Hence the urgent need for more ministers and also for the laity to help in the spiritualization of parish life. Proposals are under consideration for the enlargement of the Church House, Westminster, which is much too small for the many purposes for which it is required, and compares unfavorably with Free Church headquarters.

Women and the Church

The crusade for woman's right to minister in the church continues. Miss Royden personally presented to the National Assembly a petition signed by 2,539 communicant members, clerical and lay, of the church of England, asserting the principles of the catholic church as to the fundamental equality of baptized persons and repudiating the assertion that any Christian soul is considered, on the grounds of sex, incapable of receiving any Christian gift or grace, and urging that the Lambeth Conference resolutions on the ministrations of women in the church should be put into practice forthwith without limitations or hindrance. Logically, this claim includes the right of women to enter the priesthood, but this question is not yet a practical issue, though it certainly will become such at no distant date. The English Church Union has secured the signatures of 47,000 women communicants to a protest against the suggestion that women are capable of receiving the grace of holy orders and allowing women to preach or minister publicly in churches. Mrs. Sheppard has headed a deputation to the Bishop of London which expressed dismay and disappointment at his attitude to the lay ministrations of women, and urging him to allow duly qualified women to preach in consecrated buildings to mixed congregations in accordance with the Lambeth resolutions. At a discussion opened by Miss Royden at Chelmsford diocesan conference the majority of the speakers were against the admission of women to the priesthood, alleging that it would destroy all hopes of reunion and cause a great split in the church of England. In Canterbury convocation the bishops have defined the limits of women's work for the church in the southern province. Applicants, whose age must not be below twenty-five, may be licensed by a diocesan committee as (1) diocesan worker, to take part in parochial missions and other evangelistic work, and speak and pray in public—not at the regular services in consecrated buildings, but at services intended normally for women and children; (2) catechist, to work among children; or (3) parochial worker, to speak and pray in licensed and unconsecrated buildings and assist in parochial work. English Presbyterians are disposed to open the door to the ministry of women, and at the Primitive Methodist Conference the general secretary, answering a woman delegate said there was nothing in the constitution of the denomination to debar women from the ministry if they came in under the ordinary conditions of men. Woman's claim to equality of opportunity with man meets with increasing recognition in all spheres.

Bright Methodist Prospects

The one hundred and seventy-eighth "Yearly Conference of the People Called Methodists" has opened in Middlesborough with a brighter outlook than for long past. After a continuous decrease in membership for fourteen years, an increase of nearly 3,000 is reported this year; Sunday scholars have also increased in number and average attendance; and the conference proceedings show signs of growing activity, general expansion, and renewed zeal. The new president, Rev. J. A. Sharp, is a strong personality, bound to inspire all who come under his influence. Brought up in the church of England, he was for some years a working joiner. Always an ardent temperance reformer, the watchword of his presidency will be "The Church Against the Drink." In his presidential address he looked to the Puritan spirit to counteract the paganism of the times. The idea of God, he said, is being shouldered out of the life of the present day. The horrible records of the divorce court showed that the attempt to live apart from God brought sorrow, bitterness of heart, and disaster. Devotion to a Godlike ideal alone could save civilization. A long and spirited discussion on reunion with Primitive and United Methodists ended with the decision to take more time for consideration, the committee being instructed to present a complete scheme to next year's conference. Both the archbishops sent greetings to the conference, Dr. Lang writing: "My hope and prayer is that the day may come when the church of England and the Wesleyan church may find themselves partners in the one united church." The Archbishop of York personally presented the Lambeth proposals to the conference. Coming direct from the National Assembly, he wondered whether that in itself was an omen of things yet to be. Alluding to the world crisis he said that the only thing that could change the situation, fulfill high hopes, and remove the menace of great dangers was the arrival of some new spiritual power. How much more effective the church would be if not broken and divided. The Lambeth Appeal was not an ultimatum, it was a proposal from honest men who said their prayers and waited for God's guidance. "We don't want absorption," said the archbishop. "You can retain what is characteristic of you: how much I long that something of your spirit should be communicated to the church I represent, and I think we have gifts to give you. If you must keep your own life and organization for a time, keep them." To illustrate the great change that had taken place in the relationship of the churches, Sir Robert Perks told how as a boy he attended a parish church and heard the vicar say: If I saw the devil go across the churchyard with a Methodist on his back I would not say, "Stop, thief!" because the devil would only be taking away his own property!

Two Methodist Conferences

The Primitive Methodists and the United Methodists have also been in conference. The former report a membership of 206,085—a decrease of 287. Encouraging signs are not absent—e. g., wonderful progress in missionary work in Africa and broadening and deepening of missionary enthusiasm at home. The missionary income is larger than it has ever been.

A cordial welcome was given to the Lambeth Appeal, but it was made plain that Primitive Methodists could not accept reordination. The conference decided to take another year in which to consider the proposals for Methodist reunion and prepare an amended scheme. Whole-hearted approval was given to the League of Nations, the government being called upon to further the cause of world peace by making the league a reality. The United Methodist church has had to register a loss of 10,000 members in the last fourteen years, but it is hoped that the tide has turned. The foreign missionary income amounted to £32,448—an increase of nearly £2,000. In his presidential address, the Rev. William Treffey mentioned that in the Roman Catholic archdiocese of Liverpool over 63,000 children attend mass every Sunday morning. He pleaded for a teaching ministry. The application of the spirit of Jesus to the whole realm of life, individual and social, national and international, would solve our economic and social problems, end the Irish scandal, and vitalize the League of Nations.

The Offering and the Offertory

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Some time ago you told of the experiences of various churches in abolishing the intrusive collection plate, substituting a box in the vestibule. You wonder whether there is not a distinct loss in worship and ask if the offertory does not have a rightful place along with the communion and prayers.

It seems to me that even if the collection plate is not used an offertory is possible. Could not the offerings in the box be put in a suitable vessel (or the receptacle of the box be made removable) and, at the proper time, be brought into the chancel by the customary person or persons? Then the offertory would be said or sung, as is commonly done.

This would give the literalist more of an opportunity to keep the injunction of Matthew 5:23, 24.

The collection box could be developed into an artistic piece of furniture as the holy water founts of Roman churches have been. Such fitting mottoes as are in the offertory sentences of the Anglican communion office would supply appropriate decorative material.

What Do Our Readers Say?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: There are in our town two churches building. Never mind where the town is or what the churches are. They represent two of our great Protestant denominations of America. In each instance the pastor believes in industrial democracy and preaches it vigorously from his pulpit. Nevertheless the churches are being built by contractors who exclude union carpenters on the plea of open shop.

It so happens that my office has a friendly contact with the board of commerce. Naturally enough the union carpenters have approached us, because we represent in some sense the church life of the city, with the hope of bettering their situation in the case of these two churches. The carpenters contend that it is the bankers who are controlling the attitude of the contractors. They say that this is a device by which the financial powers hope to break the back of the Building Trades Council. What they want is the right to make their own arrangements with the contractors directly, without financial interference. To this end they hoped that we could get them a hearing before the board of commerce or some such representative body of employers.

We have a committee on the church and industry. This committee has given the proposition careful consideration. On pressing the issue we have discovered that the carpenters' union hopes to establish the principle of union shop in those building projects now being conducted on a so-called open shop basis. It is our opinion that an open shop which excludes union labor is really a closed non-union shop, and that a union shop which excludes non-union labor is really a closed shop. We feel therefore that until employer and employe are willing to negotiate on the basis of a real open shop or some other principle which may commend itself to both, it would be unfair to the churches to attempt to speak in behalf of either party.

This does not mean that either the principle of collective bargaining or the desirability of the open shop when agreed to by both parties is repudiated. It does mean that the church can find a basis of action only when justice and good-will are agreed upon as controlling motives by both parties at the outset. In other words, for us to be a party to an effort by which union carpenters should displace non-union men on specific jobs, seems to us un-Christian. On the other hand, we are equally clear that the open shop should be really open. We find ourselves between two competing forces neither of which proposes to yield an inch. The union claim that a union shop is really open by reason of the fact that any competent workman may join the union, seems to us specious. The discrimination on the part of employers against union men as union men seems to us unfair. There is what seems to be a deadlock. We seem powerless to help either side. We seem to come squarely up to a "No Thoroughfare" sign. Any attitude on the part of any group which is essentially selfish, the church clearly cannot sponsor.

One wonders whether we must not look down below this unyielding attitude of employers and employes and find some deeper foundation for good-will. In other words, may it not be that what Tawney calls the "acquisitive attitude" on the part of both capital and labor is a real barrier to any adequate Christianizing of the industrial order. A prophetic gospel in the pulpit and an unsocial practice in the building of new temples! Isn't such a situation utterly anomalous?

One cannot help looking back with wistful eyes to the mediæval period when the building of cathedrals was an act of religious devotion. How often nowadays is it the case that contractors and laborers are enthusiastically leagued together in the joyous task of erecting a temple to the living God? Must we of necessity build our edifices according to the selfish standards of the world and then transmute their material value by some spiritual hocus pocus into sanctuaries of the Most High? The whole situation is distressing to an honest man. We must face facts. We must realize that we live in a real world. We must not let our ideals run too far ahead of us. But of what value is it to preach social justice when on our own building lots we have economic warfare?

I have simply tried to present a problem. Doubtless others are facing it. Have you any counsel?

Newton on Cadman

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Allow me to express my hearty appreciation of Dr. Newton's series of estimates of living preachers. They should be published in book form after revision. For instance, the article on Dr. Cadman hardly does justice to his literary style. Dr. Newton mentions only his latest volume, "Ambassadors of God," but at least two of his other books deserve more than passing mention because they are searching analyses of men and movements, from the standpoint of a preacher whose all-round scholarship is only exceeded by his spiritual grasp of the fundamental verities. These two books are "Charles Darwin and Other English Thinkers" and "The Three Religious Leaders of Oxford and Their Movements."

I have read and reviewed all three of them in leading periodicals and agree with the criticisms of them by the London Times, The Nation, the Hibbert Journal and our dailies, weeklies and monthlies. With no exception, they are unanimous in appreciation and even eulogy. Of the "Ambassadors of God," Dr. W. L. Watkinson of London wrote, "Another book on preaching will not be needed for fifty years to come." It is learned, cogent, excellently arranged and considers all the elements of our complex situation with clear insight, intense conviction and directness of purpose.

Perhaps Dr. Newton's peculiar temperament and training are hardly conducive towards an adequate appraisal of the high philosophical and theological character of Dr. Cadman's writings. A cataract of words consists of close argument, illustrations from history and stirring appeal, compelling his readers to follow his line of thought with concentrated attention.

His style is anything but "cumbersome." It rather represents the best traditions of the English language, and imparts to religious literature a dignity and authority, sadly lacking in many popular books of "thin religious sentiment," justly decried by Phillips Brooks, and to offset which your own paper is doing such healthy and timely work. Preachers, especially the younger men, would do well to make a diligent study of Dr. Cadman's books, especially the "Ambassadors of God."

Just What is the Disciples' Position?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have read with interest the article of Rev. W. J. Lhamon in your issue of July 21, on "The Church and Its Bible," with much of which I am in hearty accord. Its warning against legalism, even as applied to the movement of the Disciples is not without justification in certain facts and tendencies in our history. Every true friend of the cause we plead ought to be willing to recognize and seek to remedy any mistakes or evil tendencies that threaten to injure its influence or pervert the truths we are seeking to emphasize.

But in my judgment Mr. Lhamon has greatly lessened the influence of his article for good on the people to whom it is especially directed, by an unfair statement of their position as regards the subject of Christian baptism—a statement which perhaps not one of them would accept. Mr. Lhamon calls it "sacramentalism." But not a single representative man among them will accept that characterization of their position on that subject. His criticism, therefore, will fail to reach them. If I were going to write a criticism on, say the Roman Catholic church, I should first seek an authentic or representative statement of their position, and direct my criticism against that. Otherwise I would be beating the air. The phrase, "immersion-baptism" is equally offensive, and wholly unjustified by the definition of baptism which he quotes and accepts from Dr. Schaff. If immersion be "the original, normal form of baptism," as this learned pedobaptist declares, why speak of "immersion-baptism" more than of a belief-faith, or a turn-about conversion?

In referring to the difference which he thinks threatens to "force another cleavage" among the Disciples he describes the position of the majority of this body by declaring that, in addition to their original confession of faith they have now added in substance this: "And I believe, with all my heart, in the traditional practice of a majority of the churches of Disciples, infallibly based on their infallible interpretation of the infallible book!" Would any member in good standing among us accept that addition to the confession of faith by Simon Peter, as a part of their creed? Certainly not, as no one knows better than Mr. Lhamon. But he would say, "That is implied in what they have said and done." But this is only the "infallible interpretation" of Mr. Lhamon based on an "infallible" understanding of all the facts, as against that of tens of thousands of his brethren including the fathers of this Reformation. Why does our brother apply the term "infallible" to our position concerning baptism, and not to our insistence upon the confession of faith in Jesus, as the Son of God? Thousands of professing Christians, as honest as we are, no doubt, do not accept that confession of faith in the sense in which we believe it, and millions of Christians do not accept it as a sufficient creed or confession of faith. Yet we still insist on it as a divine and all-sufficient confession of faith. Is this putting our "infallible interpretation" upon an "infallible book?" If not, why not? Are there not a few things we can stand for without laying claim to infallibility?

I am not arguing here for the correctness or finality of the view of baptism held by a majority of the Disciples. I am simply pleading for a fair statement of their position by those who would criticise it. This Mr. Lhamon has not given. If I were asked to state their position on that subject, I should say that, substantially it is this: The Disciples as a body hold that their acceptance of Jesus, the Christ, as Lord, in the "good confession," involves obedience to his commandments, and teaching, including the observance of the two ordinances which he gave to his disciples—baptism and the Lord's supper—the latter symbolizing his death for our sins, and the former his burial and resurrection from the dead; that these are fundamental facts of the gospel, and that the two institutions bearing testimony to them should be perpetuated in the church, as Christ no doubt intended they should be; that baptism, being a personal commitment of the penitent believer to Christ, in which he receives assurance of forgiveness and of discipleship was of old and is yet a condition of membership in Christ's body, which is the church. It is not held by them that those attaching a different meaning and place to baptism are non-Christian, nor is this difference in understanding a bar to co-operation with them in all great enterprises in behalf of the common cause. They do hold, however, that those who so understand the place and meaning of Christ's ordinances should practice accordingly.

Mr. Lhamon, if I understand him, accepts this original meaning and place of baptism, but thinks that this view and practice of baptism should be waived in the case of believers in Christ who have a different understanding of this ordinance; that we ought to do this in the interest of Christian union, and that indeed loyalty to our confession of faith requires such modification of our practice, to adapt it to all classes of believers. While he does not say so, I take it that he would favor receiving our good Quaker friends who discard baptism altogether, but who believe in Christ. In other words, our brother believes that, since it is faith in the personal Christ that begets the spirit of obedience, no external form of obedience ought to stand in the way of a believer's admittance to the church, even though such external form be in harmony with New Testament teaching and practice.

I have tried to give a perfectly fair statement of the two positions, the difference between which, Mr. Lhamon thinks, "threatens another cleavage" among us. It need not produce another "cleavage" if approached in the spirit of Christ, and with a supreme desire to know and do his will, and to "keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." Nothing should be said or done hastily or in a partisan spirit. Caricature of each other's position gets us nowhere. Only a careful consideration of the whole subject in the light of New Testament teaching and precedent is likely to lead to conclusions that will bear the test of time and experience. Of course our conception of the New Testament, as to whether its writings possessed authority only for the generation in which they were produced, or whether they were intended to be a guide and inspiration for the church of all ages, will have much to do in shaping our conclusions. Fundamentally it is a question of what is involved in loyalty to Jesus Christ as head of the church, on the part of our local congregations. On its practical side it will raise such questions as: What would be the effect on the pedobaptist world of such modifications of our practice? Would they not regard it as a triumph of their view of the ordinance, or as a plan for winning proselytes from their ranks? Of course it would erect a new barrier between us and the great Baptist family, which has stood so long and so faithfully by their convictions of New Testament teaching on this subject, and between whom and the Disciples there is a growing sense of brotherhood. We need not mention the effect of such action on the Disciples themselves in their present state of mind on the subject.

Those who have studied the subject of Christian union very carefully know that baptism is not the chief obstacle to such unity. The denominational spirit which lies back of all our differences, and which we believe is diminishing, though yet powerful, is the Himalaya among the lesser peaks which separate God's people. It is all the more formidable because it is not recognized as evil by those who are most under its influence. We must be patient, and trust to spiritual growth, under providential guidance to solve the problem.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Missionary Urge of the Gospel

THERE is a deep undercurrent in these lessons—have you felt it? Strong and constant there is the missionary urge. Onward, outward, on and on it pulls. Paul, who is sensitive to the leading of the Spirit, follows this holy impulse. Mark that word, "sensitive"—it is chosen carefully. We often wonder how the Spirit directed these early men. While we do not deny the miraculous, we do not seek the miraculous. Only the word "miracle" can cover the resurrection. Other miracles occurred. When we meet them we acknowledge them with joy, glorying in the power and purpose of Almighty God. However, we do not take that short cut when it is unnecessary. When you depend upon miracles you get out of the way of employing the good and regular laws which God constantly honors to carry out his will. Did it ever occur to you that God is even more in a regular law than in a miracle? Which requires the most power and will, to hold the sun in the heavens for an hour or so, or to cause the sun to sweep regularly around its vast orbit with such perfect regularity that clocks may be set by its movements? Which requires the most purpose and power, to turn a few jars of water into wine, suddenly, or to cause the vineyards upon a thousand hills for ten thousand years to yield regularly the purple cluster and the rich, refreshing fluid? There is only one answer. When with all your heart you believe in God, all the rest becomes merely a matter of just how he works. It is God at work all the time and his supreme arm is upholding the universe.

Did the Holy Spirit go out of business with the apostolic age? Did he cease to guide men when the last great apostle lay down to rest? We do not think so. Give all the value you will to the written record; lift to its highest place your blessed Bible and we will follow you all the way, but we simply do not believe that all of God's revelation is wrapt up in those pages. God is bigger than the Bible. The Bible is a sure guide. Its records are unique and priceless. We always square our findings by its rules and especially by the Spirit of Jesus, but to say that we must limit all of our knowledge of the Father to that book would be like a boy limiting his relations to his living father to a series of letters that he received from that father while he was in college. God is alive and working. Jesus is alive and working with his Father, the Holy Spirit is abroad in the world striving with men and leading those who will be led into ever higher and more useful ways. To deny this would be like denying God. If you say that it is not so, you may only be confessing that it has never been so for you and that is all.

Now Paul and his companions were led by the Spirit. This glorious gospel may easily be abused. Ignorant men may fancy that they are led by God when they are only impelled by lower motives. But will you deny the direct power of the Spirit to such men as Judson, Brooks, Beecher, Paton, Livingstone, Moody or Spurgeon?

Did you ever have this experience: A great decision was before you. Your own mind seemed incapable of reaching a conclusion. Your friends did not agree. Then you went into the silence, you opened up your soul to God, you put aside any selfish motives, you prayed with all your heart and soul, then you waited and the whole matter seemed to clear and a way seemed to open which in after years you knew to be God's leading. Did you never rise from your knees with a glowing soul, with a mighty new resolve and with a new power to do what God had given you to perform? "Thy will be done"—it is, among other things, a missionary will. God opened the door into Europe—what a tremendous opportunity! The ways into other Asia Minor cities seemed barred, but the Holy Spirit impressed upon the sensitive soul of Paul the will of God that he should cross into Europe. Athens, Corinth, Rome, Spain—the new world, the following of the westward trend of the star of empire—the salvation of the Gauls, Britons and Saxons—all this and more lay behind this supreme decision. O, for sensitized souls—like perfect films.

THE DIRECTION OF HUMAN EVOLUTION. By Edwin Grant Conklin. The thinking man who considers the long line of man's ascent, his present successes and failures, and the millions of years yet to come to this earth, must some time or other ask himself, "What next?" Will man go on living as long as the earth lives or will he be thrown into the discard and be replaced by some other animal more capable of meeting new and unforeseen conditions?

To those who dislike the idea of man as a biologic failure Professor Conklin gives pleasant reassurance. He shows that the human race has improved but little in the last 20,000 years, and probably none in the last 5,000. He produces evidences in favor of the stand that man has reached a maximum of specialization, and finally concludes that "there is no probability that a higher animal than man will ever appear on the earth." However, in order to guard against the criticism of those who place a greater reliance in the fossils than he does, he makes the supplementary conclusion that if such an animal does come into existence he will be a descendant of present-day man. Since even the paleontologist believes that, the conclusions are safe one way or the other. But in either case it is plain that all man has to work with and to look up to is man; however much we may belittle humanity, wail over its imperfections, or curse its iniquities, it is to this same humanity that we must look for progress if progress there is to be.

But again Professor Conklin reassures. The fact that biological evolution can do little more for man does not mean that social evolution has come to a standstill. Man is just beginning to evolve efficiently in a social way, and his beginnings promise well. The breaking down of social barriers, the intermingling of various races, and the increase, however spasmodic and uncertain, of human cooperation, seem to offer the greatest promise for man's advancement. Professor Conklin is sure that "within the next five or ten thousand years at most" there will be an intimate commingling of all human types. This commingling, with the resulting combinations and recombinations of characters, will give humanity a diversity that it has never known before, and in the opinion of Professor Conklin, this diversity is much to be desired.

So far as the book deals with biological phases of human evolution it is both valuable and interesting. But the treatment of social evolution, and the biological foundations of society, and human beliefs, are far less clear and worth while. Professor Conklin speaks of "freedom of nations and races" rather than freedom of individuals as the "biological ideal of freedom," and attempts to prove his point by a far-fetched analogy to cells in the human body. The discussion of biology in relation to religion contains almost nothing that is new, and little that shows progressive thought. But the statement that the law of entail, under which civilization has struggled so long, is aristocratic, while the law of Mendel, a law of nature, is democratic, promises much. Professor Conklin does not deny that there are millions of people of inferior mental capabilities; he has proved that in the first part of his book. But he does deny that any aristocratic form of government, whether benevolent or otherwise, or any ready-made form of genetics, can do much to better conditions. He believes that progress is a job for everyone, and until everyone accepts his share of the work little can be accomplished.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Methodists Will Observe an Important Anniversary

The one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the arrival in this country of Francis Asbury will be celebrated by Methodists throughout the land on October 27. Asbury was consecrated as a general superintendent by John Wesley, and given full power to represent the new movement in America. Methodism has nowhere in the world come to such size and power as in this country, and it would seem that part of the credit for this achievement is due to the life and labors of this great leader.

Knights of Columbus Plan Work in Italy

Following the expressed wish of the pope, the Knights of Columbus in their recent meeting in California voted a million dollars with which to inaugurate work in Italy of a social service character. It is denied that this is a counter movement to Methodism in Rome, but the denial is not convincing to all. Catholic churches were slow in developing the social service devices of the Christian associations, but this new work of the Knights of Columbus is a beginning.

President Does Not Play Sunday Golf

The press recently announced that President Harding does not play Sunday golf. This deference to the Sunday customs of America has aroused throughout the country a great deal of favorable comment. Third Presbyterian church of Chicago recently took a rising vote of its membership on a proposition to send the President a telegram of congratulation. The minister, Rev. Charles S. Stevens, in his sermon said: "President Harding by his refusal to join his 'golf cabinet' on the links on Sundays has set a good example for the American people to follow. He has shown that he believes in remembering the Sabbath day to keep it holy."

Church Workers' Conference a Great Success

The Episcopalians of the middle west were interested in a conference for church workers which was opened in Racine, Wis., July 12. The weather was so hot that the classes and lectures were held out of doors, but this did not in any way diminish the enrollment. The attendance grew from 250 at the opening to over 300. Religious education was stressed in the conference and experts were brought in from various cities. Among these were Rev. Charles H. Boynton, Rev. Victor Hoag, Miss Vera Noyes and Rev. R. S. Chambers. Dean Lutkin of Northwestern University attended the conference, and a choir under his direction sang a mass.

School Requires Professors to Be Evangelists

New requirements have been made for the professors in Southwestern Theological Seminary of Ft. Worth. In addition to their teaching duties they will be required to hold two series of evangelistic meetings in Baptist churches each year. Thus professors will be required to test out their theories in practice. The notion that the preaching should all be evangelistic is inadequate, but the Watchman-Examiner is quite right in suggesting that "It would do professors good to make some application of their own teaching. In some instances it would be pretty hard on the churches, but it would help the professors every time."

Dr. R. J. Campbell Honored in San Francisco

Dr. R. J. Campbell, the well-known British preacher, is in San Francisco this summer filling the pulpit of First Congregational church. A banquet was held in his honor recently which was attended by many eminent Episcopalians and Congregationalists, the occasion being characterized by a fine spirit of comity. Bishop Nichols of the Episcopal church confessed that he had been the "broker" to arrange the connection between the church and the minister. Dr. Campbell spoke in his happiest vein, and devoted his remarks to the question of friendship between Great Britain and the United States. He assured his audience that Great Britain had the greatest esteem for the people and the government of the United States.

Brave Rector Fights Race Prejudice

Rev. Philip S. Irwin, archdeacon of the Episcopal church and head of the work of the Episcopal church among South Florida Negroes, was recently carried out into the woods, whipped on his bare back, and covered with tar and feathers. He is a white man and had been accused of preaching race equality. The Dade county grand jury is making an investigation of the outrage, and the point of view of the community is shown by the instructions given by the judge, who asserts that while the constitution guarantees the right of free speech, this right must be "exercised in harmony with the time-honored traditions of a people." Though given forty-eight hours to leave town, Mr. Irwin remained at his task to face his calumniators. Bishop Mann was sent for at once. He came to Miami and investigated the charges against the rector. He found Mr. Irwin altogether guiltless of the alleged utterances for which Mr. Irwin was flogged. The bishop gave a statement to the public press and made an appeal to the mayor. The mayor agreed to give temporary protection, but could give no assurances of continued protection. In view of the advice of the leading citizens of Miami that the priest leave town, the bishop at last decided to transfer him, as a measure to protect his life. The local branch of the American Legion had brought definite information that the priest was to be lynched. The bishop asked the town for funds to transport the priest who had been so unjustly handled, but no funds were forthcoming, so he gave his own note at the bank for five hundred dollars. The whole incident reflects the state of intelligence that prevails in some of the more benighted communities of the southland and indicates that the race question is a problem of the white man far more than it is a problem of the black.

Celebrations of Eddy Centenary

Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy regarded birthdays as illusory. On account of this fact there were divided counsels among the leading Scientists of the country over the propriety of observing the centenary of the birth of Mrs. Eddy. In spite of this difference of opinion, there were celebrations in a number of cities. At Bow, N. H., the birthplace of the religious teacher, there was a celebration in which the governor was on the program. On the birthday, Mrs. Augusta E. Stetson of New York printed a full page advertisement setting forth her tribute to Mrs. Eddy. Mrs. Stetson is the independent leader who has made much trouble for the authorities of the church. In her advertisement she makes the following astonishing statement with regard to the place of Mrs. Eddy among the spiritual forces of the universe: "Again I affirm, what was possible for Jesus Christ, the masculine representative of the fatherhood of God, is possible for Mary Baker Eddy, the feminine representative of the motherhood of God; and for anyone to deny her the ability to demonstrate Christ's teaching which she promulgated in 'Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures' and her other writings, is evidence of the so-called carnal mind which has always resisted the law of God, eternal life." From these utterances it would seem as if the Trinity is about to be enlarged by the admission of a new person.

Second Ordained Woman Passes Away

The idea of women entering the pulpit and preaching is not so modern as some may think it. Not long since, the second woman to be ordained in the United States passed away. Rev. Phoebe A. Hanaford was a member of the Universalist denomination and was ordained in 1868. She held pastorates in Newport, Jersey City and New Haven. She retired from the ministry in 1891, and died at the age of 92. At the time of her ordination it was said that she was the fourth woman minister to be ordained in the history of the world.

Baptist Creed-Maker Is Named

During all the discussions of the "million dollar creed" at the Northern Baptist Convention, the donor of the conditional million and three-quarters dollars to the Home Missionary Society was unnamed. The cat is out of the bag now, however, and in spite of the wishes of the California capitalist, it is now known that the money was offered by M. C. Treat of Pasadena.

Methodist Protestants Getting Wise About Revivalism

The reports of trail-hitters at the various evangelistic meetings over the country no longer dazzle the eyes of religious leaders as they once did. The Methodist Protestant in telling the story of a certain popular evangelist and his work comes to this bit of homely philosophy about the whole matter. It says: "It is the fish you string who help the church and whom the church helps. It is hardly true that you can have a hundred conversions and but twenty-five receptions. You must be counting the nibbles."

Federal Council Congratulates President Harding

When the Federal Council of Churches, along with the National Catholic Welfare Council, designated June 5 as Disarmament Sunday, they urged President Harding to call a conference of the nations on disarmament. Inasmuch as the President has seen fit to call such a conference, the religious leaders of the country are naturally greatly pleased. Dr. Robert E. Speer, president of the Federal Council, has sent to President Harding a letter. From this the following sentences are taken: "The Federal Council of the Church of Christ in America, through its Commission on International Justice and Good-will, desires to express to you its profound satisfaction in your invitation to other nations to join in a conference on the limitation of armaments. We rejoice in the step thus taken and earnestly hope that it may lead to some concerted plan by which general disarmament may be brought about. We are convinced that this action would be of incalculable significance, in making larger funds available for the constructive tasks of peace, in removing suspicion and misunderstanding among the nations, in abolishing war and in promoting international goodwill and brotherhood."

Gasoline Road to Church Achievement

A list of the methods employed by indigent churches for the raising of church funds would be a long and interesting one. The Men's Club of the Episcopal church of Waycross, Ga., recently heard an address from their new rector, Rev. E. W. Halleck, on the activities of men's clubs in Louisville. The men of Waycross were "inspired" to proceed at once to raise funds for the erection of a parish house. They propose to erect a gasoline filling station on a vacant lot held by the church, and from the profits of this station to secure funds to be used in the erection of the new parish house. This may be a bit unusual but at least it is a big improvement on the church fair.

Where Pennsylvania's Money Went

Twenty-one states of America provide for constitutional prohibition of the giving of state funds to institutions that are privately directed. Fifteen others make an exception to this rule in favor of institutions that care for children and defectives who would otherwise become wards of the state. In Pennsylvania the chief justice of the supreme court has recently written a decision which will have a far-reaching effect in respect to this question. His opinion prohibits the giving of state aid to sectarian institutions in Pennsylvania. How this money has been going in the past is in some measure indicated by the following proposed figures for the coming year, appropriations which are now made illegal: "Protestant institutions, $183,500; Jewish institutions, $220,000; Catholic institutions, $1,680,000." It will be seen at a glance that through the well-known ability of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics in political manipulation, they have been able to secure a share of the state funds entirely disproportionate to the church's strength in the state.

Hits at Jazz Music in the Sunday School

Prof. H. Augustine Smith led the singing at the recent meeting of the Ohio Sunday School Association. He spoke at a banquet on music in the Sunday School and struck straight out against the jazz music which for many years has been supposed to be the kind of music children like. In the course of his address he named ten hymns which he thought should be sung in all denominations, and which should be learned by all Sunday school children. These are: "Faith of Our Fathers," "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God," "Dear Lord and Master of Mankind," "O Master Let Me Walk With Thee," "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," "In the Cross of Christ I Glory," "Stand Up, Stand Up for Jesus," "Onward Christian Soldiers," "Christian

Labor Sunday Is At Hand

LABOR Sunday this year assumes an importance in the ecclesiastical year which it has seldom had. The widespread unemployment with the practical certainty that the country is approaching a winter fraught with suffering and unhappiness makes the appeal of the Commission on the Church and Social Service one of peculiar timeliness.

The commission wisely restricts the field of discussion on Labor Sunday in these words: "When the pulpit speaks on human relations in industry it is not undertaking to advise the engineer or manager about the technique of management or machine process. It is simply trying to apply its gospel to the relationships between men in the working world. It cannot be too strongly asserted that the preacher has a specialty as well as the engineer. Machinery, buying, selling, finance—these are matters of which he has only incidental knowledge. But relations of persons to one another constitute a moral and religious question, and so lie inevitably in the preacher's field."

Strong emphasis will be given this year to the idea of industrial democracy. The idea that any employer may be an irresponsible despot is declared to be quite out of harmony with the political democracy under which the nation is at the present time living. In this connection the commission says: "In an industrial age there can be no real brotherhood of man unless there is brotherhood in industry. Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., has put the matter well: 'Surely it is not consistent for us as Americans to demand democracy in government and practice autocracy in industry.' Of similar import is the recent statement of one of the foremost labor leaders that to political citizenship must now be added industrial citizenship. Political democracy leads to industrial democracy because a nation trained in school and church and state to democratic relationships will inevitably carry these same principles into industry. The growing sense of manhood and responsibility in the workers tends in the same direction. There can no longer be satisfactory relationships under an autocratic shop rule, any more than in an autocratic state. Arbitrary control leads to class war, which is as contrary to Christian principles as any other war."

One of the big ideas involved in the present reform of industry is that the manufacturer and business man has the same obligation to the public as the professional man. In this connection the commission says: "Of course business cannot be run without an adequate financial return. The services of physicians, teachers and even of ministers, require compensation. But the primary motive in these professions is assumed to be service. A Christian society will try to put business under the same motive; it will purge itself of all ruinous competition and substitute for it a cooperation that preserves initiative, and all the stimulus of competitive enterprise without its war-like methods. The Kingdom of God is builded through service and sacrifice; it cannot be builded out of selfishness and with the motive of profit dominating, nor can it ever be builded apart from the daily activities of men."

It has of late been often objected that all the preachment on the industrial question has been directed to the employers. No human disagreement is ever altogether one-sided. That employes sometimes practice sabotage on industry, shirk their rightful responsibilities, organize factional disturbances out of mere caprice is well known to those who study industry first-handed instead of in books. In this connection the words of the commission may have an application: "Let the church keep the comprehensive social point of view. It is not and cannot be partisan. It is, and should be, the shepherd of all; rich and poor, radical and conservative, employer and employed. Class distinctions or conflicting selfish interests have no permanent place in the kingdom of God. The church may find itself, in the defence of right relations, temporarily supporting the claims of a particular individual or group, but it is not, and cannot be, partisan. Its platform is the sermon on the mount. Its function is to promote good will and to secure social justice."

Dost Thou See Them" and "Blest Be the Tie That Binds."

America Has a Tower of Pisa

The celebrated leaning tower of Pisa is one of the objects of interest to the people who tour Italy. Not so pronounced is the leaning of the tower of New Old South church of Boston. Nevertheless it does lean, and the angle of its inclination is growing greater from year to year. Whether this will eventually endanger the building is not stated. Meanwhile the tower of the old historic building in which the congregation once worshipped stands straight and true. What a chance there is for the opponents of the new theology to draw a parable from this curious circumstance!

Poet of Italy Espouses the Christian Faith

The American Bible Society has a fresh case in hand to support its contention that the Bible is an evangelistic agency. In Italy is a poet by the name of Giovanni Papini, who all his life long had an aversion to religion. The war bowled him over, as it did so many others, and he began to seek an explanation of the mystery of life. After reading vainly in history and philosophy he took up the New Testament. The reading of this neglected document converted him to the Christian religion and he now devotes his talented pen to the furtherance of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Orthodox Church Circulates Tracts

Nearly every kind of fad religion has gotten on with the aid of a system of tracts but this method of disseminating religious truth has not been very effectively used by the orthodox churches. Rev. A. Reilly Copeland, pastor of Central Presbyterian church of Denton, Texas, now has a large selection of tracts at work in his section of Texas, and a layman is in charge of the distribution. Literature bags with thirty pockets each are placed in popular places through the city. The announcements of the local church are upon the literature.

"The Order of the Golden Lilies"

The Publicity Bureau of the Y. W. C. A. reports a unique organization of women that is being formed in America as a branch of the American Women's Legion. The new organization is called "The Order of the Golden Lilies." The members of the new organization are those who now have relatives buried in France and who intend to leave the bodies of these relatives where they now rest. The new organization asserts that the government will take better care of those graves and for a longer time than would be given to graves in the homeland. The example of the Roosevelt family in leaving the body of Quentin Roosevelt in France is quoted.

Veteran Minister Cared for By His Church

Central Christian church of Lexington, Ky., has voted to make Dr. I. J. Spencer pastor emeritus. The state of Dr. Spencer's health has greatly interfered with his work the past year, and this gracious act of the congregation will relieve him from active pastoral duties while making adequate provision for his needs. For the first year his full salary will be paid, and after that the retiring salary will be two-thirds the amount he is now receiving. Should Mrs. Spencer survive him, she will receive one-half this latter amount. Dr. Spencer will be set free to engage in such occasional forms of Christian service as he may have the strength for. He will hold evangelistic meetings at times, write for the religious press, and in other ways promote the general cause of religion in the church.

Dr. Conwell Has Lived His Philosophy

Dr. Russell H. Conwell, pastor of Baptist Temple in Philadelphia, has lived his own philosophy of life. He has never depreciated the power of money as a force for accomplishing good in the world, but has on many occasions dealt hard blows to the miser. His lecture, "Acres of Diamonds," has been a home-ly appeal to the man in every community to find right around him the sources of wealth and power. The diamonds are in your own back yard. Dr. Conwell has been so interested in riches that he has carried on a study of some of the rich men of the world. He asserts that of 4,043 millionaires studied, 3,708 began life without a dollar. He also asserts that according to statistics compiled in Massachusetts, only one rich man's son in 117 ever dies rich. Dr. Conwell has had an income for many years of fifty thousand dollars a year, which is probably not equaled by very many American preachers. At the end of each month he pays his debts, balances his books and gives away the balance, whatever that happens to be.

How Shall I Get Ready to Preach?

A church college gives religious training a state school may not give. A state university gives a broader and more thorough training than the average church college can give.

At the Bible College of Missouri a student obtains an intensive religious training while getting the educational benefits of the University of Missouri. Attending both schools at once, he combines the merits of both.

Ministerial students earn their way preaching for near-by churches.

A Startling Memory Feat That You Can Do

How I learned the secret in one evening. It has helped me every day

WHEN my old friend Faulkner invited me to a dinner party at his house, I little thought it would be the direct means of getting me a one-hundred-and-fifty per cent. increase in salary. Yet it was, and here is the way it all came about.

Toward the close of the evening things began to drag a bit, as they often do at parties. Finally some one suggested the old idea of having every one do a "stunt." Some sang, others forced weird sounds out of the piano, recited, told stories, and so on.

Then it came to MacDonald's turn. He was a quiet sort of chap, with an air about him that reminded one of the old saying that "still waters run deep." He said he had a simple "stunt" which he hoped we would like. He selected me to assist him. First he asked to be blindfolded securely to prove there was no trickery in it. Those present were to call out twenty-five numbers of three figures each, such as 161, 249, and so on. He asked me to write down the numbers as they were called.

This was done. MacDonald then astounded everyone by repeating the entire list of twenty-five numbers backwards and forwards. Then he asked people to request numbers by positions, such as the eighth number called, the fourth number, and so on. Instantly he repeated back the exact number in the position called. He did this with the entire list—over and over again, without making a single mistake.

Then MacDonald asked that a pack of cards be shuffled and called out to him in their order. This was done. Still blindfolded, he instantly named the cards in their order backwards and forwards. And then, to further amaze us, he gave us the number of any card counting from the top, or the card for any number.

You may well imagine our amazement at MacDonald's remarkable feat. You naturally expect to see a thing of this sort on the stage, and even then you look upon it as a trick. But to see it done by an everyday business man, in plain view of every one, blindfolded and under conditions which make trickery impossible, is astonishing, to say the least.

ON the way home that night I asked MacDonald how it was done. He said there was really nothing to it—simply a memory feat, the key to which anyone could easily learn in one evening. Then he told me that the reason most people have bad memories is because they leave memory development to chance. Anyone could do what he had done, and develop a good memory, he said, by following a few simple rules. And then he told me exactly how to do it. At the time I little thought that evening would prove to be one of the most eventful in my life, but such it proved to be.

What MacDonald told me I took to heart. In one evening I made remarkable strides toward improving my memory and it was but a question of days before I learned to do exactly what he had done. At first I amused myself with my new-found ability by amazing people at parties. My "memory-feat," as my friends called it, surely made a hit. Every one was talking about it, and I was showered with invitations for all sorts of affairs. If any one were to ask me how quickly to develop social popularity, I would tell him to learn my memory "feat"—but that is apart from what I want to tell you.

The most gratifying thing about the improvement of my memory was the remarkable way it helped me in business. Much to my surprise I discovered that my memory training had literally put a razor edge on my brain. My brain had become clearer, quicker, keener. I felt that I was fast acquiring that mental grasp and alertness I had so often admired in men who were spoken of as "wonders" and "geniuses."

The next thing I noticed was a marked improvement in my conversational powers. Formerly my talk was halting and disconnected. I never could think of things to say until the conversation was over. And then, when it was too late, I would always think of apt and striking things I "might have said." But now I can think like a flash. When I am talking I never have to hesitate for the right word, the right expression or the right thing to say. It seems that all I have to do is to start to talk and instantly I find myself saying the very thing I want to say to make the greatest impression on people.

It wasn't long before my new-found ability to remember things and to say the right thing at the right time attracted the attention of our president. He got in the habit of calling me in whenever he wanted facts about the business. As he expressed himself to me, "You can always tell me instantly what I want to know, while the other fellows annoy me by dodging out of the office and saying 'I'll look it up.'"

I FOUND that my ability to remember helped me wonderfully in dealing with other people, particularly in committee meetings. When a discussion opens up the man who can back up his statements quickly with a string of definite facts and figures usually dominates the others. Time and again I have won people to my way of thinking simply because I could instantly recall facts and figures. While I'm proud of my triumphs in this respect, I often feel sorry for the ill-at-ease look of the other men who cannot hold up their end in the argument because they cannot recall facts instantly. It seems as though I never forget anything. Every fact I now put in my mind is as clear and as easy to recall instantly as though it were written before me in plain black and white.

We all hear a lot about the importance of sound judgment. People who ought to know say that a man cannot begin to exercise sound judgment until he is forty to fifty years of age. But I have disproved all that. I have found that sound judgment is nothing more than the ability to weigh and judge facts in their relation to each other. Memory is the basis of sound judgment. I am only thirty-two but many times I have been complimented on having the judgment of a man of forty-five. I take no personal credit for this—it is all due to the way I trained my memory.

THESE are only a few of the hundreds of ways I have profited by my trained memory. No longer do I suffer the humiliation of meeting men I know and not being able to recall their names. The moment I see a man his name flashes to my mind, together with a string of facts about him. I always liked to read, but usually forgot most of it. Now I find it easy to recall what I have read. Another surprising thing is that I can now master a subject in considerably less time than before. Price lists, market quotations, data of all kinds, I can recall in detail almost at will. I rarely make a mistake.

My vocabulary, too, has increased wonderfully. Whenever I see a striking word or expression, I memorize it and use it in my dictation or conversation. This has put a remarkable sparkle and pulling power into my conversation and business letters. And the remarkable part of it all is that I can now do my day's work quicker and with much less effort, simply because my mind works like a flash and I do not have to keep stopping to look things up.

All this is extremely satisfying to me, of course. But the best part of it all is that since my memory first attracted the attention of our president, my salary has steadily been increased. Today it is many times greater than it was the day MacDonald got me interested in improving my memory.

WHAT MacDonald told me that eventful evening was this: "Get Roth's Memory Course." I did. That is how I learned to do all the remarkable things I have told you above. The Publishers of the Roth Memory Course—The Independent Corporation—are so confident that it will also show you how to develop a remarkable memory that they will gladly send the Course to you on approval.

The 20th Century Quarterly

Senior Edition—for ages 17 to 70
Intermediate Edition—for ages 13 to 16

LAST week announcement was made of the publication, beginning with the autumn quarter, of the Intermediate Edition of the 20th Century Quarterly, Senior edition of which has been published for three years. The most important thing about such a publication is the list of contributors. Here is the list of the men who are making this new quarterly, which covers the International Uniform Lessons for scholars between the ages of 13 and 16.

Joseph Myers, Jr., of Kansas City. One of the most brilliant students ever graduated from Transylvania College, Lexington, Ky.; a newspaper man; teacher of a live high school class. Mr. Myers will conduct the department, "The Lesson in a Nutshell."

Herbert L. Willett, Jr., of Cambridge, Mass. Has had his training in the University of Chicago and at Harvard University. Having been three years as a professor in Syrian Protestant College, at Beirut, Mr. Willett is well fitted to conduct the department, "Making Difficult Points Clear." He is also a contributor to the Senior edition of the Quarterly.

John R. Ewers, of Pittsburgh, Pa. As minister of one of the great churches of the Steel City and as a teacher with remarkable power to bring Bible truth to bear upon practical life problems, Mr. Ewers will find a most congenial task in conducting the department, "At Grips With the Lesson." Mr. Ewers has made himself famous by his lesson talks in the Senior edition of the Quarterly and in The Christian Century.

Ernest Bournier Allen, of Chicago. Minister for many years at Marion Lawrence's (Congregational) church, in Toledo, O. At present minister of Pilgrim Church, Oak Park, Chicago. Well known as author and brilliant teacher. Dr. Allen will conduct the question department, entitled "Can You Answer?" He will also contribute the "Prayer Thought" for each week.

Thomas Curtis Clark, of The Christian Century staff, is the editor of the new Quarterly, as he is also editor of the Senior edition.

Murder the American Pasttime

MURDER seems to be the favorite American pastime in certain great cities. New York had almost a murder for each day of 1920, the total reaching 344. Chicago was even more active in proportion to population, there being 302 murders in the same period. During the first six months of this year the rate has fallen off in New York and increased in Chicago. The number in New York was 109, while Chicago has to her record 160. The number of convictions for these murders is pitifully small. Most of the women slayers escape scot free. The shamefully numerous murders in the Italian colony are seldom expiated with any sort of punishment. The murdered man, even if he lingers alive for awhile after the crime, refuses to give any information, for that is the code. In the labor war there is a considerable death toll. Rival factions go out gunning for each other, and this seems to be the favorite method of holding an election in some of the unions. It is a well known fact that murders increase in a city where the moral quality of the city administration is low. Machine politics will profit by any alliance, and many a murderer has been able to secure immunity by his connection with the higher-ups. Any community will have relatively more murders where the sanctity of human life has no power over mind and conscience. A community where business men will endanger human life with impure foods, or will build up great war profits on inflated prices to the detriment of the poor, or will stage amusements which pay dividends on the debauchery of young people is ripe for anything. Once a considerable section of the community comes to look on a human being as a thing rather than as a person, murder is inevitable. Human life is never safe in any community where organized religion is not strong. For the protection of human life we need not only an efficient police and unpartisan courts, but we need also a lively social faith in a fatherly God and the resulting doctrine of the brotherhood of man. So long as there are empty churches and a generation of children who are religious illiterates, human life will be cheap.

The Nation Still on a Joy-Ride

POST-BELLUM joy-riding in America has not ended yet. There are still some liberty bonds that may be cashed in. Only when cruel hunger grips the vitals of millions will the nation once more sanely face reality. The figures on the national income and expenditure indicate that our national housekeeping is badly done. While we hear a good deal from the citizens about our "high school taxes," it is interesting to note that the elementary schools of America cost us $762,259,154, while the bill for rouge and other cosmetics runs to the neat sum of $750,000,000. The bill for chewing gum is fifty millions, several times what we spend for foreign missions. The soda fountains of the nation cost the people $350,000,000, which is far beyond the expense of all the church enterprises of the land. Yet we often hear business men complain that the churches are so expensive. The pleasure resorts and joy rides of the nation run to a total of $3,000,000,000. Were this curtailed for but a few years the expenses of the most terrible war of all history would be paid for. The nation is already beginning to economize—on its philanthropies! Those who must raise funds for the public institutions which are supported by subscription report already a decisive tightening of the purse-string. We shall soon hear of efforts to cut down the salaries of ministers and teachers so as to save a little something toward the three billion for road-houses and joy-rides. Only one fourth of the counties in the United States have a public library with five thousand volumes or more. In many sections of the country churches are falling into ruin for lack of funds to provide the ordinary decencies of worship. But in spite of this kind of poverty, we still have money for everything except the things that people cannot really live without.

Economic Emancipation By Religious Faith

NO one can talk as much as Bernard Shaw does without occasionally saying something that is true. In a recent address before the Fabian Society in Usher Hall, Edinburgh, he remarked: "The last thing I have to say is that in the Fabian Society, in the outlook of the labor party, in all the forces that are advancing toward social betterment—at the back of all popular movements there must be a religion. The miners would never have raised themselves through their trades unions and cooperative societies had they not raised themselves through their Methodist chapels." In the Old Testament, which Shaw has cast aside in favor of a new Bible he is to write, he might have learned that Israel won its economic emancipation by the power of religious faith. A master of economics tells us that the two greatest forces on earth are the religious and the economic; they shape the life of man. Until these two are brought together in reciprocal influence and interplay, there is little hope of either religious reality or economic peace. The tragedy of the present situation is that they are kept apart, as if they were alien, and we have a materialistic socialism and an unsocial Christianity, both of which end in futility. A deepening sense of this truth finds expression in unexpected places, in groups of business men, and among social workers, as well as in the forward-looking minds of the church. This at least is plain: in the world of today the individual and the social gospel belong together, and neither will long survive the shipwreck of the other.

What Methodist Modernists Want

METHODISM has only a little over a century of history in this country, but already many of its fundamental documents are hoary with age, as indeed are such documents in any communion. The modernist movement in Methodism feels keenly the need of renovating the articles of religion and of completely rewriting the book of discipline. The Chicago Methodist preachers' meeting and many of the annual conferences have during recent years made pronouncements on the antiquated restriction of amusements. The discipline says that members who attend circuses or theaters should be admonished, and if they prove recalcitrant they should be put out of the church. This law is a dead letter, of course, but up to the present time the conservatives have successfully resisted all efforts to change it. Not only are Methodists under obligation to stay away from movie shows, they are also forbidden to wear jewelry or costly apparel. A bishop with a Phi Beta Kappa watch charm is a violator of Methodist law, and a number of such law-breakers can be found. The rules for the Methodist ministry are also interesting. The dominies are charged not to indulge in jesting or light talk. Most of the Methodist ministers we know are happily human enough to violate so senseless a rule. These same ministers are urged to rise at four o'clock in the morning to engage in devotions. This rule is honored more in the breach than in the observance. The discipline book discourages all criticism of the rules of discipline in the church, making the matter of reform difficult. The man who agitates for reform has by the very fact of this agitation made himself technically a law-breaker. Not only are Methodist articles of religion and Methodist rules defective in what they include, they are even more defective in what they omit. The age has given us a conscience on many matters that were once not a matter of conscience. The social gospel has given us some new ideas of sin not to be found in the Methodist discipline. The Methodist modernist has the task of securing a complete rewriting of his fundamental documents. In this task he may well be supported by the goodwill of all modernists of every communion. The evangelical churches must advance together toward more adequate conceptions of what religion really is in the twentieth century.

Move To End Apportionment Abuse

OLD SOUTH Congregational Church sent to the National Council of Congregational Churches at Los Angeles a memorial on the subject of apportionments in that denomination, declaring its independence of such apportionments as might be handed down by missionary and benevolent boards and urging their discontinuance. The subject has long been the occasion of friction in the Methodist denomination. Pastors assert that ministerial preferment all too often depends upon the record of a minister as the financial agent of the boards of the church. The Disciples have also had their measure of protest with regard to the abuses of the apportionment system. The stingy church was apportioned on a different basis from the liberal church, and when the former was able to reach its apportionment it felt very righteous. On the other hand, rapidly increasing demands have been made upon churches that are known for their wealth and liberality until at last their good disposition and patience reached the breaking point. Now comes the announcement from the Disciples United Missionary Society that the whole apportionment system is to be done away with. In place of apportionments there will be stewardship rallies in various sections of the country in which representatives of the churches will be instructed in the art of making their own apportionments. At these rallies the ideal will be held up for churches to give as much for others as for themselves. The tithing principle will be urged upon individual members. It is hardly to be expected that such an appeal to the loyalty and intelligence of the churches will bring its full fruitage the first year. It may take many years to complete the educational process. But the principle involved in this new step is consistent with the democratic ideals of the denomination, and in the long run should be good business for the kingdom of God.

Immigration Still a Problem

THE Dillingham bill which passed congress not long since is by no means the last word on the immigration problem. While it has provided a means for regulating the flow of immigration, there are phases of the problem that are untouched by this piece of legislation. In the first place there has not been any great increase in the percentage of foreign born in this country. In 1860 this percentage was 13.2 per cent. In the last census the percentage was 12.9. In the decennial censuses in between those years the percentage never rose higher than 14.8, so that it is seen that the number of foreign-born in the country has been for fifty years a fairly constant thing. Most immigration statistics have dealt entirely with the number of people entering the country and have not dealt with the large number leaving again. It is felt by the leaders in congress that a permanent policy with regard to immigration must be formulated and this must be the result of a deeper study of the whole question. Whatever legislation is adopted, there must be some method of regulating the flow according to economic conditions. This the Dillingham bill accomplishes with its restriction of the entries annually to three per cent of the foreign-born already here. Under the Dillingham bill, 400,000 immigrants may enter the country this year. There is a widespread demand that future legislation should develop a technique for excluding the biologically unfit. The diseased, the immoral and those of low mental caliber should not be added to the American stock. Effort should be made also to distribute the immigrants more widely over the country. A few eastern states receive the immigrants, and here they live in congested districts in factory towns. Room for these people is to be found in many of the undeveloped sections of the country and a comprehensive survey of economic conditions would afford the newcomer advice as to the locality where he is most needed, and consequently where he might hope to achieve a larger success in his life adventure.

Our Young People and Education

COLLEGES and universities have been greatly overcrowded in the past year or so, but with the coming of hard times, it is not to be expected that this supply of students will keep up. Particularly is it true that promising young people from the less fortunate homes will find that the pinch of poverty will delay and even prevent the fulfillment of adolescent dreams of higher culture. These facts make the more significant the newly designated day in the calendar of Disciples churches, Go-Away-to-College Sunday. On this day there will be a special consciousness in this group of churches with regard to the educational future of the young people. Not a few churches over the country have made some provision for the aid of worthy young people who may not be able to fulfill their aspirations for higher training. Even a few hundred dollars of aid sometimes results in encouragement that is adequate. It grows more and more apparent that the leadership of the world will be largely in the hands of the American youth of this generation. Not only is our own country demanding more educated men and women of every sort, but foreign countries are taking our young people for a great variety of tasks. Thousands of American engineers will be scattered over Europe and South America for the next twenty-five years carrying with them the best of American achievement. Many belated sections of the world are taking American educators to set up new standards. This is particularly true in South America. The new and wonderful development of missionary interest in the churches means a steady demand for hundreds and even thousands of college trained young people annually to carry on the foreign enterprises of the church. The young manhood of the leading civilized countries of Europe has been depleted by the ravages of war. Our man power is unimpaired and we enter upon an era of world influence something like the Greek influence following the conquests of Alexander the Great. For these times we need the best of the young life of the land, and in every religious denomination the educational processes should be solidly backed up by the churches.

"Back To —"

IS it not amazing how devoutly and complacently we hearken to preachers, frocked and unfrocked, who urge us to return to some condition past, to go back to some standard or method which once prevailed but now no longer prevails? As though that were possible! Of the desirability of what we have and are, against that which once was, there might remain a choice. But a return is out of the question. We cannot go back. Is it not amazing, then, that we hearken to those who talk as though we might, and urge us to it?

Life does not lie along plains which permit returning. There are no roads to travel by. The bridges are burned behind us. The bridges are made for such destruction. Pining to go back over routes already traversed and to settle down in surroundings which we once occupied—so far from being the saint's aspiration, it is the fool's folly. We not only are not what we once were, but the surroundings have disappeared. Though we might go back to the place, they would not be there.

It was a crazed and much distraught spirit who taught us in our childhood to prattle that verse which was the stand-by of many an anxious youngster searching for something to "speak" on the fateful Friday afternoon in school.

Backward, turn backward, O time in your flight,
Make me a child again, just for tonight!

Ere long we came to know in what mental condition a man or woman is who might thus enter his second childhood. The passion to "go back," to re-establish spent standards and methods should be generally recognized as an evidence of dotage, an approach to imbecility.

This impossibility has wrung the consciousness of those who have returned after years of wandering or residence elsewhere, to the childhood home. It simply is not there. Trees are there, once small and now grown big, a house once new or less old, and now beaten by the weather almost out of the earlier semblance, a landscape which here and there revives memories. But the restoration of the childhood feelings or thoughts or aspirations in their original reality and sincerity is no more possible than is the fabrication of the Bunker Hill Monument out of dreams.

The impossibility of these restorations is so apparent that the discussion of their desirability would be ridiculous, if seasons of confusion and strain did not commonly reduce us to the futility. What a timid lot we are! When we do not know where to go, we cry to run back to where we once were, without the least appreciation of the fact that there is no such place. It ought to stir our courage to realize that forward is the only place there is, not here. We may turn this way or that, lead straight on or to the right or left. But back we cannot go, and we make ourselves both coward and fool when we try.

The clamor to go back is a counsel of selfishness. It demands that woes from which others have escaped shall overwhelm them once more, because, forsooth, we would wallow in blisses which once satisfied us. The plain reason that standards and methods have been discarded is because they have ceased to satisfy the large number. Yet an indolent and selfish minority would reimpose a bondage found too grievous to be borne. It is a counsel of timidity, as already said. Only a wearied, fagged out generation will seek after such a sign,—an evil and adulterous generation, a bolder commentator declared it.

It is evidence of defective artistry. The old setting was made up of innumerable facts and features and forces. As a matter of fact, the fondest dreamer does not seek the reproduction of the whole past. He wishes to pick and choose. He wishes to patch a fragment of the old upon the new, one here and one there, in a petulant caprice, thrusting together colors and shapes and modes in a grotesque jumble.

Its selfishness reacts most flagrantly of all upon the young. The present and future are theirs. They wish no commerce with the outworn past. It has no glamour for them. A youngster who joins such clamor may be set down as mentally or physically diseased. He may be of such weak or callow mind as to have yielded for the moment to the dominion of hard old minds, but it is not himself who thinks and feels and wills, when he turns reactionary or even "conservative." The healthy young are always radical, or are so esteemed by the timid or fagged-out old.

The oldsters have made a mess of things, and they know it. The present clamor of "conservatism" is the loud proclamation of their guilty knowledge, couched in terms by which they seek to cover their guilt. The war was terrible. The after-war strain is thoroughly disillusioning, and in some respects even more terrible than the war itself. But must we not agree that it is a counsel of imbecility to propose returning to the ethical or religious or political or commercial ideals and methods and programs of the eighties or nineties of the old century, or to those of the first decade of the new century, which bred all these calamities as the carrion breeds maggots?

The "normal" conditions out of which these tragedies sprung are precisely those from which every devout, not to say sane, mortal should wish to see us delivered. The times of confusion and distress from which the world now suffers are the most powerful incentive a brave and intelligent man should require to make him eloquent in the prayer that we do not return to standards and methods which allowed such conditions to become possible.

A political or religious statesmanship which has only a "backward" gospel to offer would feed a stone to those who ask for fish, would give chaff, the fire and the whirlwind to those who seek peace and plenty. Heaven save the people whose seers and prophets have eyes only in the backs of their heads!

The Changed Atmosphere of Preaching

"MOST of the older people seem to think that anything two thousand years old must necessarily have justified its existence: we post-war folks are more likely to assume that it has lasted too long and had better be scrapped." These words of an ex-officer of the British army give a hint of the changed atmosphere in which the preacher of today works, which he finds so unresponsive, so indifferent to the spiritual life. There is a subconscious influence, as well as one that is self-conscious, a something under the surface of the mind which makes his work difficult and ineffective. What is it? How can the preacher learn to play on the new keyboard of the modern mind?

For one thing, in ninety-five out of a hundred of our churches the preacher must reckon with an absence of numbers, and this affects the psychology of public worship. People worship in companies because the sense of solidarity provides a new psychic basis, and an opportunity for fellowship. This was largely the secret of power in the great revivals of old, like the evangelical revival in England. Often a man burdened with a self-consciousness which hides the face of God finds in the sense of brotherhood escape from himself, and relief from that loneliness of soul which is such a torment. Even Pentecost was associated with a crowded upper room; not that the power of the Spirit is a matter of numbers, but it is a question of being able to melt self-consciousness in a sense of fraternal company, without which preaching and worship lose much of their vital power.

There are, of course, many reasons for the present situation without inferring the decline of the religious spirit. The average size of families in suburban homes is about half what it was a generation ago. It takes twice as many families to fill the pews as it did in the Victorian era. Even these reduced families are disintegrated, partly by the derangement of domestic service, which throws the burden on the mother. Always the mother of the house is the pivot of the pew, and the absence of the grandest music heard in the open space between earth and the wife does not help the attendance of the husband and family. Families are still further disintegrated by the decay of the old unity and discipline. Sports bring difficulties for younger people, and hard, exacting work for the older ones. In most homes it is a case of go as you please and go if you please; and the wonder is, with all these influences at work, that even half the pews are filled. As it is, a lack of magnetic contact means a lack of oxygen in the pulpit; it is like sailing against the set of the waves.

The new listener is different from the old, owing to the presence of antithetical elements in the modern mind which make the ancient faith seem unreal. Take six great sanctions, which have been the basis of so much preaching hitherto—the authority of the Bible, the claim of the church, the enormity of sin, the prospect of rewards and punishments, the uniqueness of Christianity, the sacredness of Sunday—can anyone say that these now provide the preacher with his old leverage and power? Not in the same degree, certainly. The question here is not whether these sanctions are true, but the fact that old stand-bys have become stumbling-blocks to the average man of our day. Read the sermons of thirty or fifty years ago, asking yourself whether a typical modern audience would long endure that kind of preaching; and you will begin to understand the bewilderment of the man of the pulpit of today.

Here are six axioms of religious thought, on the strength of which the order preaching was built; but they are no longer axiomatic. For the majority of our people they are debatable at least, or at any rate no longer authoritative, and the very fact that they are questionable reduces the note of urgency. The modern mind has been despoiled of its warp, and if the warp is not there—the certainties, the things to be taken for granted—the fabric of faith is frail and hard to weave. The old presuppositions are no longer taken for granted, and the fingers of our sermons grope blindly amid the hidden keys of the modern mind, not knowing when we strike a satisfying chord. Often one feels that the hero of "The Lost Chord" must have been a preacher; he struck for once a chord of wonder and mystery, but could not recapture it again. One of the clearest signs of our absorption in the visible is the surrender on the part of Christian families to the decision of agnostic physicians, that ministers should not visit the sick and dying for fear of upsetting them!

What then is the remedy? Admit that the old scholastic categories have disappeared—from the modern mind, as we know it—can we relearn the keyboard? The keyboard has changed, but the music remains, and there is still that in human nature, while human nature is the same, which must respond to the spiritual appeal. First, we may divine much of the sensibilities and aptitudes of the modern mind by a study of what finds expression outside the churches. The author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," once wrote a book entitled "Sermons Out of Church," and there are many such today. Often they have a strange and alien sound, but this may only be the conviction of minds with which we are out of touch. Often enough we have to recognize the worldly spirit which invades our churches, but we are not so ready to perceive that the intellectual the other day, weighing up the moral impact of the war: "There has never been so vast a force of incipient spiritual activity, to be influenced for good or evil, as there is today." Surely we must set ourselves to master this new keyboard, if only to learn that in the things of the spirit there are no outsiders. Take, as a single example, the words of Wells—better known to our hearers than many writers of the Bible—whose genius it is to focus clearly what is vaguely present in the mind of today, so far as it thinks on the problems of religion, and who commands the ear of the world as perhaps no other man living. Dip into his books almost anywhere:

"The believer owes all his being and every moment of his life to God to keep mind and body clean, fine, active. The real coming of God is an irradiation of the mind. Everything is there as it was before, only now it is aflame. Suddenly the light fills one's eyes, and one knows that God has risen and that doubt has fled forever. There is scarcely a faith, however mean and preposterous, that has not been a way of holiness. God takes us for his own and releases us from ourselves—that is salvation. He incorporates us in his own undying experience and advantage, and makes us live immortally and abundantly. There is man's love of God, but there is also something else—the love God bears for man in the individual believer. God takes all. He takes you, blood and bones and house and acres, he takes skill and influence and expectations. For all the rest of your life you are nothing but God's agent. If you are not prepared for so complete a surrender, then you are infinitely remote from God. You are merely a curious interloper. The kingdom of God on earth is not a metaphor, nor a mere spiritual state, not a dream, not an uncertain project—it is the thing before us, it is the close and inevitable destiny of mankind."

It is good preaching, and if we think it marred by a hopelessly inadequate idea of God, we must remember that many in our congregations are confused in the same way. At any rate, we are bound to admit that we have a new keyboard, as fine as ever preachers had in the past. Superstition is vanishing, exclusiveness and intolerance are passing, and the divorce of heaven from earth, of creed from conduct, is becoming obsolete. Our new postulates are a sense of the indwelling of God, a passion for brotherhood, a vision of the nobility of service and the supremacy of love, the assurance that goodness brings its own reward and is essentially one with truth and beauty. There is a good deal of wild talk about the old gospel, when what people mean is really the old intellectual axioms, the presuppositions of the ancestral mind. The gospel is everlasting, and if we interpret it in the terms of our time—not using a violin as if it were a 'cello—there will be ears to hear. It is a very delicate instrument we have to play on. Modern sermons are well enough made, no doubt, but they do not always fit the instrument God has given the preacher to play upon.

What has been here written is subject to criticism and qualification, but what we have been trying to do is to show that our reasons for pessimism are largely fictitious. We have as an inheritance the sifted experience of the past, and for our guidance the powers of the world to come and the all-transfiguring presence of God. Ages differ, atmospheres change, but the realities remain. The gospel which was bread and meat and milk to our fathers, which set the hearts of Francis and Wesley singing, is still air of the age pervades them too. John Drinkwater wrote and sky. What is needed is a more musicianly knowledge on our part. What if the broad, out-of-doors, breezy winds of our democratic age blow many cobwebs away, it will purify and sweeten the air, and great voices will be heard summoning us to ancient ways of simplicity and power. Again, as of yore, the church will give birth to mighty preachers like Bunyan, Wesley, Dale, Newman, Beecher, and poets of authentic accent will stir into penitence and passion. The great new words will be found, the high and haunting chords will be struck, and there will be "one music as before, but vaster" in its range and richer in its praise of the Master of the melody.

The Table by the Window

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE was a day when I entered into a Restaurant. And the Headwaiter, who was a Person of Distinction, whose name I should probably have found in the Blue Book if not in Burke's Peerage, showed unto me a seat at a Table against the Wall.

And I said unto him, What is the matter with that Table in front of the Window?

And he said, I will seat you there, sir, if you prefer.

And I said, I prefer.

And he seated me there.

Now I understood the thoughts and intents of his heart. For he was keeping that seat by the Window for Two persons, who would be likely to give a Larger Tip than a man who was eating alone.

So I sat at the Table by the window, even though I ate my morsel alone, which Job thanked God he had not done.

And I looked out, and I beheld a cross-section of human life. For there passed the window a Child in a Baby-Cab, and I thought a loving thought for the little one and its mother. And there passed by an Hearse, and I meditated for a moment upon the dignity of sorrow and the perpetual need of comfort and the solemn mystery of death. And I beheld schoolboys pushing each other off the walk and laughing as they gave and took. And I beheld men going to their labor, and others wandering care-free and in no haste to move ahead.

And there rolled before me a moving-picture show called Human Life, and I sat where I could see it as I stirred the Sugar in my Coffee.

And the more I saw, the better I felt about life. For in the main the lives of the men and women that passed were of value to the world, and their faces were not the faces of folk who were down and out. And I considered that all of them had their burdens, but were meeting life with resolution and hope, and none of them were free from care, but most of them were either happy or putting up a good bluff. And the day was brighter for me because I had my seat at the window. And I said, Behold thus will I ever seek to sit where I can look out on life as it passeth, with sympathy and respect and a friendly thought.

And I considered that among all the hundreds of men and women who passed by that day as I sat before the window, there was not one who wished me ill, but there were many who would have been kind to me had I asked it of them.

Now as I was using the finger-bowl, I reminded myself that the waiter had probably been holding that table for a Better Tip than I Had intended to give. Therefore did I increase my customary tip, for the seat was worth the money.

VERSE

Prayer for a New House

MAY nothing evil cross this door,
And may ill-fortune never pry
About these windows; may the roar
And may rains go by.

Strengthened by faith, these rafters will Withstand the battering of the storm;
This hearth, though all the world grow chill,
Will keep us warm

Peace shall walk softly through these rooms,
Touching our lips with holy wine,
Till every casual corner blooms
Into a shrine.

Laughter shall drown the raucous shout;
And, though these sheltering walls are thin
May they be strong to keep hate out
And hold love in.

LOUIS UNTERMAYER.

One Night At Dusk

ONE night at dusk I heard the boom
Of one long line of lilac bloom.
It crashed against my senses there
And swept across the evening air.
Like summer's bronzed artillery
It rumbled through the soul of me.

Again I heard the thunderous roar
Of one great sunset on the shore
Across a golden, twilight bay;
One subtle, singing Summer day.
It was, as if the setting sun
Had flung its shell, like some great gun.

I heard a crimson rose at noon
Send forth its softly, singing croon.
Its odor was a lullaby;
Its perfume was a summer sigh.
It seemed as if the heavens around
Had bent them low to hear this sound.

A mother bent in slender grace
Above a baby's smiling face.
Then suddenly, as if in love
There came a sound from far above.
And then I knew that planets sing
When e'er they see this sacred thing!

The Negro Taking Hold

By Joseph Ernest McAfee

FOR fifty years following emancipation the American Negro had things done for him. Now he is doing for himself. In that bare fact there is everything to encourage. His first bold effort to do for himself, under carpet-bag leadership, was harshly rebuked, and he himself discovered that it must prove abortive. With marvelous self-restraint he accepted the decision, and has been painfully, though, all things considered, with remarkable celerity, correcting the weaknesses which made his early attempt abortive, and has been preparing himself for the more successful program of today. He now has an educated and not altogether unseasoned leadership within his own race which promises radically different results from those which followed his feverish attempts to press into and dominate the politics of the sections where his numbers gave him the nominal power, immediately following emancipation.

There has probably been no match in history for the grace and patience and docility with which he has addressed himself to the reconstruction of his ideas and habits and social aspirations during the past half century. He has had a deal more power than he has ever presumed to use. Now he is beginning to utilize his power, vastly increased and given a new basing by education and acquisition of property.

This new character given his power bodes immeasurably better things for our civilization as a whole. There has been much dread of the "spread of bolshevism" among American Negroes, fomented by lecturers and propagandists, who either do not know the Negro and sin ignorantly, or who do know him and sin wilfully. Forget it. The American Negro furnishes no fertile soil for bolshevistic propaganda. He must be harassed and oppressed and baited far beyond the iniquities he has already suffered before the soil can be inoculated to the point of yielding such a noxious crop. It is against his nature, and if he is ever incited to bolshevistic recklessness it can come only of the recklessness and malignity of the "dominant race" with which he is forced to deal. It is not at all likely that this will reach a volume furnishing sufficient cause. The Negro has a mission to fulfill in our common civilization, and the signs multiply that he will busy himself so constructively about that, that no place will be allowed for merely destructive resentment of what he suffers, has suffered or is likely to suffer.

SCHOOLS OF THOUGHT

There are now five and perhaps six distinguishable "schools" of thought and activity among American Negroes. The boundaries between them are not clearly defined. A given individual may be less disposed or able to classify himself than is the dispassionate observer looking on from the distance. There is a right and left in each, perhaps. The tendency just now is toward further differentiation rather than integration, though individuals in the several groups are often on very good terms with each other. The Negro has no particular knack for racial integration. It is surprising that the fate he has suffered in American society has not forced him into a solidarity so compact as to have given us a vast deal more of trouble than we have experienced. In the case of most races similarly beset rebellion would have been violent. Manifestly the Negro is of a different genus and displays a different genius. His mission is evidently that of leaven, rather than that of a fighting unit, bent upon either military or social conquest.

Without presuming to be rigidly exact, the following may serve as a sketch of these five or six groups of "schools" among American Negroes:

This includes the legal or apparent successors of Booker Washington, though not by any means all of his spiritual disciples. They accept white leadership, white financial support, employed and accepted more or less openly as patronage, and still yield a kind of subserviency believed to be reasonable in view of their backward condition as a race. They seek no political or social standing not freely granted them by the "dominant race."

They are perhaps no more zealous for industrial education and an improved economic status for the race than are many in the other groups, but they believe more single-mindedly that all else not already gained must wait upon this advance. They are, naturally, closely identified with the large educational and especially industrial institutions endowed and supported by white money and white patronage. Others of the race rebel against this patronage, but these either welcome it, or, at least accept it gracefully

NOT SELF-ASSERTIVE

They get along well with their white neighbors everywhere, because they accept a status arbitrarily assigned them by their neighbors. They do not assert rights. This is not always due to a servile or cringing disposition, but often is thoroughly reasoned and based on a racial and social philosophy. They believe the time has not yet come to assert rights. They assume that rights will be freely yielded when the Negro has attained an economic status which the conventions and ideals of American society appear to demand of social aspirants.

They are sometimes styled, by members of their own race who belong to other groups, "white man's Negroes." This is spoken with more or less contempt, according as the speaker belongs to remote or less remote radical groups.

As already pointed out, this group looks like the "school" founded by Booker Washington. But it would be a mistake to confine his influence to this element alone. As he passes into history he takes an even higher place in the thought and aspirations of the entire race, and few American Negroes like to fight over his bones. His tomb is rapidly becoming a common shrine for those of all faiths.

This group permits no break with the white race. For the most part it has received a different education from those of the first group. It entertains higher social aspirations, and claims rights, though these rights are not so much aggressively demanded as allowed to speak for themselves.

The intellectual leaders of this group are drawn from the more conservative elements educated in the standard schools and colleges, supported by northern philanthropy in the south, and in the northern universities where no color line is officially drawn. Many have tested their intellectual powers in immediate association with whites on something like equal footing, and they have showed themselves the equal of the whites when submitted to the conventional tests of the classroom. They are not disposed to force upon the unwilling an abrogation of the social disabilities under which they move in American society, but they are not disposed to accept these disabilities as just. They are patient under unjust restrictions, but they do not wish this virtue to be misconstrued. They seek to establish a fellowship with white citizens on an equal footing where the conventions will permit. They invite a partnership with whites who concede the justice of their attitude in gaining for the whole race more just treatment and fuller access to education and all other common rights of citizenship.

This group expresses itself through such enterprises as the Urban League, operating mainly in the north, though not alone there, and through the inter-racial commissions, which, since the great war, have been organized by counties and states in practically all sections of the south.

THE SOCIAL QUESTION

For the most part the question of social equality of the races, or the social status of the Negro in any terms, is not brought forward. The inter-racial organizations in the south are not uniformly committed to the removal of all political disabilities of the Negro. But many white citizens of the south have been so aroused by the perils of race conflict, and by their native sense of justice, that they are joining in these movements, without taking the trouble to recast in all its fundamentals their traditional inter-racial philosophy. They are simply aroused to the fact that the present strained relations must not be permitted to persist. They are willing to meet and talk over with conservative Negro leaders the practical questions which force themselves today upon every peace-loving citizen.

The Negroes of this group believe that the only hope of solving the race problem is through the cooperation of the two races, and they are ready to meet their white neighbors more than half way in effecting this cooperation. This group probably includes the largest proportion of the educated, property-owning Negroes of both north and south.

III

The next group is also led by a strong force of educated men and women. They are the more liberal and aggressive type graduated from the institutions referred to under II. Their organ, though not of course official, since these groups are not organized into full self-consciousness, is 'The Crises,' having the largest circulation of any magazine devoted to the interests of the Negro race. It is ably edited, and gains an ever widening and more intelligent support.

This group believes in Negro rights, believes they are being flagrantly infringed, and feels it just and proper to assert those rights with great vigor. Occasionally one may sign his letters to others of the group, "Yours for the revolution!" Many believe that the Negro is now so far from receiving justice at the hands of American civilization that the change which will secure him his rights may be properly styled a revolution. They sometimes express these sentiments in language so vehement as to seem to their white neighbor incendiary. They have thus often been confused with those of other groups, with whom they are far from belonging.

NO VIOLENCE

Mr. Lee, writing in a letter recently published in The Christian Century, is entirely justified in his defense of Mr. DuBois and The Crisis against the charge of inciting violence. This group does not believe in violence and bloodshed. It may preach revolution, of the type mentioned, but it vehemently scorns the crude means of hacking and butchering the way to liberty and common rights. It believes in impassioned speech and incisive writing, and uses them with an effect which is adding volumes to the national literature. Some of Mr. DuBois' writings will last as long as the language in which they are written, and cannot be read by the unprejudiced without a mighty tug at our better social feelings.

So far from this group's now standing at the extreme of radicalism, they actually embrace some of the most powerful conservative forces among the Negro people. Group II and Group III embody the real strength of the Negro leadership, and if they grow more radical, tending to merge with the groups later mentioned, it will be an indictment of visionless white leadership and blundering white policies.

Still we find no revolutionists, in the raw and red sense in which alarmists use the term. This group believes in using force, but only in resistance to overt aggression. They realize that in adopting this policy they are playing with fire, that arms employed in resistance may on occasion be employed in aggression, but they believe that the inequities and injustices from which the American Negro suffers are so flagrant that this risk should be run.

They do not openly defy the law. They advocate and adopt practices in New York which they would not adopt or advocate in Georgia. But they are prepared to supply arms to the set-upon blacks of Georgia and Alabama, even though the weapons must travel incognito. They openly assert that Negro Americans should no more submit in silence and without resistance to the disabilities and injustice accorded them than did or does the Puritan English American when he is the sufferer. They propose to organize "tea parties" where occasions prompt, and defend themselves against aggression where the law and its official sponsors do not protect them.

Those advanced to this stand will probably be found in considerable numbers in the League of Negro Americans, and similar organizations, though, as throughout, our grouping does not correspond with self-conscious alignments among the Negroes themselves.

It is certain that an increasing number of thoughtful and educated Negroes are verging toward this position. They may not join an organization which asserts these doctrines, but they propose to act upon them when forced into a position where they apply.

This group would be classified as radical by the conventions established since the reactions of the great war set in. They do not organize armed rebellions. They realize that such methods would be futile. But their oratory is inflammatory, and they are assertive, not of race equality, but sometimes of race superiority in behalf of the Negro.

One individual who might be thrown into this classification, declaring that he had received appointment under the federal administration to a foreign diplomatic post, challenged a tumultuously applauding Negro audience to hail the early day when a Negro President would sit in the White House in Washington, the logical and altogether hopeful aspirant being the speaker himself!

RACIAL SUPERIORITY

Leaders who might be roughly classified here have revived schemes for the colonization of American Negroes in other lands, in Africa and in the islands. They magnify the liberties and the exalted civilization of the Republic of Haiti, for example, and correspondingly denounce the recent policy of the United States government touching that land. They are hopeless of the Negro's ever securing his rights in the United States. They would demand those rights by force, if force might be of avail. Failing of that they urge emigration or other programs of segregation, lauding the native superiority of the Negro, and predicting the greatest glory for the race when it shall attain the dominance which its worth ensures.

Booker Washington bantered New England audiences with their membership in a race whose future was mainly behind them, while he belonged to a race whose future still lay before it. Mr. DuBois has vociferously and very publicly thanked God that no Anglo-Saxon blood flows in his veins! Other eloquent spokesmen have displayed open pride in their blood, in defiance of the American social conventions which have made it a reproach or a misfortune. This fifth group show a more or less vindictive pride, and would cultivate a Negro racial intolerance as malign and aggressive as that displayed by whites who share the faith professed the other day by an intelligent mother of a university professor, when she declared that the Negro must know and be kept in his place; that God Almighty has created him to be the servant of the white man; that he serves exceedingly well in that ca-capacity when kept where he belongs, but that allowing him to leave that position to associate with white folks was quite as reprehensible as adopting a similar policy with a mule!

To match intolerance with intolerance is not an outstanding characteristic of the Negro, and this group is small except as the ignorant may be stampeded by emotional and eloquent leaders. Which is not to say that all the leaders of this group are ignorant or lacking in education. Some of those in Groups IV and V are highly educated and are mentally exceedingly keen. Perhaps it is a fact that a disproportion of them are immigrants from the West Indies, whose race consciousness has been rendered unusually acute either by their experiments under other governments or by their experiences in passing out of foreign society under the social conventions of American life.

VI

Perhaps a sixth group exists and perhaps it does not. It is not "recognizable" in the sense that the public knows or can find out who belongs to it. White alarmists and some unsympathetic Negroes maintain that there is a growing menace in oath-bound secret societies among Negroes, who are bent on bloody retaliation of atrocities vented upon members of their race. Of course, if such organizations exist they publish no literature, and let none outside their close circles know of their existence, except as secret deeds of violence may be witness. Such witness in the form of overt measures of violence initiated by Negroes are so nearly unheard of that the tough-minded may be pardoned for disbelieving as yet that such organizations exist in threatening numbers.

This group, if it exists, corresponds, perhaps, with the Ku Klux Klan, whose revival has been widely heralded, and whose alleged activities have been so generally deplored by white citizens both north and south.

Probably every thoughtful American is conscious of the logic of these gradations, but not many realize the extent of the organized life of the Negro people. Race consciousness, certainly race solidarity for aggressive ends, is not natural to the American Negro. Our conventions have forced him into his present attitude. By readjusting those conventions the menace to our civilization growing out of race relations can be removed. The Negro is not naturally a bloody revolutionist, and the large proportion of such leaders as have developed a racial and social philosophy of their own are disposed to demonstrate a worthy mission for the race in conformance with its recognized pacific genius.

Even the most optimistic cannot afford to minimize the difficulties of the race problem we have inherited from a blundering and short-sighted past. But the difficulties are greatly reduced by facing all the facts. The Negro is thinking profoundly. He is taking hold at his end of the problem with vigor and considerable intelligence. In the vast majority American Negroes are eager to work out a unique and worthy mission as a part of American society. They show no disposition to effect a vindictive race solidarity except as they are forced into it by intolerable encroachments upon their life, liberty and pursuit of happiness.

The groupings pointed out are a demonstration of their eagerness to think as differently among themselves as good citizens of democratic society are supposed to think, and they will not act in solid and menacing racial masses politically, industrially or otherwise, unless they are forced against their own will by aggressions upon their citizenship.

The State University and Religion

By Edward W. Blakeman

THE recent article by Dr. Peter Ainslie in The Christian Century on "The Denominational School, Should It Be Fostered by Christian People?" ably treats one half of a vital question. As his paper indicates, the other half is the relation of organized Christianity to our great schools of the people—our tax supported institutions of learning. Every year there appears at the State University a throng of youth fresh from the homes and altars of the church. They are full of hope. Leadership—commercial, professional, intellectual, spiritual and civic—claims the splendid expectation of them all. Likewise, they bring certain conceptions as to what makes a balanced life. At home, to adopt Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler's analysis, "the social heritage, the intellectual heritage, and the aesthetic heritage" were accompanied by the "religious heritage." The altar with the pulpit message and appeal had a large place. Social life, in part at least, centered about a church. The minister of the community, usually classed with the superintendent of the public schools, was, by them while at home, thought of as an educational leader. Reform movements found in him an interpretation from week to week. Every crisis such as graduation, a celebration, a funeral, or a local centering of patriotic loyalty, was attended by this spokesman of Christianity. The religious inheritance was directly obtainable.

UNIVERSITY COMMUNITY

But now these youth have arrived at the state university. They enter a vast, new and strangely complex community. Its central industry—that of spreading before students in lecture form and lesson assignment, the known truth of the race—is highly organized. Its leaders are skilled and each is a specialist in his department. The schedule of operation at once the result of generations of experience, good psychology and distracting pedagogical experiment is very definite, smooth running and sure as time, in that it waits for no man. These students also find a fraternity rushing season with "national" chapter houses in full blossom, a daily student paper taking subscriptions for the year, an athletic schedule which in advance claims five or ten dollars, a medical clinic by which for a dollar a semester one receives the combined skill of seven or more physicians, an array of literary societies so permanent that if he once joins he is set in a given group for all his college career and his alumni existence. A score of lesser institutions also make demands and all take on the aspect of educational necessity. All have the stamp of university authority. All flourish by the patronage and genius of either the faculty members or the senior students. To any given neophyte these are presented and accepted as the new set of safeguards to his soul. The home church, once regarded as the sure custodian of Christian truth, the minister in the local community, and the organized Bible class which was a social center are superseded. He has now graduated from all that. He is at the university.

CHURCH PREJUDICE

The picture is not yet complete. One must interpret any given situation through the use of standards already set up. At home Christianity painted the university as godless, the professors as rather generally agnostic, and the university city as lawless. The duties to be found at the university have been looked upon as essential but rather well mixed with a forbidden pleasure which must be shunned and avoided in spite of all its irresistible attractiveness. Here is where our present attitude toward the state university begins its un-Christian work. The necessity of maintaining the denominational college and our willingness to sacrifice given adolescent youth upon the altar of institutionalism is the cause. That all this is accidental rather than designed, does not relieve the situation. This fact rather indicts organized Christianity of the crime of loose thinking and of deliberate hypocritical promotion of "isms" at the expense of character. That this situation should exist in the education department of our American Protestant life makes the case doubly sad.

This ill adjustment, a failure to connect the former community with the university community, is the issue. The university itself can be held for adjustments purely academic. But the state school cannot be held for the teaching of religion. Who can be so held? The church, to be sure. But here we are at the end of the first century of this type of institution and hundreds of them dot the map, yet the church to date has no sort of adequate method of presenting religion at these centers. To locate here a faculty in religion including The Bible as Literature, Comparative Religions, Introduction to New Testament, Christian Missions, and kindred themes would readily solve the problem and serve both the state and the church.

COOPERATION ESSENTIAL

Denominationalism, however, greatly complicates the situation. No university can deal with the Christian church as such nor even with the two great divisions.

Protestantism is legion. Unless the Federal Council of Churches, the Council of Church Boards of Education or some similar body soon takes up this matter there is danger that the denominational approach to the campus with only the sectarian objective will make a disgraceful exhibit of our petty conceptions of Christianity. Here is a challenge. It frames itself on the one hand as a needed restraint on the part of separate denominations and on the other hand as an urgent, over-ripe opportunity for these cooperating agencies to lead boldly forward. Our faith is a unit regardless of our separate approaches. Shall we cloud the faith itself by stirring the dust of the several ways or shall we charitably admit the importance of sister bodies, accept the truth held in the other man's creed and the welcome wisdom which may be brought even by Jew or Roman Catholic? How can the eager denominational institution and the equally eager Y. M. C. A. be kept from prejudicing the educational situation before the interchurch educational work can be brought to earth, financed, and set in operation? The way is open for full articulation of church curriculum and state curriculum if denominational cooperation can be speeded up.

CURRICULUM ISSUES

The home base is now left behind. We may push that aside as negative, for the thoughtful student will soon accept the new environment with its new standards and will return home at Christmas or Easter with rather strong arguments in favor of the institutions above mentioned as operative at the campus. He may think of them as set over against the institutions and customs which operate in the home community. To do this is in error, to be sure, but what is there to guide him to his conclusions? Added to the fact that he arrived at the campus believing that the state school and the church are at war are certain other more positive factors.

The university curriculum is also misleading for it necessarily omits religion. Every field but religion is covered. Economics, physical science, literature, etc., loom large but there can be discovered neither among the required nor the elective courses any subjects which to him connote religion. To be certain if he were technically trained he would know that in history he will obtain knowledge of the religious motives which have vitalized men and movements. Of course, were he a graduate student, not a freshman, he would understand that under Semitic languages is the place to look for Bible courses and that to get training in the kingdom of God he should elect studies entitled "Archaeology of Palestine," or "Ionic Greek." But he is not a graduate student and his advisor who aids him in balancing his course is as apt to be a specialist in glaciers or bovine tuberculosis as in adolescent psychology. The primitive needs of this youth must run the gauntlet of specialization. Another factor also makes for accident. Under the drive of an economy policy in state politics the faculty advisor is no doubt over-worked and has little time to get acquainted with the lad. Here is an open field for the religious leader—the specialist in personal adjustments, whose object is service and whose method is the Christ-like compassion of a shepherd. The university pastor, because of the existence of this need, has come to stay.

FREEDOM AND FETTERS

More than any other quality, the place where Christianity is to be taught needs intellectual freedom. These universities possess that requirement. The absence of religious creed in the articles of the state institution, freedom from denominational sentiment among the alumni and the general expectation that a state university shall be at least impartial in religion, make this the rarest of places in which to teach Christianity to youth. Yet no one of the one hundred and fifty state universities and normal schools of the United States, enrolling nearly 200,000 students, has yet been utilized by the church to any appreciable extent. A few denominations, one here and another there, have seen the opening and are making beginnings. Where this has been done two phenomena appear. The first is ecclesiastical jealousy. The sister denominations, so called, have exerted as much energy to block the attempt, as the initiator has been able to expend upon the enterprise. Of course this has not only dampened public ardor and checked the collecting of funds but has also thrown into relief the denominational aspects and prejudiced the situation. Denominational Christianity unfortunately has little scruple against halting the kingdom of God as an incident, if the major purpose of checkmating a rival sect can be accomplished. This hindrance, however, has about spent itself and the general indications are that in states where such circumstances have not blighted the field, cooperative efforts will be feasible. The other is theological conservatism. It follows as night the day, that movements in the free atmosphere of a state university will always be by the liberal wing of the church. In certain centers movements by given scholars have at first shown promise. Later, because the success of these men in teaching religion at the state campus made necessary a frank, scientific and philosophical statement of belief, and these teachers gave it, they lost their support. This is notably true on the Pacific coast where a certain institution now half a century old—whose scholarship has been of the first rank and whose attitude toward sister communions has been commendable—has had to carry a stone of reactionary prejudice about its neck. Just now, when its endowment and vision should make possible a great interchurch faculty, new courses and perhaps new buildings, the reactionaries of not one denomination alone, but of several, are busy in simultaneous, if not combined, criticism. While this theological injustice is setting in, the academic freedom of that university, the largest state university in the United States, laughs at Christian impotence, confuses religion and denominationalism, and being denied the leadership of Jesus the greatest of teachers, is by the church itself kept back from the kingdom of God. To call this pathetic is inadequate. It amounts to chilling the souls of ten thousand youth. It amounts to a halting of the spirit of Christian brotherhood among the future leaders in that state.

A very different problem confronts us as we frankly and enthusiastically turn to this general field. The welcome given the church by our universities is altogether hearty. For three generations these professors have been ostracized, as it were, from religious circles in matters of education. All of them have been looked upon by the church and denounced as agnostic. The faculty Christian men who have thus been misjudged are tired of this mistreatment. The university authorities have grown weary of promoting public institutions under the religious ban, and now—cheered by the fact that all opposition has been unable to check the progress of the state university—the authorities, with a rather triumphant charity meet the repenting church educators more than half way. However, on the side of curriculum work there appears a great handicap. To date no educational norm or measuring rod exists whereby we can judge educational advancement regardless of the subject matter used in the class room. Every registrar must use his own catalog as the basis of credits to be exchanged. The College of Religion which sends credit with its students to a state university suffers sure refusal. The committee upon exchange credit promptly says: "Your work in these courses may have been of good rank. The teacher may have been adequately prepared and very skillful, but because there appears in our catalog no course to set opposite this one which you took in the school of religion, or church college, we must refuse to recognize your credit as advancing you toward our degree. It matters not whether Professor Moulton, formerly of Chicago in Biblical Literature, or Professor Kent of Yale in Biblical History, each a master in his line, was the teacher or not. The issue is closed and no credit can, under the prevailing system, or rather lack of system, be awarded by the state university. Here is a problem for the combined effort not only of experts in religious education but also for the combined effort and statesmanlike frankness of the American Association of College Presidents and the Association of State University Presidents. Until some more charitable attitude is manifested, little progress can be made in the matter of locating colleges of religion in affiliation at the state universities. The cordial spirit at the centers on the part of local churches and local universities, therefore, waits upon definite action by the larger educational units. The standard-fixing educational bodies must speak. A medium of exchange must be adopted.

To open this problem to debate, the Federal Council of Churches or the Council of Church Boards of Education might cause a conclave of the two major associations above referred to and from their discussion some temporary agreements could be reached for use while our new field of the "educational norm" and the great subject of "educational measurements" are being developed to a scientific basis. In the meantime America's most fertile and least cultivated field for religious education waits.

Business For Service

IN our study of industry in Britain nothing more encouraging has come under observation than the work of Seeborn Rowntree, the cocoa manufacturer of York. Mr. Rowntree is a Quaker. When Charles Booth, a retired London merchant, made his famous study of poverty in East London and found one-third of the people always in want, Mr. Rowntree said that might be true of London's East End, because that section was a sort of eddy in the currents of British industrial life and the flotsam and jetsam was drawn in there and left to stagnate, but it would not be true of other industrial centers. So he made a survey of his native city of York and found it only about five per cent better. Since then he has made surveys of many situations, including drink, unemployment, housing and methods of quick suburban transportation for the workers. Both in his public work as a practical sociologist and citizen and in his business as a manufacturer he has put his life into service and has demonstrated that business can be run on a service motive quite as well as can medicine or teaching, and that the motive of profit is not the sine qua non of business enterprise, let alone the only one that will make it a success.

Mr. Rowntree has developed a philosophy of business enterprise. It is so thoroughly practicable and Christian that many employers over here are listening to him. In justice it must be said that he is not alone in this; indeed there are now so many men of like mind that the employer who refuses to deal with the labor organization or to deal with his workingmen collectively is looked upon as a "mossback" and quite behind the times—a man without enterprise. The Rowntree works deals only with the unions, and their experience is so satisfactory that the unions care nothing about the closed shop program.

The Rowntree Philosophy

The Rowntree philosophy in short is this: Capital has no prior right over labor; it must give the best service to the community or give way to some system that will. The profit motive is not the sole one nor the best one, though of course a business must be profitable if it is to live and keep men working. Labor's charge is the first charge on industry because it is the human factor, and men must live before anything else can be considered. Therefore to give security to life in terms of an insured income, a high standard of home life, continuous employment and enough for old age is the first requirement, and an industry that cannot do that should be scrapped as a parasite upon humanity. After labor charge comes the interest charge on capital, which must have enough to keep it employed, though current interest rates are too high and should be worked down. The profits should be divided between the wage earner, the employer and the community. There is no defense of arbitrary management, though there must be effective administration through authority and discipline. All this can be arranged through an industrial democracy, that is, the representation of labor in the management of the works on matters of policy, leaving the managers and foremen in charge of processes. Mr. Rowntree believes we have not arrived at any ultima thule in matters of industrial management, but are evolving and must continue to evolve until industry comes to a full democratization and serves the community with an ethics and a standard of service quite as effective as that given by such professions as medicine.

Security of Life

His investigations of unemployment, housing, etc., led this great employer to feel as well as know the human side of labor's hold on the good things of life. He says labor's insecurity is a tragedy and that there is no fiction more indefensible than that capital bears all the risk. It is labor that bears the major risk, for capital can close down the works or curtail production and consequent cost, and at most lose money, while the wage earner thrown out of work by close- or shut-downs, is deprived of his living. Therefore the first charge upon industry, from the human standpoint (and any other standpoint is inhuman), is a living income for the workingman. Mr. Rowntree has only scorn for those who charge that labor only wastes and cannot be depended on to use its best chance. He says he has tried trusting it, and has never found it a whit less dependable than any other class of human beings.

To give wage earners security of life he has worked out carefully over a term of years a system that is justifying itself admirably. He thinks it is yet incomplete and he is pushing on its development. First comes a minimum wage, based upon a comfort, not a mere existence, standing of living. He defines a comfort standard as one by which the father as the bread winner can make a good enough living so that the mother can keep the house and the children go to school. He does not think this is sufficient but he makes it the first charge upon his industry, and contends that there should be first the largest possible wage and then an ultimate division of profits over and above taxes, depreciation and interest. Next he provides unemployment insurance to provide a wage income when business slackens or must shut down. His plan as developed up to the present yields one month's unemployment pay for each year of service and together with the government and union insurance guarantees that a man on a wage equalling $16 per week in American money will receive $12 per week. Thus if he has worked for two years he will be paid for 24 weeks at that rate, a time sufficient to cover even the most extended depression periods. This pension is covered by a charge of less than one-third of one per cent on the average pay roll. The government pays about $3, the union $1.20 and the factory about $7.80.

The wage earner never gets enough to provide for old age, says Mr. Rowntree, and there is nothing more tragical than to come to fifty and lose your job or to old age with no provision. So his insurance plan adds 30 shillings—about $6 at present rates of exchange—to the government's 15 shillings and retires all men at the age of sixty-five. To this an invalid pension is added. The whole scheme costs only a five per cent charge on the wage fund. All these funds are administered through the labor unions in close cooperation with the company. The other great coco manufacturers are planning to join Rowntree on these insurance schemes, and the government is studying an adaptation of them to the entire industrial life of the nation. In addition to this the company builds houses on the garden city plan, renting or selling them at cost plus a market interest charge to any and all who come, whether employes or not, but insuring thus to employes neat, sanitary, homelike cottages at actual cost and no speculative profits.

Joint Control With Labor

"Arbitrary control by the employer cannot be logically defended," says Mr. Rowntree, "nor can real cooperation of labor with employer be expected under it. The employe must be given, not merely as large a share in control as you must give him, but all that you possibly can give." Believing democracy must be applied to industry as well as to state and church, he builds upon a governmental analogy. For legislation, a joint representation of labor and management is provided, the various departments appointing from both sides. This committee is at present made up of 26 from management and 27 from labor. They make rules and determine policies in regard to all general matters. For executive, the management is responsible but all nominations for foreman, for instance, are referred to the group concerned, with right to file objections. The management has found from experience that either the selection must be acceptable or it is up to them to convince the group that it is necessary. Mr. Rowntree has no faith in the ability of a "gang" to elect their own boss—he thinks that is turning democracy over to mobocracy—for there would then be trading, favoritism, politics and other considerations governing the choice instead of sheer ability. On the other hand, he says nothing else is so necessary as to select as foremen those who are liked by the men and who have the greatest ability to lead men. Therefore he selects not the oldest or most skilled or most driving, but the most humane man—one who can manage others in a spirit of good will. On the judicial side is a joint committee in which there is an arbitrator. All differences are referred to this committee. Even when an employe's discharge has come up to him as manager and owner, appeal can be taken to an arbitral committee and his decision overruled. This procedure he allows because his fundamental conviction is that capital ownership is not the only title to ownership. Labor's participation and the investment of its capital in terms of skill and brawn have equal grounds with his own. It is apparent how necessary it is for labor to become corporate through a union just as capital is incorporated by law, if this conviction is to take working form and this program to be carried out. England is insured against bolshevism and all violent revolution in the measure that she develops Rowntrees.

British Table Talk

London, July 27, 1921.

THE summer mood is upon all of us at the moment. The journals are casting around for good subjects for a discussion which will fill their idle columns. Nothing so far has lighted the heather, but it is possible that when the subject is found it will have to do with the undying problems of religion. No such discussion was ever so animated as that which filled The Daily Telegraph in answer to the question: "Do we believe?" It is a sound axiom in journalism that there is nothing more interesting to everyman than religion, but it must be religion with life in it—not stuffy or afraid of the open air. But the feelers after such possible themes are not the only signs of summer. Perhaps the most significant of all is the staleness that creeps upon us before the holiday begins. "How weary, stale, flat and unprofitable" all things seem! At such a time there is no cure so swift as a breath of the sea or the moors.

* * *

The Discovery of Summer

Unhappily in some ways the church has discovered the summer as a time to be used. It may be an unjust charge, but I believe the discovery was made in America first of all, and sometimes we wish you hadn't. Once our fathers closed down for their season; now we go to camp and conference—a very jolly and profitable way, and yet there is wisdom in the maxim of William James, "Unclamp!" The mind and spirit need a holiday as well as the body, and possibly a true interpretation of the fourth commandment would include the provision of a yearly Sabbath in which we should do no work, neither preach nor write nor read serious books, but simply unclamp. This is the truth as I preach it, but in practice I go with the multitude to camp and Swanwick.

Reunion Once More

The Archbishop of York, who is rapidly becoming the most powerful advocate of reunion in this land, has visited the Wesleyan Methodist conference. There is a sharp though not unfriendly contention in that conference upon Methodist union. Some are for, led by Rev. Aldom French; others are against, led by Rev. J. E. Rattenbury. The real question is whether Methodists by uniting together now may not defer the possibility of a union with the church of England. Some in their thoughts of the Great Church face towards their brother Methodists, others towards Canterbury. The archbishop of course did not deal with these home problems. He was content to make a moving appeal for unity and discussed the three postulates of Lambeth. "We only invite you to confer with us and to take steps along the line of the Lambeth proposals. There is the vision. We ask you to share in it."

"Fifteen years ago," said the archbishop, "I visited the conference in Wesley's chapel. Then we exchanged desires for unity. I am here to ask, as common brothers, for an effort to achieve it, that the church of England and the Wesleyan church should equally seek a closer union of the widely-scattered fragments of the body of Christ. The first thing I ask is for fellowship—a fellowship to be realized in one body. We look on the church as the body of Christ where the gospel is realized. Unity is not to be realized by us, it is something which exists at the beginning. We do not say 'Come and be brothers,' but 'We are brothers, therefore let us manifest and rejoice in our brotherliness in one visible union.' The unity is not visible. It is broken into separated groups we call churches. But the mere contentment with that is a scandal to us all. No one of these sundered fragments can arrogate to itself the claim of the church of Christ. We are all schismata of the one body. Let us look forward and forget the things which divided us." He pointed out that union did not mean absorption. Each section of the one church would retain its characteristics. "I felt something of your gift when I came in and heard you sing, and how I longed to have some of that spirit communicated to our church. You have gifts to give us and we have gifts to give to you."

The National Assembly

At the National Assembly of the church of England there was a long and careful discussion upon the training of candidates for the holy ministry. At Knutsford when the war was over there was established an Ordination Test School where those who had a willingness to consider their calling to the ministry were given a chance to test themselves. The school was housed in a disused prison and it proved a place of great joy and hope and a center of healthy comradeship. The question before the assembly was whether this school with the expense involved was to be continued and by a large majority it was decided to carry on. This means in effect that no candidate who is otherwise suitable will be debarred from the ministry through lack of funds.

The Student Conference

The student movement has held its July meeting at Swanwick. From the testimony of those who are present there appears to have been the same willingness as in previous years to attract great themes and the audacity that does not shrink from adventures. Among the speakers were Canon Barnes, Dr. Oman, Rev. W. R. Maltby, and the thought of the conference was directed to the vision and knowledge of God. But there was no neglect of the "practick part" as Bunyan called it. "It was very notable that, in spite of this strong emphasis upon theology and speculative thought, the bulk of the discussions, those countless personal talks which are the chief feature of Swanwick, were concerned with moral and concrete problems, the use of time and money, the right to leisure and comfort, the possibilities of a Christian industry and such-like. The contrast to last year, when abstract and doctrinal topics loomed largest, seemed to show that the intellectual unrest of the war was settling down, and that students, having made up their minds about Christ, were now going on to ask what their duty was towards him."

Congregational Church Plans Advance

The definition of a Congregationalist in this country is "a man who will not take a paper which bears the name of Congregationalist and supports a missionary society which is called the London Missionary Society, and in general is the least denominational of Christians." This is true enough, but not the whole truth, and at the present moment the Congregationalists of this land are much concerned with their own churches and desire to make them fitter instruments for the kingdom of God. They begin to see that much is lacking and they are looking within. The scheme to raise £500,000 will be but the outward sign which will follow the coming of a new interest and a fresh energy. The scheme has been passed, but the signal has not yet been given for the advance of the whole body. It is likely that there will be a strong emphasis upon the needs of the spiritual life within these churches. Money will be a fruit not a root. The autumnal assembly is to be held in Bristol when more will be heard of this matter. The cause of thanksgiving is the ear-marking out of the half-million of a large donation for the London Missionary Society. This is in itself a pledge that there will be no narrowness of outlook and no outdated sectarianism.

A Journalist on Sin

"Let us steal the word 'sin' from the theologians. It is a good word that ought not to be allowed to wither into obsolescence. It is a far better word than 'crime,' which has elbowed is out of literature and almost out of life. The criminal is only the sinner who has been found out. Let us leave the word 'crime' to the lawyer, and keep the word sin for ourselves. It is the jury and the judge who convict us of crime, but we are convicted of sin by the jury and judge within our own breast. I do not know whether the criminal who is convicted of crime rejoices as he goes to prison, but I do know that the man who is convicted of sin steps into the merry light of liberty. Sin is boredom; goodness is gladness."

Mr. James Douglas, who writes these words in "The Express," is one of our most gifted and eloquent journalists. It is not without significance that such a man should call for a word too often left "bedridden in the dormitory of the soul." His testimony may make some preachers wonder whether after all they have been right in discarding words like "sin" out of deference to a supposed impatience among modern hearers. It is truer to say with Sir Michael Sadler that the young like their elders to be honest, outspoken and sincere. They resent any pretense at goodness, any conventional deference to the proprieties and a hollow respectability. They question the old tabus. In religion they dislike vain repetitions—not repetitions, but only when the repetition is vain. That goes to the root of the matter. Neither youth nor age will ever tire of sincerity and a living experience. It is a pure delusion to imagine that without these things changes in phraseology will appease the modern hearer.

Sacerdos or Pontifex?

That powerful writer, Mr. C. E. Raven, puts the distinction between the Sacerdos and the Pontifex very boldly in "The Challenge." The Sacerdos says in effect: "I stand upon the Holy Mountain where God dwells in cloud and splendor. Come up hither to me ye inhabitants of the earth; come up and see God! Here in the high places must be your dwelling if you would escape from the doom of the cities of the plain." "A church built on these lines will begin as a caste and end as a clique." "Pontifex, bridge-builder, on the other hand remains. We cannot span a chasm from one side only. If divine and human are to be joined, it must be by a cooperative effort from each edge of the gulf; not by standing aloof on the mountain-top, but by coming right down amongst us into the valley, ennobling all our common life and discovering to us its unity in God so that men are joined together by a literal and corporate oneness is the work of atonement accomplished."

A Tragedy?

Twenty-nine years ago a boy was born in Tasmania, the son of a Christian minister. At school and at college in his own island he showed masterly gifts. After graduating, he won a Rhodes scholarship and passed Oxford, where he won, after a brilliant career, a senior demyship at Magdalen College. He was a most brilliant student of medicine and did advanced work of great promise. During the war he served as surgeon with the French army and afterwards in London as house physician in a large hospital. Then he offered himself as a medical missionary for China and was sent by the London Missionary Society to Hongkong. He sailed from London in May. This man, Dr. Eric Woods, died on July 13 of pneumonia at Hongkong, where he had been for three weeks. Is that a tragedy or not? All depends upon the answer to another question: Is there any sequel? Are such human powers, disciplined in years of mental strife, thrown away? If so, this must be a scene of waste compared to which the most profligate government on earth is parsimonious. But we can trust that there shall be not one good lost. "On the earth the broken arc, in the heavens the perfect round."

The Sense of Sin

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In The Christian Century of May 19 there appeared an editorial entitled "The Sense of Sin in Modern Life." It is not my purpose to controvert what the editor says, for in some points I agree with him; but my analysis differs materially from his, and it is with the idea of explaining, in part at least, the lack of the sense of sin in modern life, that I write this article.

The editor refers to Dean Inge, of St. Paul's, as saying that the decay of the sense of sin "has come about mainly in the last fifty years. There are some other things that "have come about in the last fifty years," which, in my opinion, bear a vital relationship to the decay of the sense of sin. Among these are:

1. A widespread belief in the doctrine of organic evolution. I shall not discuss the correctness or incorrectness of this theory. I wish to speak only of its relation to the decay of the sense of sin. It is clearly evident that the man who accepts the doctrine of organic evolution—that man developed from the lower forms of life, and that he himself may develop into still higher forms—that he is only one of a long, perhaps endless, series; that there is no God, or if there is one,—it is clearly evident, I say, that a man who believes such a doctrine, will have little conception of himself as a sinful being. Instead of thinking of himself in relation to an all-wise, benevolent, and loving, but offended Creator, he thinks of himself only in relation to the world about him, and especially in relation to the animal world from which, according to his own theory, he developed. Here, I think, is one of the prime causes of the decay of the sense of sin.

2. The reduction of the Bible to a human book. If the Bible is only a human production, written by uninspired men, then its moral teachings are only the opinions of men—of fallible men. Even the moral teachings of Jesus, in both precept and example, are those of only a man, and are, therefore, subject to revision, even elimination, as we think best. In other words, the reduction of the Bible to a human basis destroys it as a criterion of moral action, tends to allow each man to set up his own standard or name, and unavoidably reduces the sense of sin.

3. The conception of Christianity as only a force for social amelioration—a horizontal, but not a perpendicular force. According to this doctrine, the great need of humanity is not personal regeneration, but social reformation. Man needs to correct his relationship to his fellow man, but is under no necessity of correcting his relationship to God. Here is fruitful cause for the decay of the sense of sin.

4. Absorption in things material. The last fifty years have been remarkable for the development of material interests and scientific attainments. Multitudes have allowed these things to dominate their lives to such an extent that moral and spiritual interests have been relegated to second place and sometimes to no place at all. When men's minds are chiefly absorbed in scientific, philosophical and industrial pursuits, the sense of sin will suffer immeasurably.

5. Christian Science. This philosophy (I do not call it a religion) teaches that sin is a chimera, a dream. Everything is all right if we only knew it. Such teaching, if followed to its logical conclusion, will destroy the sense of sin altogether.

Along with these developments in the last half century have come an increase in crime, in the desecration of the Lord's day, in a decrease in parental authority, in an increase of irreverence and of an inordinate desire for pleasure, besides other ominous signs. We believe the world, on the whole, is getting better; but these social and moral phenomena may well cause us to pause. Is it not time for the church of our Lord to call back, in stentorian voice, all men everywhere, to the consciousness of the reality of a loving, but offended, yet forgiving, God, to the fact that man is a sinner and needs redemption? Is it not time to reemphasize Jesus' distinction between the lost and the saved? To announce anew the sovereignty of God over the lives of men? To call the world to an estimation of moral and spiritual values as the supreme thing in life? Thus it seems to me. May the heavenly Father lead us all into the way, the truth, and the life."

Shall the Church Advertise?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: This question was discussed pro and con when the "Ad Club" of our city had as its guests a group of ministers from the local churches. The purpose of the meeting was undoubtedly an effort on the part of the business men to interest the clergy in the subject of church advertising. Much has been said in the past concerning the above subject both by laymen and ministers. In these days of extensive advertising in the business world it is a very vital subject because of the great part it plays in our business life. So important is the question of advertising today that even the church cannot set it aside any more than it can lay aside music or any other important branch of the church life. The meeting which we had with the business men the other day brought this fact home to our minds.

It was interesting indeed to see how these business men opened up the subject. The first speaker gave an illustration, which had been brought to his attention, of a church which had made rapid growth as a result of extensive advertising. Then followed a bank president, who spoke on the subject, "Will advertising lower the dignity of the church?" He went on to say that when he started in the banking business thirty-five years ago, the bank which advertised was looked at with suspicion, but today almost the opposite is true. He believes that advertising will do for the church what it has done for the bank.

Not the least interesting of the Ad Club speakers was the publicity manager of a local department store. He argued that God's workmen have always advertised. Said he: "When Moses wanted to save the children of Israel he went up in the mountains and came back displaying, to the wayward tribes, two tablets of stone on which were engraved the ten commandments. What is that but advertising?" According to this speaker not only did Moses advertise but Christ "employed verbal advertising by sending his twelve disciples throughout the countryside." "Not only," he continued, "should the minister advertise, but he must give to the people what he advertises." He referred to some experiences of attending services where the minister had advertised one subject and preached on something else.

The publicity manager brought out a side of the divine revelation which most of the ministers who were present had never considered. I think that the ministers were inclined to doubt that either Moses or Jesus had in mind the subject of advertising when these incidents occurred. Nevertheless it was interesting to get the business man's point of view, for is it not true that these men are having a large share in the work of extending the kingdom?

After the subject of advertising had been opened by the members of the Ad Club several of the ministers were called upon to give their views. It might be said that the ideas of the ministers were just as varied as those of the laymen. I don't think any of the brethren present thought that church advertising, if carried on properly, was undignified. The question which seemed to be uppermost in the minds of the ministers was, "Will church advertising bring the results that it does in the business world? How shall we advertise? and Who will do the advertising?"

For instance, one minister brought out the fact that we are unlike the business men inasmuch as the churches are not in competition with each other. If we were in competition the larger churches would have a decided advantage over the smaller and struggling organizations. Some of the larger churches could well afford to spend a few thousand dollars in advertising where the expenditure of a few hundred would cripple the budget of those churches which now have a hard time in making ends meet. Then again, would the people who are outside of the churches be reached, or would the church which put on the biggest advertising scheme be filled up by people from the smaller churches? There is no doubt that the churches would be filled if an extensive advertising scheme could be carried on, but is that what the church is trying to do?

One minister touched upon a question which seemed to be in the minds of most of the ministers present. If we are to advertise, how shall we go about it, what shall we say? All seemed agreed that we are salesmen, and that we are salesmen of the greatest product in all the world. That each Sabbath day we are engaged in peaching the way of eternal life. How can we bring this fact home to the minds of the unchurched? It staggers us when we think of the thousands of men, women and children of our own land who never hear the gospel preached from one year's end to another. Most churches today use a bulletin board of some kind. Some have a bulletin and don't use it. Many have a church weekly, and nearly all have the opportunity of announcing the Sabbath services in the local newspapers. These methods, according to these business men, are insufficient because there is not enough of variety.

If the meeting with the business men was intended to arouse our interest in the subject of advertising I think that on the whole it was successful, but it did not go further than that. We came away from that meeting with no definite ideas in mind as to how to proceed to carry on church advertising. We were all convinced, business men as well as clergy, that the subject of church publicity is one which has many sides and must be considered all by itself. That the methods used in big business won't work in the church to bring the best results. One of the ministers expressed a great truth when he said: "The greatest advertisement that the church, like any other concern, is its output." As Dr. William E. Barton said some years ago, "The best kind of advertising is that which the men of the church can do." Perhaps this is what the publicity manager had in mind when he spoke of Jesus sending his disciples forth to teach all nations. We must endeavor to make advertising agents of all the members of the church. Christian people everywhere must have impressed upon them the fact that they are messengers sent out to carry the "good news." Other methods no doubt will bring results, but there will be the greatest results obtained when all Christians everywhere adopt the method Jesus used when he told his disciples to go and tell others.

The Eclipse of Modesty

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The article by Rev. Mark Wayne Williams in your August 11 issue entitled, "The Disappearing Brotherhood," sets forth a valuable truth: the necessity for new leadership in changing times involves a difficult and heroic renunciation on the part of those who must give up the direction of religious interests. But one cannot help questioning the introductory assertions. That modesty is not a modern virtue and that self-sufficiency and self-confidence are essential to all success, commercial, political and prophetic, are assumptions that do not help the conclusion.

Bold and extensive personal claims, we are told, constitute "the high art of advertisement." In point of fact, is there anything distinctly modern in the influence of braggadocio on the thoughtless crowd? Has not the capable charlatan succeeded in all ages? Fortunes have in recent times been made from nostrums like Hood's Sarsaparilla or Green's Nervura; but is this anything more than a modern survival of the influence of the witch-doctor over the savage tribe? Such influence decreases in exact proportion to the growth of knowledge. This writer says, "You must not be too much the braggart and boaster. You must not offensively display your self-conceit." This is virtually an admission that extravagant personal claims arouse suspicion in intelligent minds.

"Modesty," we are told, "is not a natural attribute of the prophets." Self-sufficiency appears to be the foundation of prophetic leadership. So objectionable a doctrine as this should not pass unchallenged.

Is it not written of the first Hebrew prophet, "Now the man, Moses, was very meek"? Not until his profound modesty was overcome by a divine call and the assurance of divine aid could he venture on his mission. "Humility does not well describe Elijah nor Hosea nor Isaiah nor John the Baptist," this writer says. What is there to show that these prophets were not as humble-minded as Moses? Is not the fact that they were true, God-inspired prophets presumptive evidence that they had this virtue? "God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble." On at least one recorded occasion, Elijah was overwhelmed to the point of despair by the sense of his own weakness and insufficiency. The authority of the "still, small voice" and the power of the Holy Spirit were what took him back to his work. The sense of utter dependence on God appears to be the sine qua non of prophetic inspiration.

In the New Testament, the "strong Son of God," himself the supreme flower of Israel's prophetic genius, testifies: "All things that I have heard from my father I have made known unto you." In this and in many other tender passages he accepts the same humble dependence; while he emphatically endorses the prophetic dictum, "The meek shall inherit the earth."

The prominence of humility or meekness in the Pauline catalogue of virtues indicates that the apostle knew its value in his own experience; also that he had no fear that it would sap the prophetic spirit or cut the nerve of missionary aggressiveness.

The question naturally arises, Can there be a true prophet in whose experience self-confidence has not given place to faith in God?

To the undiscerning, self-sufficiency may serve as a substitute for prophetic inspiration, but it will not stand all tests, neither will it endure. The scriptural example is Zedekiah, the son of Chenaanah, Ahab's court prophet. The popular school of prophets gave him the center of the stage and chanted his choruses. He was a great success. Doubtless he looked like a million dollars and made Micaiah look like thirty cents. Impudence and self-confidence enabled him to "put it over" in truly modern style. But God was not with him. Self-confidence gives courage of an inferior type, but Christian heroism abides in humility surcharged with faith in God.

All down the line of Christian history the virtue of unfeigned humility has adorned the characters of its shining lights. Without it they would not have been the prophets, saints and heroes that they were. Without it a man cannot, in this day, be a saint, a Christian, or even a true gentleman.

Let me add as a concluding word that not Mr. Williams' article alone calls forth this protest. The sentiment it expresses is widespread. The worship of money-making success, often with little regard to methods and character, is affecting religious thought. Instead of the business world becoming purified by Christian faith, there is danger that Christian faith may be vitiated by commercial materialism.

In the wording of Mr. Williams' opening paragraph there is a hint of irony, as if he is half-laughing at the idea he feels constrained to endorse. This makes the task of converting him seem quite hopeful. It is not improbable that he is one of those excellent men who feel that, in order to avoid suspicion of insincerity, and as part of the game, it is necessary to assume a pose of self-confidence and self-ambition, which hides their real spiritual humility. Perfect candor and simplicity are rare and difficult, but very delightful attainments.

Winning for Christ Through Yourself*

WHAT was it that won this jailer? Evidently here is a rather sudden transformation. When he hears the assuring voice of his prisoner crying, "Do yourself no harm, for we are all here," he quickly decided to accept Paul's religion. A few hours prior to this a man with his traveling companion had been brought to the jail. The accusation had been disturbance of the peace, the real reason was that this man had cured a poor demented girl. The mob in the market place had been paid to howl by the owners of this girl. The jailer had not lived in the town for years for nothing, he knew the politics of the place. He knew that Paul was innocent and when he looked upon this intelligent man and his equally attractive companion, Silas, a strange sympathy sprang up. Darkness came down upon the city, he sought his bed but could not sleep. That dark-complexioned little man had stirred him to the depths. And now what was this? Hymns from the inner world! With bleeding backs, with feet fastened in excruciating stocks, Paul and Silas were singing. These men had a religion that triumphed over unpleasant surroundings. Evidently they felt that their gods were still with them. Crashing out of the hot night came a storm and an earthquake; never had the old prison rocked as it did then. He sprang from his bed as the fury of the earthquake continued, the doors were opened—if his prisoners escaped his own life must pay the forfeit—surely they had gone—they were not fools—he drew his sword—his Roman soul could conceive of no honorable thing now but suicide—and then—he hears the little man's soothing voice. Lights are brought. He finds that Paul has told the truth. His relief is infinite. He asks for Paul's religion. He instantly accepts it and with his family is baptized immediately. Then he spreads a feast for Paul and Silas after having washed their wounds. There was no time to take a course in theology. An earthquake was not unheard of. It was the impress of Paul's personality, together with these strenuous experiences, that crystallized his religious views. "Be ye imitators of me as I am of Jesus Christ" was Paul's formula. That always struck me as a brave, almost blasphemous word. But it was quite correct and proper. I once heard a college president say that he considered it perfectly right to win people to Christ by first winning them to himself! I was shocked into consciousness by that remarkable statement. But it is true. Many young men have been won for Christ because they saw Christ in that college man. Out in China they call Dr. Macklin the "Jesus-man." Who would doubt but that these simple souls are won to Christ through Dr. Macklin? Would we accept Jesus at all did he not demonstrate himself in the lives of people whom we know? We saw Christ in our fathers and mothers. We saw Christ in strong young men. Many a young man or woman going away to a summer conference and coming into contact with choice young people from many schools finds his own soul greatly strengthened. It was my privilege to go to Northfield in my junior year and to meet Robert Speer, Mr. Moody and other great souls, but it was the contact with over four hundred other young fellows from Yale, Harvard and across the seas that helped me to feel what a hold Jesus had on the youth of my day. A mighty sense of companionship possessed me, I felt myself a part of a glorious company.

I know of a quiet young man, who, when he was first seen, impressed us as cold and selfish. He bore acquaintance. He made friends. They liked him. I have seen him lead man after man to Christ so quietly that you thought that someone else was doing it. Jesus must have interpreters. Unless people can see religion working in your life they will have none of it. The disgust at hypocrisy is the other side of this shield. It is helpful to know that men are convinced by the sincerity of your life. If you stand with Christ, then winning a man to yourself wins. Make men believe in Christ because they believe in you.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

How Methodists Find Ministers

Only one third of the Methodist ministers of the country come into their professional work through the road of the college and the theological seminary. The remainder have been finding their places in the church direct from the high schools, or even with less than a high school education. The Methodists cannot increase the number of their seminary students rapidly enough to meet the needs, so they are now making a persistent effort to increase the quality of the short course men. In the United States there are 3,500 men who are studying theology by correspondence under the direction of the bishop. These men are required to meet their instructors in personal work for a brief period each summer, in this way setting up personal relationships. Recently there has been a radical revision of the text-books that are offered these men for correspondence study. The new text-books have a more modern theological outlook, and contain also the most modern ideas in the way of church administration.

Catholic Daily Has Lasted a Year

While the American Daily Standard, the Protestant daily of Chicago, lived only three months, the Roman Catholic daily, the Daily American Tribune of Dubuque, Iowa, has continued for a year. It has 14,000 subscribers, 95 per cent of whom receive their paper by mail. Catholic opinion, as expressed in magazines, seems to lean to the idea that such dailies are easier floated in small cities than in metropolitan centers. There is no agreement at present that such a venture would be wise either in New York or Chicago. The adventurers of the Chicago daily have been wisely observed by Catholic newspaper men, and proper lessons drawn. Catholic commentators assert that Protestantism is too much divided to support such a paper, and this opinion is probably true to the facts.

Disciples Mission Official Returns From Latin America

Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, vice president of the United Christian Missionary Society, has recently returned from a five months trip in Latin America. The Disciples have been given a large assignment of territory in Mexico, Argentina and Paraguay. Mrs. Atwater has been trying to make an estimate of what is involved in this missionary responsibility. The story of her trip will be one of the features of the Disciples convention at Winona Lake, Ind., August 28-September 4.

Methodist Woman Sends Disciples Missionary to Field

Denominational lines count for less than ever in the great task of evangelizing the world. Dr. A. L. Shelton, the Disciples missionary to Tibet, who was in the hands of bandits for months, has made a strong appeal to the religious enthusiasm of America. So profound was the impression he made on one audience that a Methodist lady has sent to the offices of the United Christian Missionary Society two thousand dollars with which to finance the return of Dr. Shelton to his far-away field. This gracious gift to the Disciples society is matched by many others received by denominational boards in which the sectarian wires were badly twisted up.

Largest Correspondence School of Religion

Moody Institute is probably the largest correspondence school of Bible study in the world. At the present time 6,900 active students are enrolled and these are located not only in the United States, but in many other countries of the world. On August 11 the summer quarter commencement day was held, and eighty students were graduated. These students are of less than bachelor of arts rank in their academic experience. Twenty-three of the eighty graduated from the missionary training course. Rev. Joseph Taylor Britain, D.D., pastor of Central Presbyterian church of Columbus, Ohio, was the speaker.

Make Up Fund for Balkan Delegates

It looked as though the Balkan delegates to the Pan-Presbyterian convention at Pittsburgh, September 16-24, would not be able to reach the meeting. Many of the countries of central Europe and the Balkan region are so impoverished that travel is impossible. Some generous Presbyterians of Pittsburgh made up a purse for the benefit of these delegates, and it is now assured that at least ten of them will be present. In addition there will be delegates from England, Scotland, Ireland, Australia and South Africa. All the denominations that hold to the Presbyterian system of church government and who accept the doctrines commonly called Calvinistic will be represented in the meeting. Three hundred delegates will be enrolled. The last meeting of this sort was held in Aberdeen. Pittsburgh Presbyterians will entertain the delegates in private homes.

Swedenborgians Celebrate Centennial

Disciples of the Swedish mystic Swedenborg recently celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Church of the New Jerusalem in America. The centennial celebration was held in Boston where the first missionaries of the new faith began their work. The meeting discussed improved methods for propagating the faith and also a program for strengthening their church college at Urbana, Ohio, and the theological seminary at Cambridge, Mass.

The Church for the Whole Family

First Presbyterian church at Gibbon, Neb., under the pastorate of Rev. Oliver C. Johnson, is notably successful in developing and holding the interests of the young people. The church has three Christian Endeavor societies, all active and flourishing. One of the mediums of promotion is a series of camp fires by the Senior and Intermediate Christian Endeavor societies. The members appear in Indian costume, sing songs in Indian dialect, have exhibits of Indian blankets, pottery and weapons, blaze the forest trees with Indian Bible verses and shoot arrows broadcast to which are attached Indian Christian messages. They debate questions about Indians and Christianity and take up offerings of Indian-head pennies in Indian pottery jars. The Junior Christian Endeavor Society conducts home mission studies and will in September hold a commencement service at which a large number will be graduated into the intermediate society. One of the recent junior events was a public exhibition at which they made over the

Churches Agree on Social Program

WHEN Roman Catholics, Episcopalians and Freechurchmen can get together in a common meeting and issue a common manifesto in the name of Christianity, something has evidently happened to sectarian prejudice. This actually happened in London recently when a group met in Hyde Park to consider the social problem. The movement has the ardent support of such interesting personalities as Dr. Orchard, Dr. Dearmer, Miss Maude Royden and six of the bishops of the Established church. The message given out from the meeting was as follows:

"In the face of the complete collapse of our existing economic, industrial and social order, and the bankruptcy of European statesmanship, this meeting calls upon all men and women of goodwill to recognize that the solution of the present deadlock can only be found by the practical application of the principles of Christianity to all the departments of human life.

"It declares that a persistent refusal to apply these principles of Truth, Justice and Brotherly Love is a denial of Jesus Christ who, on Calvary, died in their defense.

"It further records its conviction that the existing system, being largely based on unrestricted competition for private and sectional advantage, must be ended, since it fosters the sins of avarice and injustice, lays a yoke of thralldom and poverty upon masses of men and women, and makes war practically inevitable.

"Therefore, it urges all Christian people to recognize, in the collapse of the old society, a God-given opportunity of building up a new order founded on brotherly cooperation in service for the common good."

red flag of anarchy into a Christian American flag. The Gibbon church has another active organization known as the Live Wires. This is a men's class, which renders community service as well as studies the Bible. It recently established in the town tourist park an oven for the use of travelers stopping to take a roadside meal. Mr. Johnson issues each month a church letter which goes to every member of the congregation. He calls his church "The Church for the Whole Family," and he makes his monthly letter friendly, spiritual and inspirational, with practical suggestions for developing all lines of church work.

Methodists Will Hold World Conference

All those who acknowledge themselves to be the spiritual children of John Wesley will be represented at the Fifth Ecumenical Methodist Conference in London September 6-16. The last meeting of this kind was held ten years ago. The program has not gone into print yet owing to frequent changes in the plans. Many who had planned to go have found themselves unable to do so, and this has made it difficult to assemble the program. The opening sermon of the conference will be preached by Rev. S. P. Rose of Montreal, Canada. A pleasant feature of the meetings will be the fact that the American delegates will be entertained in private homes. The total group will be five hundred and fifty, and of these three hundred and twenty-five belong to the "western section." The last conference was held in Toronto. The coming meeting will be the first that has met since the war, and the problems that will be considered are of an urgent character. The denominational families tend more and more to form world-wide fellowships which fact bears testimony to the growing consciousness that the religion of Jesus Christ is a world fellowship, and that this fellowship should create a truly catholic church.

Disciples Will Hold Evangelistic Conference at Winona

There will be no "Doctrinal Congress" at the Disciples national convention this year, but announcements have recently been made by the officers of the National Evangelistic Association that an evangelistic conference will be held on August 27-29. The speakers will include Rev. O. E. Hamilton, Rev. Jesse M. Bader, Rev. Charles Reign Scoville, Rev. C. R. L. Vawter, Rev. John L. Brandt, Rev. C. J. Sharp, and Rev. H. H. Peters. The topics discussed will be for the most part of a practical nature, with the possible exception of an address by Rev. O. E. Hamilton, the president of the association, on "Stewardship of the Word." This organization formerly held its annual meeting at Bethany Park, Ind., but in recent years the meetings have so declined in size that the future of the organization is problematical.

Another Date Set for the End of the World

Many times in the last fifty years the millennialists have set the date for the end of the world. Following the Millerite excitement of the past century, this has been the favorite occupation for a certain kind of popular religious leader. The problem is a very difficult one. If the date is set too far ahead, people go right on with business and pleasure. If it is set too near, the prophet lives long enough to be derided as a false prophet. Pastor Russell lived to be embarrassed by the failure of his prophecies concerning the end of the world in 1914. Now comes Wilbur Glenn Voliva, "theocrat" of Zion City, Ill., and urges the faithful to get ready for the end of the world in 1923. It is well that he has set the date so near. Mr. Voliva is the successor of Dr. Dowie of faith-healing fame.

Big Money for Religious Songs

Few people realize how well a popular song writer is remunerated. A popular religious song has the advantage of staying in vogue long enough to accumulate large royalties. They are still singing the "Glory Song," long after most people have quite forgotten "Good Morning, Mr. Zip, Zip, Zip." Recently the matter of song royalties was made a matter of court action. The song "In the Sweet Bye and Bye," which has been popular in evangelical circles for a generation, was written by Joseph Webster. His heirs sued the Oliver Ditson Company of Boston for accumulated royalties and secured a judgment for $56,000. More than one popular religious song has meant a competency for life for its author.

Have Never Heard of Ten Commandments

The religious illiteracy of our age is one of the appalling facts that lies behind the juvenile delinquency that disturbs so many communities. A Brooklyn public school recently made an effort to find out what the pupils knew about the Ten Commandments. Out of 13,737 children that were questioned there were 351 that had never heard of Commandments at all, and a much larger number who did not know what this body of law contained. In questioning the children with regard to ethical obligation it was discovered that they had no substitute for the Ten Commandments. The ideas of ethical principles were vague and altogether inadequate. These discoveries on the part of public school teachers indicate a new sensitiveness to the inadequacy of the public school program. At Rockford, Ill., a vacation school is carried on by certain devoted public school teachers in south town where the population is predominantly Italian. The Winnebago Street Community church (Methodist) has provided morning Bible classes for these public school pupils and large numbers of them are attending the classes in spite of the efforts of priests and sisters to discourage Bible study in a Protestant church.

A Community Church That Interests the Whole Community

In Parkdale, Ore., is a church which was once Presbyterian but which in recent years has been operated as a community church. Though still connected with the Presbyterian denomination, the union idea is continually emphasized and the doctrinal differences of Christians minimized. This church prides itself in its up-to-date ways of meeting community problems. In that country of magnificent distances the Sunday school was not as large as it should be. A bus was rented and operated at cost to haul the children to the school and home again. The Men's Forum talks over community problems and recently was able to secure a number of miles of good roads for the further unification of the community. The church has an active and an associate membership. People who do not wish to sever their connection with the denomination to which they have been attached in another community are received as associate members. Rev. W. O. Benthin is pastor of this church.

Three Altars in One Church

A mountain community in Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, is to have a new church building in which the people may worship according to their preferences. The new building will contain an altar arranged for the Catholic ritual, one for the Episcopal and still another for

Remaking New York's Church Map

THE extensive improvements that are planned for the city of New York will affect profoundly the vast ecclesiastical properties of that city. The Congregationalist has summed up briefly the far-reaching effect of the improvements that are under consideration, so far as the churches are concerned. Here is the way the Boston journal views the situation:

"New York church leaders are delaying their plans of extension. This is because of expected changes in the city that will cause numerous adjustments. A new harbor in Jamaica Bay is likely to turn Brooklyn and vicinity into an immense business district, and most of the churches will move. A new tunnel to New Jersey is expected to send those who still have homes in Manhattan out into the country, with a similar effect upon the churches. Besides these changes new bridges over the Hudson are probable. This situation is causing much thinking, as a half billion dollars in ecclesiastical property will be affected. It is a time for wise planning. Many new sites in the suburbs must be found for the churches down town. Certain centers must be maintained and new methods adopted to meet the changed circumstances. Above all, this situation calls for statesmanlike planning among the denominations that will remove competition and make the new arrangements meet all the needs of the people efficiently and economically. Cooperation should become the great watchword of the churches. A fine example New York may set for the nation."

the use of the evangelical sects. It is hoped that in this way all the people in the community may have religious opportunities.

Disciples Make Large Growth in Florida

Disciples leaders in Florida are insisting that their state will be the banner one in the reports at the next international convention. A net gain of thirty per cent has been made in that state during the past year. Doubtless the tourist traffic has had something to do with this growth, but there has been a rapid strengthening of the ministry. Better buildings and more open-minded leadership have brought results in a state where a few years ago there were but few Disciples churches.

Popular Bible Movement Wins the Ecclesiastics

A few years ago all Greece was torn with controversy. The introduction of Bibles in the modern vernacular from America brought down upon the heads of the innovators the wrathful denunciations of bishops and students who were purists in speech. However, the popular Bible movement has at last won. The people have insisted upon having their Bible in a language which they can read. The king himself gave approval the other day for the printing of the new Bibles and the bishops have withdrawn their objections. This illustrates the truth that no church, however conservative, can continually resist change. The war has created conditions which have hastened ecclesiastical evolution in many countries.

Information About the Lutherans Is Now Available

In celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the Diet of Worms, the Lutheran church in America has issued a large volume of almost a thousand pages in which there is detailed information with regard to Lutheranism throughout the world. Most people will be surprised to learn that there are 8,150,000 Lutherans, and of this number 1,500,000 are in the United States. Interest in education is evidenced by the 144 higher schools to be found in various parts of the country. Of these 33 are theological schools. A dozen publication houses pour out an abundant literature. The philanthropic interest is shown by 80 homes for orphans, 25 home finding societies, 59 homes for the aged, 81 hospitals for defectives and 35 general hospitals.

How Shall I Get Ready to Preach?

A church college gives religious training a state school may not give. A state university gives a broader and more thorough training than the average church college can give.

At the Bible College of Missouri a student obtains an intensive religious training while getting the educational benefits of the University of Missouri. Attending both schools at once, he combines the merits of both.

Ministerial students earn their way preaching for near-by churches.

The Sword or The Cross?

By Kirby Page

The Sword or The Cross?

From "The Nation" (New York)

"In his searching little volume, 'The Sword or the Cross,' Mr. Page presents with force and truth the extreme position against war which must in our opinion be taken by everybody who would be a sincere and loyal follower of the teachings of Jesus. Undoubtedly this book would not have been allowed to circulate during the war, which is but another proof of the fact that all wars constitute in themselves a denial of Jesus and everything that he stood for. Mr. Page does not hesitate to accept the logical consequences of his position. Thus he declares in answer to the question whether war is justifiable as a means of preserving political liberty that 'the following of Jesus Christ is infinitely more important than the maintenance of political liberty.' Had the Bolsheviks but had the vision to see this at Brest-Litovsk, had they but refused to fight and also to sign the shameless German demands, and thus to resist the German evil, their whole status in the world, and probably their future, would be entirely different. We wish for Mr. Page's little volume what is, alas! an impossible wish, that it be placed in the hands of every school child in this allegedly Christian nation. It would do a world of good and be a powerful weapon in the fight which is now on to save humanity from being exterminated by the very science of warfare which it has lately devised, it being today a problem whether war shall go or civilization perish. Not the least of Mr. Page's service is his final disposition of those phrases of Jesus which, together with the episode of the money-changers in the temple, are so blasphemously cited by the believers in mass-murder to make it appear that Jesus condoned what would have made all his teachings merely ghastly hypocrisy."

The Most Beautiful Hymnal Published by the American Church

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH, edited by Charles Clayton Morrison and Herbert L. Willett, is a delight to the eye and to the hand. No expense has been spared in its production. The paper is the best and of perfect color. The binding is most attractive. Great care has been bestowed on the "make-up" of the pages. They are attractive to the eye. The hymns seem almost to sing themselves when the book is opened! They are not crowded together on the page. No hymn is smothered in a corner. The notes are larger than are usually employed in hymnals. The words are set in bold and legible type, and all the stanzas are in the staves. Everything has been done to make this the most beautiful hymnal ever produced by the American Church.

A High Day in the Christian Calendar

NOVEMBER 11 should be a high day in the Christian calendar. On that day every church bell in America should ring and every whistle in the length and breadth of the land blow, at the hour appointed for the opening of the conference on disarmament at Washington. On that day—even though a week-day—Christian minded people should assemble in churches for prayer and song. Schools and courts and legislatures should adjourn. Work should be stopped, as far as possible, during the hour of assembly, that the people might give themselves to worship and reflection. Street cars could well halt for five minutes—a concession which has been granted by transportation corporations on more than one occasion of far less importance than this. It is not too soon for ministers and church leaders to begin preparation for a mighty welcome to this first real international peace conference. The public mind ought to be made to vibrate with solicitude and hope. Earnest, deep-rooted expectancy ought to be created in every community. No Sunday in September and October should be allowed to pass without some reference in prayer or pulpit utterance to the significance of this first explicit, practical attempt of the nations to persuade one another to beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks. It will be a great religious event. The day of its realization ought to be celebrated by the church with solemn joy as a religious festival. This is the psychological moment—the providential moment—for instruction that will both create and quicken the international mind in America. Ministers and all moulders of public opinion, great and humble, should saturate their own minds with the current literature of peace. Such books as Will Irwin's "The Next War," Kirby Page's "The Sword or the Cross," John Hutton's "The Proposal of Jesus," Henry Churchill King's "The New Mind for the New Age," Richard Roberts' "The Untried Door"—to name only a few of the more luminous little volumes that come to mind—should be in the hands and hearts of all Christian laymen and ministers who earnestly seek to interpret the signs of our times with intelligence.

Our Still Unfinished War

THE third anniversary of the Armistice is the date set for the opening of the conference on limitation of armaments. Three years after the fighting in the great war stopped—what a revolution in popular feeling has taken place in that short stretch of time! Then hope was ecstatic. We were all filled with a sort of childlike expectancy that the sonorous promises of our war interpreters would of course now forthwith be fulfilled. In his Armistice Day proclamation to the American people, President Wilson bade us rejoice because now "all the ends America sought to accomplish in the war have been accomplished." These words would now seem like mockery if we did not take them as a mere expression of the ecstasy of the hour to which even the President's pen fell a victim. The fact is, we now see, that not a single end for which America fought was accomplished. The war did not end war; there has never been so universal and determined a war spirit among the nations as since November 11, 1918. The war did not annihilate Prussianism; at best it only scattered it; and at worst it shifted its habitation from Germany to France. The war has not made the world safe for democracy, because in the nature of democracy war cannot do that. If these were the ends for which we fought we still have on our hands an unfinished war. A war for moral ends can never be finished by the sword. It can only be finished by moral forces. And the unspeakable tragedy of it all is that the entail of a war fought with the sword only adds to the dragging weight which the moral forces making for peace have to overcome. We still have the great war to win. We fight no longer against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, against the rulers of this world's darkness. The world war begun in 1914 has passed into its moral, its spiritual, phase. The first battle of this moral phase was fought at Versailles. The principalities and powers, the rulers of this world's darkness won that battle. The next battle will be fought at Washington. Who will win? The church of Christ has the power to defeat the victors of Versailles by creating a public opinion in America thoroughly impregnated with Christian ideals of peace. If the delegates from England and Japan find American public opinion indifferent, or complacent, or preoccupied, or sceptical, they can hardly be expected to take at full face value the words of President Harding's invitation which brought them to these shores to talk peace. Now, therefore, is the time for our American churchmanship to think peace!

World Methodism Meets in London

DELEGATES are arriving in England for the Methodist Ecumenical Conference which after an interval of twenty years meets in London September 8-16. The conference is divided into two sections—eastern, which includes Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, and western, which consists of the United States and Canada. Of the 565 delegates, 330 are allotted to the western section—twenty-four coming from Canada and the rest from the United States. German Methodists are included with the American delegates, because of the fact that before the war Germany was transferred from under the wing of the English to the control of American Methodism, America being more persona grata to Germany. Methodist churches in Bulgaria are also under American control. This applies also to the whole of Continental Methodism, excepting in the cases of France and Italy, which are associated with the English organization. The conference opens on Tuesday, September 6, in Wesley's historic chapel, when the Rev. J. A. Sharp, president of the British Wesleyan Methodist Conference, will preside and a sermon will be preached by the Rev. S. P. Rose, Montreal. Except for a sacramental service the next day, all the other meetings will be held in the Central Hall, Westminster. The subjects to be discussed include Capital and Labor, Reunion, Modern Biblical Criticism, Temperance. Dr. Workman, organizing secretary of the conference, points out that the value of the conference is not to be measured by the speeches delivered, nor by resolutions passed. "Its unique worth is to be found in the closer linking up of Methodism all over the world, and the strengthening of international ties through religious fellowship." While the Ecumenical Conference has no executive power and is not likely to follow the example of the Anglican Lambeth Conference in outlining a world policy for its adherents, it is expected that it will at least strike a keynote and give a message for the guidance of Methodists everywhere.

Lodges Lead the Churches in Growth

ASPEAKER at the Northern Baptist Convention held recently in Des Moines startled the gathering with these statements: "The year-book shows that for the last reported year we had a loss in our membership in the Northern Baptist Convention of upwards of 90,000 members. In the last annual period the Masonic fraternity increased 70,693, the Elks added 120,864, and the Moose 15,610." He does not analyze the reasons for this discrepancy. A number of suggestions may be offered, though none of them adequate to cover the case. The ritual of these lodges is largely founded on the Bible, but without sectarian interpretation. The selections from scripture are from those sections breathing the broadest human spirit. There is a basis of idealism in some secret orders which in the presence of the narrow sectarianism of some churches seems actually broader to the members of fraternal organizations than the church. Of course when the church speaks her true language, that is not true. Besides, fraternal orders give great attention to the recreation of their members. The most astonishing fact, however, is that very often a man will serve on a membership committee of a lodge and lose sleep over rounding up a list of initiates for the "Ancient Order of Beavers" who could not be induced to speak to his next door neighbor about joining the church. When the church comes to adopt methods in connection with recruiting more consonant with the modern attitude, perhaps this will not be true. None of us believes that in the long run the church will die and the lodge will live. The lodge has no ministry for children. In selecting adult members, it presupposes the work of the church. Without a strong church there would likely be no lodges. But the church has grave need of studying the causes of her momentary eclipse in popularity.

The Intellectual and the Proletariat

IT is in the circles of the educated in the church of Christ that one finds the most sympathy for the lot of the working man. Here the aspirations of even the labor unionist and the socialist are considered, and in many cases sympathized with. Social enthusiasts have in most cases been theological liberals. Yet the curious fact is that the proletariat does not pack the churches of the liberal ministers. A carpenter may speak well of the university trained man who espouses the cause of labor and still select a minister of meager talent as the educator of his children in religion. This fact constitutes at once a disappointment and a challenge. For this situation the liberal minister himself is often to blame. He has never learned the language of the hand workers, or at least he cannot talk religion in their language. He uses anglicized Latin and Greek instead of crisp Anglo-Saxon to express his ideas. For this reason a good deal of the time the worker does not understand what the minister is driving at. Then part of the blame rests with the people of the working class themselves. They have grown up on the individualism of the religion of their fathers. They themselves are not yet fully converted to the idea that social Christianity is real Christianity. Hence they go to their union meeting to talk fraternity and cooperation, and when they go to church they expect to hear of a salvation from some future peril. It cannot be expected that the restoration of the emphasis of the New Testament will come in a few years. It may take two generations for the shift to take place. The true leader of the hour is the man who can popularize the speech of modern Christianity and commend it to the intelligence of the masses.

The Soul's Quest For a Friend

LIFE is spent in a search for sympathy and understanding. We have many needs in this world—food, clothing, shelter and a chance to work. But the great need is someone who is a true companion of the soul, receiving the confidences and confessions we long to make, giving back the encouragement we require, the affection without which we go famished through the years. Such a friendship is hard to establish. It demands time, and trust, and full appreciation of virtues as well as sensitiveness to defects, but always an unfailing love that forgets the evil and treasures the good. Stevenson says in a fine paragraph: "In this world of imperfections we gladly welcome even partial intimacies. And if we find but one to whom we can speak out our heart freely, with whom we can walk in love and simplicity without dissimulation, we have no ground of quarrel with the world or God." Most of us have acquaintances without number, associates in groups, companions and comrades whose society is a comfort and a pleasure. But fortunate above most is the one who in all the fine intimacies of affection and self-revelation has—a friend.

Lynching Record Not Improved

ACCORDING to Principal Moton of Tuskegee Institute, the record of lynchings during the first six months of 1921 is not reassuring. The total number of lynchings in that period is thirty-six. This is twenty-four more than the number twelve for the first six months of 1920, and seven more than the number twenty-nine for the first six months of 1919. Of those lynched, two were whites and thirty-four were Negroes. Two of the latter were women. Eleven of those put to death were charged with the crime of rape. The states in which lynchings occurred and the number in each state are as follows: Alabama, 1; Arkansas, 4; Florida, 4; Georgia, 9; Kentucky, 1; Louisiana, 2; Mississippi, 10; Missouri, 1; North Carolina, 2; South Carolina, 1; Tennessee, 1.

Labor Day—Another Milestone

THE approach of Labor Day suggests the timeliness of some comparison of conditions at this time with those last year, and the question as to the direction that the program of social welfare is taking in the industrial area. That distinct progress has been made during the year in the courageous facing of economic interests on the part of the church is not to be doubted. The attempt made by some of the leaders of the old order of things in the management of industry to warn the church away from any inquiry into the conditions prevailing in the labor world failed completely.

The story of the church, in spite of all its limitations and deficiencies, is one of constant effort to understand the needs of the social order, and to apply its great strength to their satisfaction. In this effort it has never for very long been dismayed by any cry of "Hands off!" It was the church that applied needed and drastic remedies to the age-long evil of slavery, in spite of vehement protests from capitalistic forces that insisted it was not the business of men who concerned themselves with the preaching of the gospel to dabble in matters of property and business enterprise. But the church took its stand in behalf of humanity and justice, and slavery went its way.

Not less insistent has been the demand that Christian people should let the traffic in intoxicants attend to its own affairs, as it involved large property holdings and an immense commercial investment which ought not to be placed in jeopardy by agitators. That cry has become feeble and foolish in the light of experience, and the church is bidding farewell, in behalf of the emancipated social order, to this vast iniquity of the past. It was the labor of dreamers and idealists that brought the temperance movement to its present solid and victorious position. And the plea for the limitation of armaments, which is now so insistent and commanding, is the result of Christian protest against the horror and the crushing burden of war equipments all the world around.

And now the church is taking up in a serious and intelligent manner the problems of industry. It is no longer disturbed by the claim of some capitalists that it is out-reaching its rightful vocation in this effort. Christian people are awakening to the conviction that if their religion is to be taken seriously it must extend its mandates into the areas of business and artisanship as truly as into those of individual character and conduct. A social order can be just and wholesome only as the principles of morality and good will permeate all portions of the structure. A man can no longer be counted a man merely because as a husband and father, a neighbor and a church officer, he complies with those accustomed formulas of decency and uprightness which have received the approval of our advancing civilization. Much more is there demanded of him to-day the exhibition of the same qualities of justice and good will in the sphere of activity as a merchant, a banker, the trustee of public utilities, and the director of industrial enterprises. There are no compartments of the social life from which Christianity can be excluded without its nullification in all.

This does not mean that the Christian sentiment of a community demands any intrusive espionage over the conduct of industry or other forms of business. But it does mean that it is increasingly sensitive to the application of the rule of fairness and equity to all conditions prevailing in the industrial area. The church is directly responsible for right conditions among all the people of every community, no matter whether it be a workman's neighborhood or an exclusive residence district. It must concern itself with inquiries as to whether the people in whom it is interested are able to secure a just livelihood; are receiving wages that insure to them a competent standard of living; are reasonably protected from the fear of unemployment, avoidable accidents, sickness, and the disabilities of old age; possess the right to organize, as the only means of meeting fairly the highly organized machinery of employment and discharge utilized by those for whom they labor; have the liberty of discussion and self improvement, an adequate leisure for rest and recreation; and more specifically are assured of the abolition of twelve hour days and seven day weeks in industry.

That as much progress has been made in meeting these needs of the laboring classes as has actually been registered is due almost entirely to the efforts of Christian men and women to apply the principles of Jesus Christ to economic matters. Against unprogressive and resentful forces of conservatism in the world of capitalism and management the church has made slow but unceasing progress. This progress has been the result of direct and sympathetic inquiry into the facts as to hours, wages, laboring conditions, housing, family life and the opportunities for the rightful enjoyment of wholesome conditions by those who labor. In making investigation of these factors in industry the skilled investigators who have secured the facts for the consideration of Christian people have overlooked no difficulty that confronts the capitalist and the employer, as well as the laborer.

In case of such inquiries as the Interchurch investigation of the steel industry the disclosures were of the most important and salutary sort. The responses encouraged or provided by the corporation were so little convincing that in spite of the enormous efforts made to circulate them the public at large has been taught to take seriously the effort of the church to ascertain the facts. And already the fruits of that inquiry are witnessed in the abandonment, under pressure of public opinion, of some of the worst abuses prevailing in the plants of the organization under scrutiny.

More encouraging still has been the fact that the venomous attacks upon such bodies as the Young Women's Christian Association and the Federal Council of Churches, because of their efforts to bring the relations of labor and capital in the field of industry to public attention, have so far failed in their objectives that instead of crippling the resources of those organizations, as was intended, new friends have been enlisted by the evident sincerity and fairness of the efforts employed to ascertain the actual facts and arouse public sentiment in the churches to make certain as to prevailing conditions.

Furthermore it is evident that the alliances, either open or tacit, between the reactionary forces in the churches and those in the industrial field have not succeeded to the extent hoped for in the effort to discourage and defeat the interests of social service in the church. The attempt to set evangelism over against the social gospel, and to insist that the former alone is the secret of Christian efficiency, becomes increasingly futile and ineffective in the light of the facts now so freely disclosed. The two interests are complementary, not antagonistic, and any message of the modern church which is not both evangelistic and socially minded is feeble and unconvincing.

It is the duty of the pulpit, not only as Labor Day approaches, but in every utterance, to voice the deep concern of the church in the vital problems of the hour. And among them all there is not one more timely and insistent than the permeation of the industrial realm with the moral ideals of Jesus Christ, whose program for all classes not only works, but is the only workable formula the world has yet found.

Profitable Crime

SUPPOSE a thoroughly self-respecting community had followed the even tenor of its way without a burglary or a hold-up or other disorderly incident within the memory of its inhabitants, how fruitful a field would it prove for the agent of a surety or accident insurance company? A farmer would likely find himself quite as comfortable stranded on a cake of ice at the north pole. Now suppose that three successful burglaries should be "pulled off" in that same community within a few weeks. Suppose the police were baffled, or showed all the signs. Suppose the papers reported the incidents in full detail, one after the other, making them the universal topic of conversation. Do you detect that smile lurking about the corners of the mouth of that same insurance agent?

Be more personal. When a neighbor suffers the misfortune of having his house broken into, all his intimate private possessions pawed over by ruthless hands, what suited the marauder's fancy carried off, and the house and its contents turned topsy-turvy, of course you share his grief. You run in to tell him so, and to satisfy your curiosity in looking over the wreck. It is an outrage. You join in the general outcry against a police force snoozing down in the city hall. You wonder how long peace-loving, law-abiding citizens shall be compelled to put up with such lawlessness and inefficient administration of your community affairs. You show all the symptoms of the holy rage which the worthy citizen is supposed to display.

But suppose you are the altogether reputable agent of an eminent surety company, that you have been in the business for three generations, writing more surety policies than any other in the country, and all that sort of thing, and suppose, as the invariable and wholly natural consequence of your neighbor's misfortune, ten of your other neighbors come running to you to take out fat policies insuring their household effects against burglary, house-breaking, pilfering, larceny and all the other evil practices for which the fertile lawyer's mind has devised names. Honestly, now, is not your grief over your neighbor's misfortune somewhat assuaged? You find the sharp edge of your indignation over the outrage practiced upon his personal estate to a certain degree dulled, do you not?

Not alone in such a case, but up and down and through the length and breadth of our civilization, crime, violation of the sanctities of life and property, is made by our conventions to redound to the advantage of wholly reputable citizens. Who profits by burglaries? The burglars themselves? The craven pawn-brokers and other middlemen who dispose of the stolen goods, under a safe connivance and at a magnificent profit? Not they alone. Not they in the highest degree. The poor devils who do the burglarizing make a mighty cheap thing of their part: frightful risk, outrageous discounts on their sales of the stuff stolen, and the penitentiary looming on the horizon. Nor can the greediest or most resourceful pawn-broker hope to attain high eminence as a citizen.

But our insurance business, widely ramified departments of which are absolutely dependent upon the continuance of crime in a "reasonably" flourishing condition, enjoys an eminently respectable status, and its agents maintain their place among the highest.

Imagine a state of affairs where police efficiency is one hundred per cent, where each law-abiding citizen may go about his business in a sense of absolute security under the sanctions of high-principled social administration. Is not this desirable? Should not all pray and labor with clean conscience and unremitting zeal for this estate? Will not all reputable citizens acclaim the day when this happy and reasonable hope is realized?

After you have indulged your imagination in that easy exercise, take out a perfectly black No. 2 lead pencil and an immaculately white sheet of paper, and list the eminently respectable branches and departments of business and the wholly reputable business men and women whose interests would not tolerate such a state of affairs. Set down the names of citizens who would go bankrupt under such a thoroughly efficient social system. In short, think through: reckon the numbers among us, and the kinds of business from which we draw our livelihood, that depend upon preying upon society.

It would be quite improper to publish your list. If you were too bold with it you might even be sent to jail to answer in the courts for criminal libel. Which would be a mix-up, indeed. The exposure of crime and its ramifications would be treated as a crime. Details are not of final concern. The major question is how far and how long a civilization can go which is constructed on this order. Where is the theft of automobiles to stop, taking a very practical illustration. The number of thefts in every major city now runs into the thousands. Is it any wonder that there are whispers, and then murmurs, and on occasions something like a roar, to the effect that insurance companies are conniving at these thefts? Of course they must not be allowed to go too far, but if there were not a certain number of successful "get-aways" how could insurance rates be kept up? Who would take out any insurance at all in a community where no thefts were committed, and the first daring attempt were promptly detected and effectually suppressed? A thoroughly efficient police would wreck this now highly flourishing business.

How much other flourishing business would similarly suffer is at least vaguely revealed by the state of administration in all our large cities, and in many of the small. No government which impartially administers the law can survive. The American city is said to be the most inefficient in the world. This is not because Americans are inefficient, and able men cannot be secured to administer municipal affairs. It is because so large a proportion of the reputable business of our cities could not survive under an efficient civic administration. This has been tested again and again in New York, and Chicago, and Philadelphia, and San Francisco, and Kansas City, and anywhere, and everywhere. In none of them does the depraved under-world rise up in independent might, and seize and control municipal affairs, though it often looks as though this were the fact. The under-world wins only in partnership. It is a tool. And in these large concerns it fares as poorly in the long run as does the blundering burglar scuttling through the alleys with his meager swag. The real profits of the burglar's business are accumulated on the avenue and in the "safe and sane" banking institutions down town.

When all this begins to glimmer on our consciousness we single out an individual here and there, or a particularly odorous line of business, and vent our outraged sentiments on them. That shift is playing out. Few of us can ever fool ourselves with that any longer. Make the list complete. Do thorough thinking. Name all those whose personal profit is derived from crime or the preventable misfortunes of your neighbors. You would better do it in private, as suggested, for there are uncomfortable chances that the list will include you and the profession or business through which you have gained your livelihood or amassed your fortune. When there are so many glass fronts stones must not be thrown too violently or recklessly.

If our courts and all our legal procedure were dedicated to the single purpose of preventing trouble between man and man, of insuring prompt and even-handed justice, would society need to support so many lawyers as there are today? If those suffering from imaginary ills were frankly informed of the fact, if those ailing were invariably cured by the speediest and least expensive media and methods, if the single purpose of the medical profession were to keep people well, would society need to support so many physicians as there are now? If business and industry, and affairs generally, were administered with the sole aim of getting things done at the absolute minimum of expense and the absolute maximum of efficiency, would the production and distribution of commodities require the army of retainers at their large salaries who are now employed? If ministers. . . But why make everybody mad! It is the minister's prerogative to lash the consciences of other folks. Should the laity presume to scrutinize his profits of coin or of prestige, and appraise them in exact social values?

Throwing mud and flinging stones will not clean up this bad mess. But some thorough thinking in this field is emboldening the utterances which Professor Taylor reports from England in a recent number of The Christian Century, and is driving thousands of honest Americans to similar conclusions. These latter are not so outspoken, but they are scarcely less fully convinced that our so-called Christian civilization is in for an overhauling. It must have dawned upon most of us that a large proportion of us are preying upon society. Under present conditions we simply cannot afford to maintain orderly and efficient social organization. It would bankrupt us personally. We should be compelled to go out of the business we are in. We fatten upon others' misfortunes. Our children would fail of the luxuries to which they have grown accustomed if other folks' children did not go wild and make business for us. We grieve when these misfortunes strike in among our immediate circle of friends, and we therefore are careful to select our friends from among those least likely to become the victims. But victims there must be, else we go to the wall.

Manifestly democracy and Christianity are fighting an uphill battle against such odds. How long we can hold our present positions, and prosecute our present business, and profess even a lip-devotion to these high causes and their ideals, has become an embarrassing question for men and women in practically every walk of life, participating in practically every commercial and social enterprise.

The Pinch of Salt

A Parable of Safed the Sage

WHEN I dine at an Hotel, and the waiter bringeth me a Plate of Soup, my first concern is to know how far he hath put his Thumb in it. But soon after that I become interested in the fact that it hath not been Salted. Therefore do I look around for the Salt, and then for the Pepper, and about the time I am eating the last of the Soup, it beginneth to be seasoned.

Whereas, when Keturah cooketh Soup for her husband, that unworthy man findeth it good from the First Bite, for she seasoneth it Just Right. And when she Boileth Potatoes, she Salteth the water, so that the Potatoes are Salted all through; and she knoweth just how much of everything to put in.

Now there is in life something which constantly remindeth one of the added pinch of Salt, without which the whole of life is in the Soup, and that Soup is flat, stale and unprofitable. For I have heard that in every molecule of human blood there is one atom of iron, and if that atom be gone, the rest is of no value, and the man dieth. And this although that one atom be but one in two thousand atoms of other stuff such as maketh up blood for the life of man. And I am told that the specks of dust in the air alone give us the beautiful Blue Sky, and that otherwise the heavens would be Black at Noon.

And I have noted in men's lives how often it appeareth that they have almost all the qualities which they need for success, but for the lack of a pinch of Courtesy, or the trivial virtue of Punctuality or some such-like small thing, they fail.

And so I think there is a certain Moral Value in these added small things like the pinch of Salt. Wherefore, when Keturah handeth me my cup of Coffee, I ask her not, Didst thou put Sugar in it? But I ask her, Didst thou smile at it? For the smile is as important as the Sugar.

September

REIGNETH now the sad September.
Like a slowly dying ember
Fades the summer. Past its glory,
Yet remains the mournful story
Of the autumn. In the haze
Flames of goldenrod upblaze;
And the daisy, child of summer,
Stays to greet the staid newcomer,
Still to lend its bright good cheer
To the surely dying year.
In the forest, lately green,
Autumn's handiwork is seen;
For in orange, red and gold
Rarest beauties now unfold;
And the stream, but lately sparkling
With the summer's sheen, now darkling,
Chants a low, funereal song,
As it slowly moves along.
Choirs of song birds, grown more still,
In the orchard on the hill
Utter now a wild lament
That the summer days are spent.

The World Builders

GIVE me the poet's vision,
Grant me the gift of song;
Life and the things eternal
All to the bards belong.

They are the true world builders,
Theirs are the deathless years,
Theirs is an ageless scepter—
Wielders of dreams and tears.

Where is the soldier's glory?
Where is the monarch's name?
Theirs is a bloody story,
Theirs is a blighted fame.

Where is the statesman's grandeur?
Where is the courtier's pride?
Lo! in the tombs they rest them,
By the wild ocean side.

Give me the poet's vision,
Grant me the gift of song;
Life and the things eternal
All to the bards belong.

John A. Hutton

Tenth Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

IN a series of sketches of living preachers by Hugh Sinclair, in 1912, Dr. Hutton was included, but he did not come off very well. As minister of the wealthy Belhaven church, Glasgow, he was described as "a well-placed man," meaning that he fitted a well groomed congregation of aristocratic people whom other people like to know. Nor was it difficult, the author said, to imagine the type of minister who goes with such a church. He must be a man of ability, of course, and he must possess the modern equivalent of "soundness in the faith," with a distinct talent for finding a foothold in Scripture for the uneasy mind of the age. Public-spirited, within well-defined limits, he must be, with the maximum of social tact and the knack of genial acquaintanceship; "and one can imagine a gift for opportune silence superlatively useful." Balance, sanity, a realistic mental habit, a turn for middle ways, and a diplomatic personality, were named as the characteristics of the minister of Belhaven:

He is shrewd, terse and stimulating, flings out the kind of a challenge that is provocative without being provoking, makes his hearers feel that he respects their views even when he is demolishing them, states his points seriously but without over-stringency. He has a sure eye for the practically effective, is master of the art of putting things, gives us the kind of truth we can understand; has a gift of reconnoitre and grip which commands the respect of the hard-headed business man. "Clever" is undoubtedly a word that fairly applies to him—the question remains, in what sense? Does it sum him up, or it is merely the pinch of salt in his dish of wisdom? Is it of the disconcerting order that breeds instinctive suspicion, or does it add practical confidence to moral trust? Is it merely a flair of the things that "go down" with people, or an instinct for the shortest way to lift people up? It does not take long to make up one's mind on that score.

It is, indeed, the touch of sympathy that dominates all his preaching—the sympathy of the man who may not himself be deeply acquainted with grief and anguish, but whose fine intuition outruns his experience as John outran Peter long ago. To the problems which arise from the griefs of man and the silence of God he brings a quiet but profound understanding and a healing touch. His treatment covers all the mysterious, wistful places where the wind of the Spirit stirs the reed that is man, and nearly every ford where the soul's weakness wrestles with the eternal strength, except perhaps the ford that is called Jabbok. The light of a penetrative but reverent comprehension plays over all he says. Undramatic in form, he has much of the dramatist's art, much of his sensitiveness to human fate, of his swift understanding of human sin and sorrow. And with this there goes a very instant and vital sense of the presence of God in human life.

AN UNJUST ESTIMATE

As an estimate of Dr. Hutton—except the last part of it—such a passage is not only superficial and inadequate, but actually unjust. At any rate, it was very unlike the image of him which I had formed from reading his books, all of which I had followed with joy and gratitude. Certainly the unhappy and misused word "clever" is the last word I should have thought of applying to him. As far back as 1904 I read his "Guidance from Robert Browning in Matters of Faith"; and to this day I do not know a better exposition of the message of that glorious singer of the triumph of faith. Later, in 1906, I read his "Pilgrims in the Region of Faith," discussing Amiel, Tolstoy, Pater, and Newman; a study in temperament, showing how difficult faith is for introspective, self-analyzing minds in an unsettled, all-questioning age. It revealed an incomparable interpreter of spiritual experience as disclosed in great literature, a field in which much of his best service has been rendered. Nothing better has been written about Walter Pater, and no one has come nearer capturing the secret of Newman, whose elusive, if not inscrutable, personality is as baffling as it is fascinating. Those essays prepared me for his brilliant studies of Nietzsche, Chesterton, Ibsen, and Shaw, in "Ancestral Voices." As for his sermons, I know them from end to end, from "The Fear of Things" to the latest volume, and regard them as the most suggestive sermons of our time, richly rewarding alike for their spiritual insight and for their artistic stroke.

But I had never met Dr. Hutton, or heard him preach, until he came down to London for the Thursday noonday service on the day of my Recognition as minister of the City Temple—an event delayed for more than a year by the exigencies of the war. It was a memorable occasion, made so by the genius of the preacher—who, curiously enough, has a greater fame in America and a larger hearing in England than in his own Scotland—and his sermon was one of the dozen supremely great sermons I have heard in my life. The theme, the passion of the preacher, the posture of the times—when the idealism of the war was beginning to cool—and, above all, perhaps, the meaning of the day for me personally, made it unforgettable while memory holds her throne.

PREACHING IN CITY TEMPLE

Sitting beside him in the great white pulpit, I felt the very heartbeat of the vast congregation as the sermon went home to each hearer, now with terrible intensity, now with melting pathos, now with an intimacy indescribable, as if the preacher had moved to and fro whispering into each ear—so truly did our own souls speak to us in the voice from the pulpit. As I watched the audience and listened, it seemed to me that preaching, at its highest, is the greatest art known among men, more vivid than architecture, more intimate than music, more persuasive than poetry. My Diary gives a very dim picture of that scene, but it offers a different estimate of Dr. Hutton from that of his appraiser in 1912. Having lost one son in the war, and another wounded in a terrifying manner, it could no longer be said that the preacher knew grief and anguish only by imaginative intuition:

Jan. 18th, 1918:—What a sermon Dr. Hutton preached in the City Temple yesterday, both for its eloquence and its appropriateness. He dealt with "The Temptation," that is the one temptation which sums up all others, including that of the minister, to which he alluded with illuminative understanding. What is the Great Temptation, faced by Jesus in the wilderness and escaped by none of the sons of men? It is the cynical spirit, by which we are sorely tried in these days, and will be more terribly tried later, because it haunts all high moods. Subtly, artfully, it seeks to lower, somehow, the lights of the soul, to slay ideals, to betray and deliver us to base-mindedness. Satan, said the preacher, is the base-minded spirit; he is the denier, as God is the Affirmer, within all souls. Such preaching! He searches like a surgeon and heals like a physician. Seldom, if ever, have I had a man walk right into my heart with a lighted candle in his hand, as he did, and look into the dark corners. For years I had known Dr. Hutton as a master of the inner life, whether dealing with the Bible "At Close Quarters," or with the friends and aiders of faith, like Browning; and there are passages in "The Winds of God" that haunt me like great music. And no book in this dark time of war—in which, alas, the author has suffered his share of bitter loss—has gripped me more firmly, more surely, than his "Loyalty, the Approach to Faith." There one hears not the great guns behind dim horizons, but their echo in the lonely places of the soul. As a guide to those who are walking in the middle years of life, where bafflements of faith are many and moral pitfalls are deep, there is no one like Hutton; no one to stand alongside him. Rich as his books are, his preaching is much more wonderful than his writings. His style is indeed a marvel, but one does not think of it while he is preaching. While his sermon has the finish of a literary essay, it is delivered with the enthusiasm of an evangelist. The whole man goes into it, uniting humor, pathos, poetry and hard reason, literature, life, unction, with a certain wildness of abandon, as of one possessed, which is the note of truly great preaching. In my humble judgment he is the greatest preacher in Britain.

AN EXPERT ON RUSSIA

The sermon was published—alas, only in part, whole sections of it having been impromptu—in a volume entitled "Our Only Safeguard"; but like most printed sermons, it lacks the inspiration of the occasion and the transfiguration of personality. The sermon was read, as is the usual—though not invariable—habit of the preacher; but for the last twenty minutes he forgot his manuscript entirely, and plunging into the dark forest of Russian literature—which he has studied more profoundly than any man in the modern pulpit—to the heart-shaking scene in the fifth chapter of the fifth book of "The Brothers Karamazov," by Dostoevsky, where the spirit of anti-Christ, incarnated in the Grand Inquisitor, is face to face with Christ. The faces of the audience seemed ashy grey as they saw the Christ-spirit grapple with ultimate Evil wearing the robes of the church. It made the very soul shiver. The sentences of the preacher flashed like lightning. He crouched behind the pulpit, his face livid with all the sinister suggestions of the scene, as the cool, cunning Spirit of Evil defied Christ in his own name! As a commentary on the temptation of Jesus, which he had taken for his text, it was overwhelming. Then his whole being lighted up as he saw, and made all who heard him see, the incredible might of the Spirit of Love which, on the cross, revealed a power equal to the darkest tragedy and the most desperate temptation of human life. After the service, to an eager group in the vestry, he discoursed of Russia and its spiritual history and message. His knowledge of all things Russian was amazing, and his talk about it was one of the wonders of conversational genius.

A PREACHER TO PREACHERS

Often it has been said that Dr. Hutton—like F. W. Robertson—is a preacher to preachers; and that is true indeed, but in many other senses than the saying usually implies. To go through any of his many volumes, with their instinct for the right subject and their fertile actuality of treatment—their wealth of spiritual insight, intellectual surprise, and literary grace—is at once to understand why so many preachers are keen students of him. He suggests to them the kind of theme they find it worthwhile to talk about, and, without abrogating the necessity of their own thought, he sets their minds traveling on all kinds of stimulating roads. Everywhere he goes he opens doors, and there is hardly a page on which he does not set a lighted candle down beside some dark text, or some dark experience, and leave it burning. But he does more. It was a saying of Joseph Parker that any man who preaches to broken hearts preaches to the times; and in the widest and profoundest sweep of that spirit Dr. Hutton preaches to the times in which we live. Not only does he bring to our troubled age the grace of insight and the comfort of great ideas, but he reads the signs of the age as few men are able to do. For skilled, penetrating diagnosis of present-day symptoms—as in his volume, "Discerning the Times"—he is one of our first men; and there is no flimsy sentimentalism or superficiality about his prescriptions, which is another way of saying that he sets "the times" in the perspective of Time, linking passing moods and events with abiding realities.

ENTHUSIASM FOR BROWNING

Few people realize how much the man in the pulpit preaches to himself, and what a struggle goes on in his heart in respect of the faith that makes us men. With some it is a moral struggle, with some temperamental obscurations, with some intellectual difficulties; and not a few men of saintly character have remained uncertain to the end. They walked by faith, not by knowledge. "Rabbi" Duncan, of Edinburgh, called himself to the last an intellectual sceptic. Life had for him on one side a precipice, down to the abysses, but on the other side his feet were on the rock; and that rock was experience. It is still a matter of debate whether Newman was not in intellect a sceptic, as in heart he was a mystic. Even a casual student of Joseph Parker must feel in him the stress of a struggle never adjourned—"an atheism within a theism," as he called it—and if he did not become a saint, he had it in him to be a thorough-going sceptic, as well as a great sinner. So it is with Dr. Hutton, in whom one finds so little of that over-belief which to men who live in the thick of things often sounds like cant, or else like a fourth dimension. Such struggles make him a helper of others who are not strong swimmers, and if he has great compassion it is because he knows that every man fights a hard fight—often against heavy odds.

One does not wonder at the enthusiasm of Dr. Hutton for Browning, which permeated so much of his earlier preaching and writing. Like that mighty poet, he, too, sees with unflinching eye the risk and adventure of faith, the pathos and peril of our mortal strife, vividly aware of the contradictions and desperate enigmas which life flings in the teeth of the soul. He, too, sees life as one might see a man from whom one expected kindness and friendship doing brutal, outrageous things, and offering closed lips and averted eyes to all demands for an explanation. The man is an enemy, then, and we are at his mercy?

"Hush, I pray you!

What if this friend happen to be—God?"

To know the meaning of that "Hush" in his own heart, to be able to say it convincingly, so that a man who is being buffeted and bludgeoned by hard lot, or beshadowed by deep grief, can believe it and take hope—surely that is the highest service which a man can render to his fellows. Of that finest of all arts Dr. Hutton is a master; he knows how to comfort men in the true sense, that is, not merely to sooth, but to strengthen, fortify, establish. At any rate, no man living can preach to me as he can, doubly so when he pins me to the wall and forces me to face the facts of the moral life, bringing to bear his power of spiritual analysis, his gifts for tracking the subtler movements of the soul, its hidden motives, its push and pull of resolution, its blind thoughts we know not nor can name, and what Woolman called "the stop in the mind."

HIS OPINION OF DOSTOEVSKY

For the same reason that Dr. Hutton lent his soul to Browning in the earlier years, he now turns to the great Russians, and especially to Dostoevsky, whom he regards as the profoundest spiritual genius of recent centuries. The Russians, he thinks, come near to forming an exception to the law that no man can see God and live. Some of them have almost seen Him and have lived to tell what they saw. The last time I heard him he had been reading a Russian book in which it seemed that the last truth of things was revealed with a thoroughness and unflinchingness of which we in the West are incapable. The book itself was a huddled and tumultuous business, apparently without plot, the interest being created and sustained by the sharpness of the author's psychology. The writer—whose name he did not give—had created a truly wonderful effect by making all his characters run away from the things which they knew and acknowledged to be perfectly true. Looking superficially at the book, one would say that it was disjointed, unstable, and futile, but beneath the surface it held a lesson which few western writers could enforce. Christ was not mentioned in the book from first to last, but nevertheless he pervaded the whole of it, as he does so much of Russian literature, just as Julius Cæsar, while making only a fugitive appearance in the Shakespeare play of that title, is felt in every line of it. From such a delineation of the unmentioned but acknowledged Christ, from whom men run away in fear, not of him, but of themselves, he made us understand how even now, in spite of its apparent rejection of him, Christ is overcoming the world. A book by Dr. Hutton—and his friends will never let him rest until he writes it—interpreting the soul of Russia in its literature, and most of all the Russian experience of Christ, would introduce us to a new home of ideas—ideas, too, of such a kind that they may yet heal this tortured world of ours as with a balm.

SERMONS SEEM LIKE BY-PRODUCTS

It is a criticism of Dr. Hutton, and also a tribute, that, rich as his sermons and essays are, they seem too much like by-products to be accepted as his final contribution to the religious thought of his time. All his friends feel that he has it in him to do some great thing in behalf of the life of faith—a thing which no one else can do—and for this they are waiting. So rare a blend of spiritual and literary resource, so unique a gift of insight and expression, which have given him an influence and power such as few preachers can command, ought to be employed at full stretch on the problems to which the modern mind is so sensitive. The best promise of a fulfillment of this demand, so far, is his series of lectures on "The Proposal of Jesus," which sets the life and ministry of the Master in a new and revealing light. It is one of the most fruitful books of recent times, suggestive even in its discursiveness, and one which no one can read without feeling anew that the hope of the world is that we may yet discover what Christianity is. In this discovery and interpretation of the religion of Jesus, Dr. Hutton, now in the prime and splendor of his powers—richly endowed, radiant in his insight and personality—ought to have a great part. He himself, with that divination of the deeper trend of things which is so marked a trait of his genius, feels that we are on the eve of unpredictable revelations and advances in the faith and fortune of our humanity. As we may read in a passage of which I am fond:

"I sometimes think that in a great, wholesale way we are all of us about to make a wonderful discovery. At times it seems to me as though we were on the edge and moment of a world-shaking revolution in thought and mood. For a long time now we have been feeling our way in a vast, unlit corridor, contending with others in the dark, striking out at shapes which seem to be wishing to do us harm, when all the time they, like ourselves, may only have been out upon their business, and, like us, in the dark. I sometimes think that in answer to the cry of our present distress a light is once more about to shine: and by this light we shall see again an open door, and beyond this door the fair earth and sky. I sometimes think that we are all of us on the point of making the discovery that our Christianity is true, and that for mankind to oppose it or neglect it, is for mankind in the long run—and a long run is needed for the testing of principles—to rush down a steep place and to perish."

A Double-Barrelled Profession

By Burris A. Jenkins

THE editor of The Christian Century has asked me to give an account of the attempt which I have been making for nearly three years to fill a pulpit in a city church and at the same time edit and publish a great secular daily newspaper. I am not at all astonished at this request; for some time since when about to deliver an address in a neighboring state, I asked a very candid friend what I should talk about. The reply was, "Talk about your double-barreled job. That is the only interesting thing about you, and that is what the public wants to hear." So having learned the motto of the daily press: "Give the public what it wants," and on my own account having revised it a little so as to read: "Give the public what it wants, only a little better," and fully knowing the danger of talking about myself and my own work, I shall, nevertheless, endeavor to accede to the editor's request.

In the first place, the writer early resented, and continues to resent, the imputation so frequently made that he is attempting to serve two masters. It is not possible to serve two masters, and I am not trying to do so; but I am trying to serve one master with both barrels; to convey the message of the one master in two ways—first to some two or three thousand people by spoken word on Sunday, and to some 300,000 people by written word daily. Once in St. Louis a certain witty gentleman was good enough to introduce me to an audience as "the man who edits his sermons and preaches his editorials," which is, after all, a very good appreciation of the situation.

PRESS AND PUBLIC

Why should it be thought a thing incredible that a man could serve at the same time in the secular press and in the pulpit? A great many men are serving in institutions of secular learning as professors and at the same time preaching on Sunday in the pulpit. The daily press ought to be, and is the great popular university of the people. I think now of one great newspaper which was half facetiously and half affectionately termed by its readers the "University in the Alley." When a newspaper recognizes its obligation so to serve the people, it has begun to get a grasp upon its true mission; and perhaps it might astonish a great many good people to know how firmly this conviction is seated in the hearts of the more conscientious newspaper men. The great daily newspaper is the only college most of the people ever know and the only library. When therefore, the owners of such a great daily paper come to a minister and hand him their paper saying, "Take it, run it; do what you please with it; shape its policy to suit yourself; we are tired of it and will keep hands off; you shall have complete control," that minister is little less than a fool who throws away such a weapon and possible sword of the spirit.

As to how well a minister can succeed in making his paper a guide, philosophy and friend to the people, standing for the people's rights and liberties, and maintaining always the causes of the people, that is a question which only time can answer. Many people, not knowing the slow processes by which a newspaper is built up and its strength and independence secured, will criticize and say that there has been no change in it and no development; others more appreciative and observing will note its ideals and purposes and its gradual growth in sureness and strength toward the goals at which its editor aims. Any minister undertaking such work will make mistakes many times, and he will be painfully conscious of those mistakes and their far-reaching effect. He will often eat his bread in grief and repentance; but after all, the mistakes may be reduced to a minimum if he asks himself concerning every utterance and every step taken the simple question, "Is it right?" If he has no personal ax to grind, or ambition to serve, and if he determinedly excludes all such ends and aims and uses only ordinary common sense, his mistakes will be fewer far than his wise and right decisions.

CHARACTER AND APPEARANCE

He will meet with many differences of opinion as to what a newspaper ought to be, and how it ought to look. In reality it does not make so much difference how it looks as what it is. Looks is a mere matter of taste and expediency; what it actually is, that is the all important thing. A newspaper may be rough, rugged and uncouth in appearance; it may use lots of black bold type and even red; it may be accused of being yellow and sensational; but if down underneath it is clean and sweet and honest and fair, if, in other words, its heart is right, it cannot be far wrong. It is with newspapers as with men; the important thing is not whether they wear overalls or dress clothes, the important thing is what is inside of them.

There is many a newspaper that is ever so proper in its exterior appearance, subdued and correct, almost English, in its quietness, which after all is only a pale faced, bitter thing, unscrupulous, selfish, snobbish, smug. Almost every big city, beginning with Boston and coming straight across the continent, has such a newspaper. On the other hand, there is many a newspaper, black with big type—and this after all is modern American taste, good or bad—which is fighting the people's battles against predatory wealth and those great interests which would exploit the common herd to which most of us belong. Can there be any doubt if one has to choose between these two extremes which one a minister of the gospel ought to take?

The mission of a newspaper, then, as I see it, is to supply to most of its readers almost exclusively their intellectual food, and even spiritual guidance. It ought to give the people what they want, but always a little better than they want. It ought to perform what the teachers call the process of apperception. That is, a paper should lead its readers on step by step to what they ought to know and what they ought to be. A newspaper ought to stand for the rights and the well being of the great masses of the people, never for the privileged, never for the few, never for the exceptionally favored who are able to care for themselves. In other words, the secular newspaper ought to choose as its motto and its standard the golden rule and the sermon on the mount.

"NUBBINS"

There is a column in my paper which is solely my own, an editorial column headed with the homely word, "Nubbins," a bucolic term which means small, undersized ears of corn. That column speaks the editorial policy of the Kansas City Post. This column deals with anything and everything that seems to me vital to the people who read it. Into it I frequently put the previous Sunday's sermon, or the gist of it; in it I quote the great leaders, moral and spiritual, of our nation and the world; in it there is much intended only to amuse, interest or enlighten. The attempt is to make it as diverting, concrete, simple and plain as possible. No paragraph passes muster that I do not think the office boy can understand.

Now for the pulpit. Where can one find a more stimulating atmosphere for sermons than the editorial office of a great daily newspaper? Of course if one wishes to preach philosophy, theology, or literature to a supreme degree, he can't make such sermons in the editorial sanctum; but if he wishes to preach human life, its ups and downs and ins and outs, its seamy side as well as its pretty side, where can he better obtain his material than in the editorial rooms of a great modern daily? There, tangled wires of the pulsing city life find their center; there the events of state, nation and the world are focused; there one can sit and past him will flow the comedies, the dramas and the tragedies that are played out upon the stage of this world. It is just barely possible that we ministers have gathered our sermons a little too much out of books and not out of human life; most of us have been aware of this fact, sometimes painfully so; but certainly no man who works during the week on a daily newspaper can be lacking, when Sunday comes round, in that sort of material which comes straight from the hearts of the people.

A PROBLEM IN ORGANIZATION

How is it possible, one naturally asks, to carry on at one time the machinery of a great church and of a great daily newspaper? There is only one answer, and that is, organization. Both institutions must be well administered; and the man who tries to do both must not fritter away his time and strength upon details which others can look after just as well as he, and perhaps better. Moody one time said, "It is better to set ten people at work, than it is to do ten men's work." Dr. Frank Crane recently declared that there were two things wrong about all of us preachers: one is that we are under-paid and the other is that we haven't enough to do.

Certainly if a man spends his whole time fooling with collections and committees, with Ladies' Aids, and with calls upon people who would prefer not to see him, he hasn't enough to do. All of us ministers, then, I take it, might profit by careful discrimination as to what is worth while doing and what is not. Nine times out of ten we can put somebody else to doing the thing which is too exacting upon our own time and strength. The whole matter then reduces itself to a question of administration.

Business men have long understood that he is a poor administrator who wears himself out over details which some employee can do equally as well, if not better. One of the serious problems of a minister with a growing church—the bigger it is the more serious is the problem—is to keep everybody doing something. The minister, then, who has not learned the art of delegating tasks to others is lacking in one of the qualifications of a minister. Business men frequently say that unless the head of an establishment can go away safely and be gone a month or six months, knowing that his concern will all the time be running almost, if not quite as well as if he were there, he has not properly organized his business. It is a truism, then, to say that the modern church must learn lessons in administration from the children of this world who are often wiser in their generation than the children of light.

AN EDITORIAL MINISTRY

The Linwood Boulevard Christian Church in Kansas City has about twenty paid employes, while the Kansas City Post has about 300. Incidentally the minister has an opportunity to study the industrial question as well as a variety of other social questions at first hand, and not through books, reports or committees. Incidentally also, the fact that he is a minister brings many and many a person to the newspaper office for help in unraveling difficult life problems. When they are too intricate for him, these problems, he has the help of his staff. Through the instrumentality of this paper, quite a number of men in the last three years have been set on their feet, taken out of prison, paroled, or received some sort of justice in the courts. After all, this phase of editorial work has been the most gratifying to me of any that I have been able to do.

The hours? They can be almost what you will. Joseph Pulitzer is said to have made the New York World by going down to his office at about eleven in the morning and remaining until two in the afternoon. All the rest of his time he put in at his home or where he pleased. The present writer, however, usually arrives at the newspaper office at 8:30 and though the most important of his tasks are finished by noon, usually remains at the office because it is the most convenient place until three or four in the afternoon. This schedule is frequently broken by funerals or weddings, or calls upon the sick, all of which he has thus far refused to delegate to anybody else. He does not, however, go to cemeteries, but only attends the funeral service at the house or church.

ONLY ONE MESSAGE

Sermon making is going on in his head all the time. He is unhappy unless he has his next Sunday's sermon subject before Tuesday, or Wednesday at the latest, which he ponders at all odd moments, in bed before sleeping or arising, in the car going to and from the office, or on any other errand. By the end of the week the subject-matter is pretty well in mind and the outline can be drawn up before Saturday's sun sets. Let no man suppose, however, that any minister, no matter how long his experience, can go into the pulpit on Sunday morning unprepared and keep up his ministry.

As for the message, ring the changes on it how you will, there is only one message for the preacher today and the older he gets in the service the more he is aware of it. At times, however, he will meet the temptation to lug in this or that or the other question of casuistry—but that message is the same which I have suggested for the daily press, the golden rule and the sermon on the mount. So do the two methods of presentation flow together into one; the aim and purpose is the same in each.

DOUBLE-BARRELED SUCCESS

While this double-barrel arrangement may be said to be still in the experimental stage, nevertheless in the three years of experience it has been fairly successful and will be permanent so far as can now be seen. The church has grown steadily with additions to its membership at almost every service. We have had no revival, so-called, for five or six years; the accessions come in steadily at the regular meetings Sunday morning and evening. The membership is now about 2000, and the attendance all that our two auditoriums will accommodate. Financially the church has no difficulties. As for the newspaper, its circulation has grown something like 20,000 and the financial returns are satisfactory. The writer does not own a dollar's worth of stock in the paper, and therefore has none of the financial responsibilities; in truth, he is more editor than publisher, though he is called both.

On the whole it is a very interesting, even exacting life, and though I do not have opportunity to travel or to play golf as much as formerly, still I am having a world of fun out of it. When friends inquire, "Why don't you come out to the golf course?" the reply naturally is, "Well, I just have so much fun down town that I don't care about it." As to the effect upon health, ask the scales.

Recently the writer has learned of another minister, Rev. Alexander Cummings of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., who is rector of an Episcopal church and editor of a secular daily, and has been for years. Perhaps the editor of The Christian Century would do well to ask him for his story.

The Lion In His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

THE Lion was holding a book in his hand. He was making little inarticulate sounds of mirth as he read. I stood beside him waiting. He turned the book toward me and I caught its title, "The Mirrors of Washington." "Have you read it?" he asked.

"I finished it last night," was my reply.

"And what do you think of it?"

"A clever cynicism now and then is relished by the best of men," I paraphrased.

"He is all that," admitted the Lion, "and more, the way in which he uses that sharp thin blade of his. Listen to this: 'After his election he [President Harding] took Senators Freylinghuysen, Hale and Elkins with him on his trip to Texas. Senator Knox observing his choice is reported to have said, "I think he is taking those three along because he wanted complete mental relaxation."' Or take this: 'It is characteristic of certain temperaments that when they first face life they should run away from it, as Mr. Wilson did, when having studied law and having been admitted to the bar, he abandoned practice and went to teach in a girls' school.' And here are two other morsels: 'Washington gossip credits him [Woodrow Wilson] with inventing the phrase, "the bungalow mind," to describe the present occupant of the White House. Another remark of his anent the new President is said to have been, "I look forward to the new administration with no unpleasant anticipation except those caused by Mr. Harding's literary style."' There is a good deal of wicked malice in this sort of thing. But it is done with a flash and energy and often with a penetration which makes you see to the heart of a man's inadequacy even while you laugh."

My friend kept turning over the pages of the book. He came to the discussion of Senator Lodge: "This is a work of art," he declared, "black art perhaps, but wonderfully effective. It is as if some mischievous demon had told all of Senator Lodge's dark secrets before the day of judgment. Sometimes you feel that the worst you can say of a certain type of man is that he has to live with himself." The Lion mused for a moment. Then he went on: "This book is a gallery of petty men seen against the background of great issues. He makes you see Lansing as a study in timorous futility. Colonel House is a pleased spectator, quite out of place when he finds that by some queer magic his box at the opera has been flung into the center of the stage. Hoover is a man who knows how to deal with facts and forces but is curiously ill at ease with people. Hughes is a man whose gift of lucid exposition makes things seem simpler than they really are. Hiram Johnson is a phonograph with the American people themselves as a record. 'The Mirrors of Washington' is the work of a diagnostician. And like that sort of work it is much keener in the presence of disease than in the presence of health."

PATHOLOGICAL STUDIES

"You pay rather a large price for such a book," I ventured. "I finished it feeling that I had been in a hospital. I wanted to get out of doors. After all there are things besides germs. I wanted to give the work a sub-title. I wanted to call it: Pathological Studies of American Public Men."

The Lion smiled a little soberly. "To be sure, you never go to such a book for information. The author has the easy objectivity of a man without conviction. He has the easy merciless gaiety of a man without ideals. He has the bright and cutting urbanity of a man who does not care deeply about anything. For all that, it's an extremely stimulating book he has written. Many a man of greater depth and seriousness could learn much from the authors of these stinging sketches."

The Lion was fingering the book as he spoke. Then there was a quiet fire in his eyes as he uttered the last word of all conversation that day: "The man who wrote 'The Mirrors of Washington' has missed one thing for all his cleverness. He has not discovered that America has a soul!"

The Outlook for Ireland

AT last there are signs of sanity in the Irish situation. Both sides seem to have reached the conclusion that the slow and cruel war of attrition cannot settle the issue. That was the best Sinn Fein could hope for, as there could be only one issue in a straightaway resort to violence. The British government could exterminate the Irish people if there were no moral sentiment to call a halt on the type of warfare required to do it. But there is such a moral sentiment, and it has called the halt. How far it is due to purely British opinion and how far that opinion has been moved by the moral repugnance of the rest of the world, no one can say. One thing is very apparent and that is that the policies of the government in Ireland were alienating the moral confidence of the world and bringing the judgment of the best Englishmen down in indignation on Sir Hamar Greenwood and his policies. It boots little to argue as to who fired the first shot or who first suggested the truce. It was not the shot that killed the archduke that made the war—it only furnished a match for a powder train already laid. Just so in the Irish war, the question is not who fired the first shot, but who laid the powder train.

Recognizing the Irish War

We may now call it a war in Ireland. Lloyd George's cry against the "murder gang" has been met by a British general in Ireland who denounced it as unjust, saying the men they were fighting were not murderers but patriots, the best of young Irish blood, heroic and devoted, who had resorted to guerilla warfare because there was no other kind possible against such overwhelming odds. This is not said in defense of Sinn Fein tactics but to classify the situation as one of guerilla warfare and not criminal murder. In treating with President de Valera, releasing all the thirty-six imprisoned members of Dail Eirean, the Irish independent parliament, in order that they might officially consider the proffer of peace, and in formally agreeing to a military truce, the premier has given tacit recognition of the war status of the Irish rebel government. The peace negotiations are being conducted just as would be in a formal rebellion where there is no victory for the government and no complete victory by the rebels. The truce has so far been scrupulously observed by both armies, the only breach of peace being committed by Orangemen in Belfast in their bitter hatred of their Catholic neighbors.

We must recall that in the last election four-fifths of the Irish votes were cast for the Sinn Fein candidates; that in Ulster itself Sinn Fein carried many districts and as a result the unionist claim to control Ulster was whittled down to cover only one-half that section. The vice-president of the republican organization, Arthur Griffith, is Protestant, and there are many others like him. Mr. Griffith carried a majority in the recent Ulster independent election also, but will, of course, not take his seat in the Ulster parliament. If Ulsterites charge intimidation in Sinn Fein territory, Sinn Fein replies with like charges regarding Ulster, and points with pride to the fact that they polled a good vote and even elected their vice-president to an Ulster seat in spite of it. There is no doubt that de Valera and Griffith represent the overwhelming majority in Ireland. Outside Ulster there was no opposition to their candidates in the late election.

The History Behind It All

There can be no understanding of the Irish issue without a knowledge of the history behind it all. It is a seven-hundred-year history of conquest and the exercise of the authority of a superior power. During all that time the Celtic Irish have accepted British rule only because there was no other alternative. Their lands were wrested from them and given to their conquerors; they were denied the right to possess, refused trial by their peers, debarred from holding office, had an alien church established upon them and made a subject race in every way. Ulster was made Protestant by "planting" Scotch settlers there for the express purpose of establishing a seat of authority, and from time immemorial the Catholic population were discriminated against both politically and economically.

The above summary is not my own. It is one given me by an Englishman whose ancestors moved to Ireland several generations ago, became landlords, and taught this man as a lad to despise Gladstone as the incarnation of his satanic majesty because of his home rule bill. He is a man as well known in English religious circles as is John R. Mott in America, a Protestant and a man of means, but one who is emancipated from the prejudices of his class and thus is able to objectify the situation and make a judgment on the basis of justice. The Celtic Irish, he says, are of such different temperament from the English that their government must be their own, and he honors them for the tenaciousness of their contention for it. He also pointed out to us the fact that Sir Edward Carson, before the war, did the exact things that Sinn Feiners were later shot for doing, and said that the elevation of him and his co-conspirators to places in the government afterwards was one of the causes of the Sinn Fein rebellion. "The government," he declared, "has not tried to be impartial but has done whatever Ulster desired it to do."

Is It an Irish Victory?

"There will be no resumption of the black and tan methods," said a great Conservative, a man who is mentioned as a possible Premier, if the Tories win again. "The English people will not stand for it. If peace is not made we will probably let them drift as they can until the weakness of their government and time and events determine a way out." The greater bitterness is in Ulster. "The Ulsterman is at once the most sensitive, bitter and obstinate person in the world," said a leading Protestant to us, and added that had the Irish been treated in the same way as the Welsh and Scotch, there would have been no trouble. He said also, and in this he agreed with Froude in the conclusion of his history of Ireland, that England had always done the right thing too late. Suppose the land had been divided before the great famine, or

MOFFATT'S Translation of the New Testament

THE author is recognized as one of the most distinguished living scholars of the Greek new Testament. His translation is notable for its apt usage of words as well as for its originality of thought. A new meaning is given to the old version which is supplemented and not supplanted. It is the only version which makes use of the recent discoveries in Egypt and the Holy Land. No Bible student's library is complete without this marvelous translation. It will elucidate difficult passages and call forth expressions of surprise, delight and gratitude. Its every phrase is a new text for the preacher and a new idea for the Christian layman.

home rule granted when Gladstone went down to defeat for it, or the pre-war home rule bill been enacted instead of suspended. Suppose the counsel of such Protestant Irishmen as Sir Horace Plunkett and A. E. Russell, editor of the Irish Homestead, had been followed, instead of the malevolent demands of Sir Edward Carson and the bitter-enders of the bitterest of the Ulsterites. There need have been no war. And now if peace negotiations fail, every sign is that it will be through Ulsterite obstinacy.

If it does not fail, it may be counted as an Irish victory. It will not be a republican victory, however. Sinn Fein can do no more than win home rule, but it will probably be full dominion home rule—the largest measure ever offered Ireland—with full guarantees for Ulster. The writer believes all this could have been better won by passive resistance than by cruel guerilla warfare, and the heritage of heroism would have been greater and the entail of bitterness much less. Ireland is safer in an interdependence with England than independent of her, and war kills interdependence.

British Table Talk

Wensley Dale, Yorkshire, August 8, 1921.

THERE are hosts of the inhabitants of these islands now under canvas. I too share that lot and a very happy lot too. But though camp tends to health and merriment and many good things, it is not favorable to the production of "copy," nor does it leave me with many clues to the things about which people are talking in these parts. Here we talk much and laugh more, but what London is saying we have no means of judging and for the present we do not greatly care. We have come apart and are separate. Camp is a little republic, set up for a limited time during which its members realize what human society can be at its best. Given about forty or fifty public schoolboys with the average age of sixteen; add a score or so of undergraduates and two or three seniors; put them in a field in a lovely Yorkshire dale beside a swift and turbulent river; leave them to order their life according to the teachings of the divine Lord and there arises the society which of all societies most nearly reproduces the kingdom of God on earth. Out of that republic evil things are banished. There the spirit of loyal service is enthroned. There the hilarity of the saints is recovered. But no one knows this till he has been there.

The Free Church Camps for Schoolboys

This title, the "Free Church Camp for Schoolboys," we have borne for twenty-two years. When we started there were few camps in the land. Now there is no suitable field in the country but has its camps when August begins. Cadets, Scouts, Boys' Brigade, Girl Guards and a thousand others are living this simple, glorious life. But we still continue our own distinctive camps, and by this time there is a brotherhood of us all over the world who have seen the same vision and heard the same call. In camp, religion comes not as an "extra" but simply and naturally as the heart of all things. Evening chapel follows upon a riotous singsong, but no one feels any necessity to change his clothes or his voice or his face. And it is no unfamiliar experience to old campers to know the trust and the wonder and the peace when in their midst Christ stands at eventide. Others may reason about such things: but those who have been in camp are sure that they know.

The Next Revival

There are tidings of revival in certain parts of England. But some of us are troubled by the question, To what are we to be revived? Have we any clear idea of what will make the Christian life of today worthy of its Lord? Are we, for example, to be content with the present attitude of the members of churches towards the many problems of the time—practical problems, not matters of theory? Are we to be satisfied with an individual religious life, ordered and timed to much of the Master's teaching and yet a life which acquiesces in war and social wrongs and in business compromises? Or have we come to see our need of a power to lift us into a life more worthy of Christ, along the whole range of its activity? This does not mean that there can be any contrast between an individual salvation and a social, as though we had ceased to need the call to a life redeemed from the guilt of sin. It only means that we need to know the full tale of our sin and to be delivered from all sin, from drunkenness and uncleanness, yes and from the sin of war and the cruelty of an industrial system built upon foundations which are certainly not of Christ. Any revival which is to meet our need must be a revival not of part of the gospel, but of the whole: in Newman's words, we cannot "halve the gospel of God's grace." This is not said with any desire to take from the value of the awakening which is proceeding in East Anglia. It is only a query which is on many lips today. Given that a man is converted from his own personal sins—and who can doubt that we need such conversions desperately?—what is he going to carry of fresh vision and insight into his life as a citizen and a member of an industrial order? How will he think differently of war or of sweating or of the pursuit of wealth? Will he be different as a voter or as an employer or as a servant? In other words, it is not clear that we have set before ourselves the kind of life into which we must be lifted and shall be lifted when a revival comes.

Keswick and Its Mission

The only 'sensational' item at the Convention of this year was the sudden collapse of one of the large marquees on Friday night during a crowded meeting. The first speaker, Dr. Saillens, of Paris, was just warming to his subject when the storm, which had been gathering all day, reached its crisis. Swaying and creaking for some time in the fierceness of the onslaught, the tent suddenly gave up the struggle and one half collapsed—roof, sides, poles and all—on the heads of about a thousand startled people. Their conduct was admirable—not a shriek, not a sign of panic, and, thank God, after they had been extricated, not a single one hurt!

The Keswick convention which has had this deliverance has been a remarkable power in English religious life. It has stood for the power of the Holy Spirit to lead the soul into the heights of Christian experience. Sometimes it seemed and still seems to be held down to the letter of Holy Scripture. Concerning its speakers there has been a sharp controversy in the press. Many of the oldest supporters of the convention stand out strongly for a platform free from all suspicion. In other words, they would have only those who will accept the infallibility of the sacred books and who do not yield one inch to modern scholarship. Such an uncompromising position is not held by all who are of the Keswick tradition, but it is still strong and it prevents many of us who value the positive witness to the Holy Spirit from association with the convention. Why should a literal interpretation of the Bible be essential to the "deepening of spiritual life"?

The Pacific— a New Issue

It is doubtful whether the majority of our people understand the issues which will be discussed at Washington in November. We have not been accustomed to think in terms of the Pacific, but we know enough, most of us, to pray that the conference between your land and ours may be a landmark in the progress of the nations towards a living fellowship, and some of us are not blind to the fact that the immediate future of the world will be decided not on the battlefields of Europe but upon the Pacific. One thing can be said: whatever wild language may be spoken by voices from this side, the average Englishman desires nothing more than that the United States and his own land may think together and work together for the peace of the world.

Oxford and Summer Schools

Oxford is the scene of many conferences at the present time. In vacation it is as busy almost as three summer schools. In each of these the master of the college took a leading part. Do Americans know the master of Balliol? Very few in this country, outside of Oxford, know him as they should. For years, A. L. Smith was the leading history tutor in Oxford. He probably has inspired more books than any other teacher and written less, but his power has been in recent years outside the academic circle. His hand could be detected in the commission upon adult education and in the report of the archbishops' committee on industrial life. One of these Oxford conferences dealt with the league of nations. Its program seems to have been remarkable for its range and interest. Here are the impressions of one delegate:

But of the League of Nations Union Summer School in particular. It was in striking contrast to the old apathy in regard to foreign affairs that two hundred persons of all ages and descriptions were found spending a week of "holidays" in the serious study of international relations, in addition to three hundred others who are traveling to Geneva and Bruges for similar schools. Before 1914 this would have been unthinkable; we are learning that it is as true of the world as of the church that we are everyone members one of another.

The program of the school dealt exhaustively, and, perhaps, to some exhaustingly, with the activities of the league. Experts on every subject—Dr. Nitobe, of Japan, on the machinery of the league, Sir George Paish on the economic situation, Lord Phillimore on the international court of justice, Major Ormsby Gore on mandates, Major General Sir Ferderick Maurice on armaments—poured out the knowledge they have made their own, while Professor Gilbert Murray in his own course of lectures seemed the sum and equal of them all.

"The Dark Tower"

But the call of the field and the river is too loud to be resisted any longer. By the time these words are printed this Yorkshire dale will be a memory, but at present it is a great and wonderful reality. A little above the village stands an ancient castle where Queen Mary of Scots once lodged, to remind us that these quiet places have seen warriors moving to battle and a hunted queen escape. North Yorkshire is a land rich in historical memories. It is not hard to think that here many a "Childe Roland to the dark tower came" and here today many are preparing themselves for their dark tower and for all the strange thrill and adventure of life.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Paul at the University of Athens*

WE ought to have a week to talk about this lesson. It is the climax of Paul's experience to date. He has reached Athens, proud center of learning. Paul is not an ignorant evangelist, suddenly converted and possessor of a narrow-minded theology. He was suddenly converted, but he took three years in silence before he trusted himself to speak. Paul is a student, brought up to know the Grecian mind and disciplined in the college of Gamaliel. Paul is a seasoned and tempered soul. The silence in Arabia has been followed by several years of hard toil and misunderstanding. He has not been spoiled by success. His theology is his own. He tells us that. He talks about "My Gospel." He has not borrowed some old stuff that has been cast off in respectable circles. Paul can use his own mind; he does not have to steal his sermons. Paul has lived the life, he does not have to buy books of illustrations! And here this keen scholar comes to the big university and is invited to lecture. It is like being invited to Oxford or Harvard. Paul rises to the occasion. He uses his knowledge of Grecian philosophy. He employs stately address. He touches big things. More than all, he uses consummate tact. I received the other day a copy of a trade journal which printed this address of Paul's as the supreme instance of making a tactful approach. In the psychology of salesmanship this story ranks at the top. He capitalizes their religious trait. He makes an artful point of contact. He sweeps on to sell his own product—Christianity. If Paul had been a trimmer he might have continued his lectures, but he went on to his mighty conclusion that God was interested not in altars and statues but in character—repentance and righteousness. That is what alienated those cultured and haughty Athenians—that talk about repentance. We know what the religious life of Athens was, formal, beautiful, divorced from righteousness. There was no connection between religion and morals. Jupiter was the worst rascal of the lot. No stories in metropolitan journals could equal his escapades; no rich and dissolute American could begin to dream of the scandals of Zeus. Athenian youths, we are told, would say, "Zeus can do it, why may not we?" Excellent logic. Why should a man be better than his god? Olympus was inhabited by a gang of gods and goddesses that would make Montmartre seem tame! Broadway in its palmiest days of lobster palaces was a Sunday school compared with that celebrated hill where Venus and her kin made merry. Religion had no dealings with righteousness. Paul dares to speak of a God who demands repentance! He declares a religion that demands righteousness. Before Caesarean governors and university audiences that man will talk about righteousness! If he had only gone up into the air, talking about philosophy, using great booming words that meant nothing in particular, he might have been retained as a regular lecturer! Felix might have heard him again! But no, Paul goes in hard for downright righteousness, repentance and righteousness! He is a very John the Baptist—a cultured John the Baptist. So they laugh him to scorn. Why, this poor fellow is in earnest about being good. They laugh at him and stroll down to the baths—these beautiful, polished, accomplished men of Athens. Only a handful believe and of them we never hear again. What became of them? Did they struggle for a while and then give up, we wonder, or did some noble soul die in the faith, having passed on the torch to another believing one? I repeat, there is nothing worse than godless culture. Our religion stands for righteousness or nothing. Repentance was never more needed than in Athens—strange as that may sound.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Next Two Critical Months

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: These brilliant days should be full of quiet plans for an autumn campaign that shall put new life into millions of depressed or confused or thoughtless minds. The prospects for good crops, for diminishing the sum total of misery in Europe and in Asia and for lessening our out of works and getting back prosperity will depend much upon what twenty-five to thirty men will decide to do at the disarmament conference in November. What they decide may set forward or back the clock of progress for a century.

How much do the average citizens, the men in the street, understand about the momentous issues that are at stake? But it is not difficult to arouse them when they are led to see the relation between cause and effect and know that nearly twenty per cent of our federal tax could be cut off if these twenty-five or thirty men would act rationally. I find complacent and apathetic women who have been golfing, doing fancy work and automobiling this summer can become alert and interested when it is brought home to them as voters how responsible they are in this distracted world for the leisure that gives them the privilege to think and to sew for the naked babies of Europe. The majority of toilers have little time to think and no one to present to them the facts. A stupendous responsibility rests on those who are informed or who have the opportunity to get informed.

If the disarmament conference is to lift the pall that hangs over the business world today in most countries there must be a shaking of dry bones and a new vision on the part of the great public to whom our President appeals for support. The size of taxes depends more than anything else upon preparations for future war. Only in regard to those can we economize to any noticeable amount when we are spending only twelve per cent of our national budget on all constructive work that Uncle Sam is trying to do. Try as he may, Gen. Dawes can do little to reduce our staggering burden. Our preparation for future war depends on national policy as regards our relation to other nations. How are we shaping our national policy as regards our relation to other nations? How are we shaping our national policy? Is it to put reliance on force or reliance on ideas?

During these days of waiting and the crystallizing of ideas, no members of any church, or club, or grange, or union, or chamber of commerce should fail to take some step to see that their respective organizations help them and the outside public to get explicit information regarding the problem of the Pacific and those other matters which vitally affect the realization of the prayer, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Community forums should be planned by neighboring groups of clergy to discuss regularly how citizens can bring themselves to bear on present issues. Sunday evening discourses must be blocked out in the spirit of Amos and Hosea and religion brought into practical politics. There should be extra meetings planned for every woman's club if its club program is already full of the usual secondary matters. Let women take more time for reading up on the Chinese student movement, on the liberals in Japan, on the anti-alien law of California, on the cost of our present mad naval program compared with any that has gone before; upon Will Irwin's demonstration of how the chemical warfare of the future will destroy babies as well as men, and hear less of art, literature and ancient history until the disarmament conference has decided whether the world is to go forward or back.

"The Woman's International League for Peace and Freedom," in its biennial meeting at Vienna recently, has decided upon starting in the twenty countries represented in it a movement for an international disarmament week just before the Washington conference. Let American citizens of all organizations combine with these and lead off in the instruction of the masses as to its significance. Now is the time for definite plans that effort may be focused and effective.

Is England Ahead of Us?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: London was not at all excited about it. But to the Americans who were present, it seemed a remarkable demonstration. It was held on Saturday afternoon, July 16th. Led by a choir and band, the parade marched from Bedford Square by way of Oxford Street to Hyde Park. From seven stands arranged in a circle, forty-nine speakers, one after the other, addressed the assembled throng on "The Social Message of Christianity." At the conclusion of the fervent addresses a momentous resolution was presented for consideration. Almost unanimously it was passed by the assembled thousands. The resolution reads as follows:

"In face of the collapse of our existing economic, industrial, and social order, and of so much blindness in statesmanship, this meeting urges all men and women of goodwill to recognize that the solution of the deadlock can be found only in the practical application of the principles of Christianity to all the departments of human life.

"It declares that a persistent refusal to apply these principles of truth, justice, and brotherly love is a denial of Jesus Christ, who lived and died for their establishment on earth.

"It further records its conviction that the present system, being based largely on unrestricted competition for private and sectional advantage, must be brought to an end, since it fosters the sins of avarice and injustice, lays a yoke of thralldom upon masses of men and women, and leads almost inevitably to war.

"Therefore this meeting calls upon all Christian people to find in the failure of the old society a supreme opportunity for the building up of a new order that shall be founded on brotherly co-operation in service for the common good."

To an American onlooker this demonstration seemed highly significant for four reasons. First, the resolution itself is certainly significant in that it is by far the most vigorous pronouncement that has come thus far from any church body or group of important Christian leaders in England or elsewhere. The declarations of the Lambeth Conference of Anglican Bishops and the Social Creed of the Federal Council of Churches, the latter of which has been so bitterly attacked by certain groups in America, are mild documents as compared with this resolution.

Second, the resolution becomes still more significant when the personnel of the forty-nine speakers who urged its adoption is analyzed. A number of the most influential clergymen in the British Isles were included in the list of speakers. Among others were the following: At least four bishops of the church of England, a Dominican Father and several Roman Catholic priests, Congregational, Free Catholic, Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian and Unitarian clergymen, and representatives from the Friends, the Free Religious Movement, college professors and trade union leaders. Many of the individual names will be recognized by American readers: Bishop Temple, of Manchester; Dr. W. E. Orchard, of King's Weigh House; Rev. F. W. Norwood, of the City Temple; Dr. A. E. Garvie, of New College; Rev. Tom Sykes, of the National Brotherhood Federation; Noel Buxton, Labor Candidate for Parliament; Father Vincent McNabb, of St. Dominic's Priory; Miss Muriel Lester, of Kingsley Hall; Miss Margaret Bondfield, of the National Federation of Women Workers.

Third, the attitude of the police and the authorities seemed significant to an American. Speaker after speaker emphasized the collapse of the existing industrial and social order and spoke of the imperative necessity of replacing the present system of unrestricted competition with a system based upon cooperative activity.

Many of the speakers expressed the conviction that the present system should be brought to an end as quickly as possible in order to prevent the further exploitation and degradation of the masses. In America these addresses would have been called revolutionary and in all probability some of the speakers would have been arrested and sent to jail for seditious utterances. Not so in London. The police were present in large numbers at the demonstration. Their purpose, however, was not to arrest the speakers but to see to it that they were not interfered with during their addresses. The whole demonstration occurred within sight of Kensington Palace, with the Houses of Parliament only a few minutes away.

In order to prevent certain Americans from becoming unduly alarmed at the thought of revolution in England, let us hasten to say that the revolution urged by the speakers was not one of violence and bloodshed but a peaceful, constitutional revolution. In fact, the whole demonstration was arranged under the auspices of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, an out and out anti-war society, opposed to all forms of violence. There does not seem to be even the remotest possibility that there will be a bloody revolution in England. It does seem certain, however, that fundamental changes will be made in the industrial system within the next decades.

Fourth, the whole demonstration seemed significant as typical of the new interest being taken by the churches and religious leaders of England in social and industrial problems. Large numbers of clergymen have become members of the Labor Party and are seeking in every possible way to aid in improving the conditions of the working classes. It is not fair to say that the church as a whole in England has become aroused to a full sense of its responsibility in helping to solve the complex problems of industry, but it is undoubtedly true that there is an increasing desire on the part of Christian leaders to render all possible assistance to the depressed classes and an increasing activity on their part to this end. Many of the outstanding labor leaders are themselves active members of churches and some of the most influential are lay preachers, including Arthur Henderson, one of the most important labor members of the House of Commons.

The Americans who were present in Hyde Park on this Saturday afternoon went away wondering why such a demonstration has not been held in the United States. KIRBY PAGE.

Immersion as a Test of Fellowship

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I appreciated greatly Rev. W. J. Lhamon's article in the July 21 number. I have long waited to see such a clear and plain statement of the relation of the early church to its scriptures.

Although our ideas of biblical infallibility were developed at the Reformation is it not true that the Pharisees of Jesus' day held a very similar view? One of the things Jesus did was to free those who followed him from the Pharisee burden of literalness, legalism and compulsory practices; and religion became "infused with faith and love." Then the ages grow dark and darker—there rises an infallible church; then an infallible book again, and now Mr. Lhamon fears another infallible church! He thinks that by their action at St. Louis last year they are becoming "believers in their own infallibility."

It seems that some Disciples, though holding to the immersionist character of baptism, themselves, dislike to enforce the same on other Christians if their conscience in this matter differs. These Disciples realize, I suppose, that they are not judges over their brothers' consciences and that both, possibly, "know only in part," and they do not want to do anything implying their infallibility. Will not freedom of belief as to baptism have to be admitted; or is it already among them? I understand that they allow freedom of belief except in this one thing; all must believe that Jesus is the Christ, the son of God. Can not there be as many views and theories of baptism as there are people baptized, if need be? But now as to the practice of baptism. Dr. Garrison points out, in his letter in the issue of Aug. 18, some of the stumbling blocks and questions that would arise if the unimmersed were admitted. In the act of baptism who would desire to offend any brother's conscience? Why should the Quaker, who is convinced that baptism (dipping in water) is nothing, balk at doing the "nothing" which his Baptist brother regards as something? Jesus said in Matthew 3:15 that it was then fitting for him to thus satisfy every claim of religion (20th century version). Would it still be fitting for non-immersionist Christians to satisfy their other brothers' claims? If we hold with Saint Peter that baptism is the answer of a good conscience toward God, many a pedobaptist and non-immersionist may be short on baptism, not because they are unimmersed, but because they have never regarded their brothers' light.

What if Quakers were admitted? Would unity then be destroyed? Ordinarily yes, such unity as there would then be would be the inward motives of goodness and purposes of helpfulness and devotion, and not the uniform expression of them. That is not enough?

Sameness of belief departed long ago; if uniformity of acts expressing consecration and obedience are to be kept or regained will it not come through motives of consideration for the scruples and the light which has been given others?

Can the church ever Christianize the social order until it "socializes" somewhat its church order? HOLIDAY PHILLIPS.

A Tale of the Days of Camel-Bells

By DR. BURRIS JENKINS

As a writer of fiction, Dr. Burris Jenkins, of Kansas City, is as yet scarcely known, but as a minister of the Disciples of Christ, as a publisher, as author of "THE PROTESTANT," and as a man of many and varied activities, his name is familiar to thousands. To his many achievements he has now added "PRINCESS SALOME," a powerful novel of the days of Christ. A masterpiece of descriptive fiction and a message of tremendous significance that seems almost inspired in its broad and human conception of Christianity. It searches the very inner recesses of the soul and turns the eye of the reader inward upon himself. George A. Miller, President of the International Convention of Disciples of Christ, says of "PRINCESS SALOME": "It will produce faith and love in many cold and indifferent hearts and lives."

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Bishop Wants More Dignified Money-Raising Methods

The Episcopal church fair got a severe rap from Bishop Brent when the Women's Auxiliary of Western New York met recently. The bishop was the preacher at the opening service and he declared that some methods of raising money in the church were so nearly immoral as to make him blush. Great church leaders are more and more favoring the outright giving of the money that is necessary in order to put forward the kingdom of God.

Pan-Presbyterian Meeting in September

Pittsburgh will be on the map once more for the Christian world when all eyes turn to the great Pan-Presbyterian meeting which will be held there beginning September 16. At this meeting representatives from the various Presbyterian and Reformed churches of the world will sit together, and these representatives will in a measure speak for twenty million people. Three great interests will face this body. The Lambeth proposals bulk easily first. There will be a majority and a minority report on this matter. The minority, representing mostly the Reformed churches of this country and the Southern Presbyterian church will scout the whole Lambeth business. The majority report will be much more liberal in spirit. It will propose that the Episcopalians and the Presbyterians get together and confer on unity before the matter is carried to other ecclesiastical families. The meeting will be deeply concerned with regard to a Presbyterian union. Should these twenty million people form a union they would be a force to be reckoned with in the coming negotiations with regard to the larger unity of God's people. The woman question will be debated with vigor. The English Presbyterians have thrown down the gauntlet by allowing women to be ordained as elders, though this does not carry with it the privilege of preaching. This is a great innovation in the Presbyterian group.

Distributes Best Book on Christian Science

While there is all too much of a sensationalism that is cheap and pointless, the great preachers of every age have known how to shock people into thinking. Dr. James T. Gordon of San Francisco, who preaches in First Congregational church, is succeeding in a city which is admittedly the hardest city on the American continent for church work. One of his devices for securing attention recently is a very interesting one. He advertised that at the close of his evening service he would distribute free to every worshipper the best book on Christian Science. Each person who came to church received a copy of John's Gospel. The attitude of this Gospel writer to those who deny that Jesus came in the flesh is well known.

Bankers Advertise the Churches

The bankers of Portsmouth, Ohio, appreciate the churches, and are willing to spend their money to tell the people of their town about it. In a large display advertisement five columns wide they recently set forth their reasons for urging everyone in Portsmouth to attend the churches. The following are some of the interesting statements to be found in the ad: "Every banker in Portsmouth knows that if the churches had not been here since the beginning of the town the banks could not stay a week,—never would have been. Law and order must precede safe banking. Churches induce law and order. We support the churches, each banker and employee according to his choice, because we want Portsmouth to grow and become a better place in which to live and raise a family. We know that along the path of righteousness and this alone lies stable, continuous prosperity. We want to put our influence on the side of right every time." The churches of Portsmouth make a more effective impression upon the business men of the town because of the fact that they are organized into a federation composed of twenty-five congregations of seven denominations.

Small Denomination Is Very Aggressive

The Seventh Day Adventist denomination is a relatively small group, but is one of the most active in the world. It operates forty colleges and eighty sanitariums in various parts of the world. During the past year forty-one publishing houses put out six million dollars worth of literature. Few of the great denominations of America, if indeed any of them, could equal the value of this product from the printing presses. The Adventists have come the more into public attention this year by reason of their propaganda against Sunday legislation.

Episcopalians Capture Wireless Field

Filling the air with religion is the latest exploit of an Episcopal church. First a church in Pittsburgh began sending out the evening service by wireless. A telephone carried the sermon and music out to the outskirts of the city where a powerful radio outfit send it hundreds of miles to operators who were listening in. Trinity church of Hamilton, Ohio, has recently made arrangements to send their morning service over a radius of five hundred miles. Portable sets will be furnished invalids who wish to attend church by listening in. The Hamilton church will reproduce the Pittsburgh evening service with a special outfit on Sunday evenings.

Labor Papers Becoming Aware of Church Attitude

As the church gives better publicity to her social and industrial creed, long since adopted by the representatives of thirty-two protestant denominations, the labor papers of the land are treating the church with much greater respect. Too long the social creed of the churches was hidden away in the archives. A recent issue of the journal called Labor contained liberal extracts from both Catholics and Protestants on the industrial question. Since readers of The Christian Century may be less familiar with Catholic opinion, the following excerpt from Labor given as coming from the Pope, is presented: "The questions regarding the conditions and hours of labor, salaries and strikes are not of a purely economic character; they are moral problems in their very essence and can be settled only by having recourse to the fundamental principles of justice and charity."

Will Move College of Missions

The College of Missions of the Disciples of Christ, located at Indianapolis, has sent to the foreign field more than a hundred and fifty missionaries. This record is not equaled by any other institution for the graduate training of missionaries. The institution was founded following the report of the Edinburgh conference favoring such institutions. Difficulties have appeared with the years, chief of which is the lack of university facilities. Pedagogy, Christian social service and many other interests are taught in the great universities, and the expense of duplicating such faculties at Indianapolis seems in the judgment of the board of trustees prohibitive. Recently these trustees issued to their public a frank statement of the difficulties in the way of going forward with the institution under present conditions. The alternative of the board is either to develop a university at Indianapolis or else take the College of Missions to the campus of some university. The board pronounces the first alternative impractical. The trustees frankly confess that the returned missionaries do not go to the College of Missions on their furloughs, though they would greatly prefer to do so. On furlough the missionary usually pursues a specialized course of study. At the present time and for some years past the vast majority of Disciples missionaries have attended the University of Chicago when on furlough. The board of trustees does not indicate in its public statement where the College of Missions will be moved to. The sentiment of the board is known to be divided on this point.

Funeral of a Suicide

Ecclesiastical law in the older communions is very rigid on the subject of the funeral for suicides. The Roman Catholic church refuses a funeral service and burial in holy ground. The Lutheran church refuses a service. The Episcopal church will not permit a suicide to be buried from the church. Recently a young man in an eastern city committed suicide by drowning. The evidence was indubitable. Nevertheless the rector of the Episcopal church conducted the funeral in the church on the ground that "The young man's death was not regarded as an ordinary suicide, but was due to a nervous state brought about by conditions beyond his control." The ministers of many evangelical denominations make no distinctions in the matter of funerals, holding a service of scripture and prayer and gospel preaching over any body. Even these have sometimes been daunted by the problem of the man who takes his own life. Is such a man responsible for his own act, as the church of former centuries taught, or is he the victim of a nervous condition, as the law of our land mercifully presupposes?

Methodist Ministry and Longevity

Insurance companies all say that the ministry is the longest lived occupation in America, the ministers having a better life history than the farmers, who come second. The Methodists have been compiling statistics recently on their old ministers, and it has been discovered that there are thirty Methodist ministers in northern Methodism who are over ninety years of age. The oldest minister in this group is Rev. Seth Reed of Flint, Mich. He has a record of over seventy years of preaching, which is believed to be the greatest record ever made by a minister in this country. The man second in rank is Rev. Edwin Stuart Best of Malden, Mass. He is now in his 97th year. It is significant that many ministers in the eighties in this country still preach occasionally, and engage in literary labors.

How Churches Lose Members

The Presbyterian church has a very careful system of keeping its records, and statistics from this source are quite reliable. The recently published statistics of this denomination give some impression of the way in which denominations lose their members, for it is well known that the large ingatherings every year are not matched by the net gains. Death seems to be the least serious loss to the membership of the Presbyterian church. Out of a membership of 1,692,558 the death loss last year was only 19,958, or slightly over one per cent. The number dismissed to other churches was 61,157, which must be compared with 84,858 received from other churches, leaving a balance on the right side of the ledger. The real leakage is shown by the fact that 61,157 were placed upon the suspended roll, while only 12,345 were restored from the list of inactives of previous years. This indicates a loss of fifty thousand a year approximately through spiritual relapse, as compared with a loss of twenty thousand a year through physical death. It would seem that the spiritual death rate among Presbyterians is two and one-half times as high as the physical death rate.

Unitarians Steal Thunder of the Orthodox

Not long since a Unitarian writer bewailed the alleged fact that the orthodox churches were stealing the Unitarian thunder and filling their churches with people to hear good heretical preaching, while the Unitarian churches, original depositories of heresy, were gathering together a handful. Whether this suggestion has been taken seriously by the leaders of the denomination, one may not know, but the announcement is out for a big drive in the Unitarian fellowship, just the kind of spiritual dissipation that orthodox communions have been indulging in during recent years. The goals that are set are the most ambitious yet proposed in any communion. The Unitarian churches seek a twenty-five per cent gain in membership. They also set up the ideals of more spiritual power in the churches and larger service in the world. It is evident that henceforth the Unitarian fellowship is to be reckoned with as an aggressive factor in American christianity. One does not need to agree with all their doctrines to rejoice that this is so.

New York's Notable Y. M. C. A.

A religious organization that has 31,514 members; gathers 17,092 of them in its educational classes; furnishes 834,312 lodgings in its dormitories; serves 2,238,076 meals in its restaurants at pre-war prices; enrolls 2,593 in its naturalization classes and secures first or final papers for them; places 7,472 unemployed men and boys in positions; conducts 8,292 gymnasium classes with attendance of 769,555; helps 5,022 stranded men to get on their feet again; holds 939 automobile street meetings with 242,405 attendants, 852 shop and factory meetings, 102,209 listeners, and 2,247 other religious meetings drawing 202,221—this in the course of a year's work, is surely something of an institution. These figures of service rendered are given in the 69th annual report of the New York City

Faith Healing Since the War

EVERY kind of religious "ism" and schism has been prospered by the unrest that has fallen upon the world since the war. A number of new faith healers have come into the limelight in various sections of the world. Italy has given us a wonder-worker by the name of J. Barbera, who for a time practiced in New York among his countrymen. His method of healing was to place a crucifix in the hand of his patient, rub the hand holding the cross over the affected part, and apply the healing oil. He was making a reputation for many cures, with a profitable inflow of fees, when the courts of New York cruelly put an end to the operation of divine grace.

In Avignon, France, is a spectacular "healer" whose operations are described thus: "He drinks a glass of cognac, washes his hands in ether, and rubs the affected part." This man has brought so many pilgrims to town, and local business has enjoyed such profit from them that there has been no interference on the part of the police.

The most spectacular figure among these new faith healers is that of Aimee Semple McPherson, a Canadian evangelist, who is now operating in Denver. She has worked in a number of American cities, but it is in Denver, the erstwhile abode of Francis Schlatter, that she has found the most fruitful field. She conducts the conventional revivalistic services at the close of which she emphasizes the power of faith to heal. She holds three services daily, and the City Auditorium, seating ten thousand people, has been filled to capacity. Her technique is thus described: "The sick, with their cards, mount the platform, lifting their faces and hands to heaven. On the platform behind them is a row of chairs. Behind these chairs there is strung a rope to receive canes and crutches. Beside the evangelist stands an assistant with a silver dish containing anointing oil. The setting is complete and nothing is lost from which an impressionable mind could profit."

Since everything is conditioned on faith, practically everyone coming for healing professes benefit, for to deny benefit would be to admit at once the very condition through which faith must operate. A great many people throw away their crutches who later go and buy a new pair. Some of these take their place in the line a second time to make a new experiment in faith. Dr. C. S. Bluemel of Denver has taken pains to investigate a number of the most wonderful cases of "healing." His findings are published in the July number of Colorado Medicine. While his mental attitude betrays some bias arising from his professional presuppositions, there can be no doubt about the accuracy of his diagnosis in the following cases. He says: "I am fortunate in having personal knowledge of a number of 'cures' wrought by the evangelist. One young man suffering from tuberculosis left his bed at the county hospital on the evening of June 22 and attended the revival service. From the platform he publicly proclaimed himself cured of his disease. After the service he returned to the hospital and a few days later developed tubercular meningitis. He died July 5, thirteen days after the miracle of healing."

"A young woman with tuberculosis of the hip joint got up from her bed, removed a loose-fitting body cast and proclaimed that she was cured. Ten minutes later I saw her in an ante-room, lying on a couch in complete collapse."

"A patient of mine with early locomotor ataxia went to the meeting to be cured. He surrendered his cane amid wild cheers from the audience. The next day he returned to my office with a new cane."

"A retired pastor proclaimed that he was cured of lameness. He is still drawing compensation for this disability. Thus it would seem that he must be lame, either physically or morally."

"An old gentleman with left-sided paralysis went on the platform to be healed. In his zeal he waved his right hand to the audience, which hailed the miracle with prolonged applause."

Y. M. C. A., with its nine branches. Religious work has featured the last year. Altogether, 4,542 religious meetings were held, with attendance of 572,521. The 144 Bible classes enrolled 9,297 men and boys, with total attendance of 78,848 at the 3,675 sessions. Best of all, definite decisions to follow Christ were made by 2,203, more than in any recent year. The total attendance at the New York Y. M. C. A. schools, with their 224 teachers, was 663,965, and 2,970 ex-service men were given scholarships through the "Y" National War Work Council. The association is one of the great constructive character-building forces of the city.

Missouri Centennial

The State of Missouri is this year celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of its admission into the union. A special celebration was held during the past two weeks at Sedalia in connection with the state fair. It was estimated that nearly 50,000 people attended the exercises. A historical pageant was enacted as one of the special features. This recounted the history of the state from Indian days to the present time and portrayed vividly the various episodes of state experience previous to, during, and since the civil war. The pageant was rendered each evening and was participated in by scores of persons impersonating the various personages famous in the story of the state. Athletic and musical events followed the usual program of the state fair and celebration. Appropriate addresses were made by state and city officials representing various parts of Missouri. A unique feature was the observance of Sunday, August 14th, with religious exercises in the great stock pavilion and at the grand stand. At these two places, large audiences were addressed morning and evening by Dr. James I. Vance of Nashville, Tennessee, and Dr. Herbert L. Willett of Chicago. The value of a celebration of this character, particularly of a historical pageant so carefully prepared as was the one rendered at Sedalia, can hardly be over stated as an educational factor in the life of a commonwealth.

How Shall I Get Ready to Preach?

A church college gives religious training a state school may not give. A state university gives a broader and more thorough training than the average church college can give.

At the Bible College of Missouri a student obtains an intensive religious training while getting the educational benefits of the University of Missouri. Attending both schools at once, he combines the merits of both.

Ministerial students earn their way preaching for near-by churches.

Four Great Books for Thinking People

Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, of the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York City, on being asked what are the outstanding books of the day for alert churchmen and churchwomen, submits four titles. He considers these essential books:

Jesus in the Experience of Men:

By T. R. Glover

Like Dr. Glover's earlier volume, "The Jesus of History," this one demonstrates afresh that "Jesus of Nazareth does stand in the center of human history, that he has brought God and Man into a new relation, that he is the present concern of every one of us and that there is more in him than we have yet accounted for." The author describes his purpose as primarily historical—watching "the Christian apostle and the Christian community brought face to face with new issues, intellectual, spiritual and social, and doing their best to adjust old and new." Professor Glover is Fellow in St. John's College, Cambridge, and University lecturer in ancient history.

Price $1.90, plus 12 cents postage.

Outspoken Essays:

By Dean W. R. Inge

Dean Inge, of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, is one of the great scholars of the Church of England, a Christian philosopher, a keen student of modern life and its tendencies against the background of history. His writings have given religious faith in England a new intellectual appeal. He has won attention no less by the fearless honesty of his inquiry than by his profound comment upon the problems which today engage the minds of men. While he excludes from his consideration no source of knowledge, his approach to the study of these matters is that of the man who believes in God, who believes in the teaching of Jesus, who, because of this faith, accepts the priestly vocation and devotes himself to the service of his fellows through the avenues which the church affords. This book is one of the most popular of the books of "the gloomy dean," as he is sometimes unjustly called. Dr. Newton believes that this book is one of the few current books that will be read fifty years from now.

Price $2.25, plus 12 cents postage.

What Christianity Means to Me:

By Lyman Abbott

As indicated by its sub-title, this book is "a spiritual autobiography." Dr. Abbott states his purpose in the book as follows: "I began the systematic study of the New Testament when I entered the ministry in 1860. Since that time I have been a student of one book, a follower of one Master. This volume is an endeavor to state simply and clearly the results of these sixty years of Bible study, this more than sixty years of Christian experience. The grounds of my confidence in the truth of the statements made in this volume are the teaching of Jesus Christ and His apostles as reported in the New Testament, interpreted and confirmed by a study of life and by my own spiritual consciousness of Christ's gracious presence and life-giving love."

Price $1.75, plus 12 cents postage.

The Proposal of Jesus:

By John H. Hutton

The thesis of this book is that Jesus—disregarding, it is true, the petty disputes and the sects and parties of his day—had as the chief message of his ministry a definite solution for the larger situation of his time, both political and religious, intended to avert the tragic and inevitable national disaster which he saw impending. The author holds that Jesus came into the world for the very purpose of submitting to mankind a program for both personal and social life, in the name of God. He was put to death because he adhered to his program as the only public policy which could save the Jewish nation. Also, that his program "still stands, and still represents his mind and what he accepted as the mind of God and the final ruling upon the conduct of human affairs." Dr. Newton says of the book: "The author makes the whole ministry and message of Jesus not only luminous but awe-inspiring."

Price $2.00, plus 12 cents postage.

The Reason for Courage

BRAVERY is a fundamental virtue among strong people. Now when you are studying the life of Paul you are following the steps of one of the most courageous men who ever faced a crowd. Read the 9th and 10th verses of our lesson and see how Paul dreamed of courage. He saw the Lord standing by him and telling him not to be afraid. Those were the days when they hurt people for being Christians. Read the stories of the persecutions. No hero-lore in all the history of men compares with those narratives. They fought with wild beasts, they were burned as torches in Nero's gardens, they were boiled in oil, they were sawn in two, they were literally fried on red-hot griddles. It was no light thing to be a Christian then. It was not the popular thing. Sometimes I wish it were not so popular now. Frequently it means little for a youth or maiden to join the church. It seems to be correct form; their friends are joining and so they go along. Very little courage is required. But do not think for a minute that you can get along without this important element. Can you stand out against your set? When all the boys and girls in your group are about to do something wrong, can you stand up and be independent? To do that takes cool, strong nerve. Only a moral hero is the real thing. I have interviewed scores of high school fellows about their personal lives. I know the vices and sins that are peculiar to high school days. May I say to you, out of a mature experience, that the temptations that assail you between fourteen and twenty are among the most fierce you will ever meet. The ship hardly leaves the shore before the wildest storm strikes it. The hot, sudden, impetuous temptations of early youth are among the most desperate you will ever meet. If you conquer here you will never fail. If you are weak here you will always be weak. How about your fighting spirit? How about your resistance? Let me give you a secret: It is the secret of Paul—he saw the Lord standing by him and telling him not to be afraid. If the White Christ walks with you that power will be yours. We all admire Tom Brown for kneeling down and praying that first night at school, in the sight of all the boys. Don't be a coward! Don't hide your religion. Let everyone in your set know that you belong to the church. Let them all know that you attend a certain Sunday-school class. General Howard had for his initials O. O., and he used to say that stood for "Out and Out for God." Be worthy of fellowship with the old heroes.

Isn't that precisely the sort of teaching your intermediates need? This is John R. Ewers' first lesson talk in the new Intermediate Edition of the 20th Century Quarterly (on the International Uniform lessons). And Dr. Ewers' work is but one of the five excellent features of the Quarterly.

The Peril of Ireland

IRELAND faces the gravest danger of her history at this present moment. She carried world sentiment with her a long way in her demand for political freedom, but if her attitude becomes one in which there is no spirit of concession, she will have to stand alone save for the support of Irish hyphenates in various countries. She has been offered an honorable peace with complete control of her local affairs. The status in the empire is one that other nations have not thought to be incompatible with self-respect. The federal union of the United States fought a great war that the United States should be one nation rather than two antagonistic ones. It is hardly likely that world opinion will favor a different policy with regard to a proposed secession from the British Empire. That Ireland should have self-government men of democratic convictions have long since been convinced, but that the British Empire should live with an independent nation at her door and one which so recently trafficked treasonably with the Germans is hardly to be expected. Ireland stands upon the eve either of the great and honorable peace for which her statesmen have labored for a hundred years, or of a disastrous civil war in which she has not one chance in a thousand to win. The danger of the moment is that the nation is now being led by doctrinaire extremists. These extremists may or may not have the support of the majority of the Irish people. It would be interesting to test this very question by a plebiscite. It can hardly be believed by peaceful men and women outside of Ireland that a majority would deliberately vote themselves into a bloody and fruitless contest in which Ireland would have everything to lose and not much possibility of gaining anything. It will be a great pity if the vatican influences which play so great a part in Irish politics do not at this time speak in behalf of peace. The old mother church made a great mistake in the world war. Is she about to make another?

Ku Klux Organization a Bad Influence

THE revival of the Ku Klux Klan has come to be a bad influence in many sections of the country. The colored people of Chicago recently held a large mass meeting to protest against the recent organization of a branch of the southern society in this city. The presence of the Ku Klux Klan does not make the life even of white people safer, but more hazardous, for the worst passions of the black man are aroused by the dramatic symbols of ancient feuds. In Texas there have been many night raids, some of them committed against white people. Forty-nine legislators in Texas have presented a petition to the governor in behalf of a bill to prescribe penalties "for persons disguising themselves and violating the laws of the state by inflicting punishment upon persons against whom no legal complaint has been filed." The spokesman for the request left no doubt that the bill was aimed to curb the activities of the Ku Klux Klan. While without doubt many sincere though misguided people have joined the organization out of a sense of duty, for the most part the new movement has been fostered by a mixture of race prejudice and commercialism. The Ku Klux Klan demands an unusual amount of paraphernalia, and the paraphernalia houses would be more interested in seeing it go forward than some insurance order meeting infrequently, and which needs no flowing robes and striking costumes. Meanwhile the better elements of both north and south may well strike hands in an effort to bring about better feeling between the two races by a fraternal consideration of grievances on both sides. This would mean just an honest Christian effort to resolve each situation in the spirit of the gospel. All efforts to frighten the Negro into subjection are doomed to ultimate defeat. But it is possible to educate him to respect his own racial heritage and to keep the law, just as we hope it is possible to teach white men that mobs are not proper tools for use by a democracy.

Unemployment Is Increasing

THE employment situation seems to be growing rapidly worse. Thousands of employes of the Deering Harvester Works of Chicago will be walking the streets for a job during September. Whether the works will open again before January 1 is problematical. Conditions are not essentially different at the McCormick works. The United States issues an Industrial Employment Survey Bulletin. This bulletin shows the ratio of unemployment in 1,428 firms located in sixty-five chief industrial centers. It finds an increase of unemployment during June of 2.9 per cent and a further increase of 1.1 per cent during July. The increase in six months ending July 31 was 7.3 per cent. This six month period is the one in which normally we would expect conditions to be improving continually. At the most favorable time of year for unemployment, the number of idle men has grown greater with each passing month. Meanwhile a great many public enterprises are being held up awaiting better prices. Seventy million dollars of road money are awaiting investment in Illinois. Many public buildings wait for better conditions. It would seem that it would be better for the public morals if some of these great public funds were spent now so as to give employment, rather than to raise great charity funds next winter to support a considerable population in idleness. The church takes interest in these facts because it is to the church that the down-and-out man turns as a last resort. The churches may as well prepare now for charity on a great scale during the coming winter. Meanwhile, it is none of the church's business how the nation carries on its industrial enterprises!

Making Way for the Community Church

SECTARIANISM has hindered the cause of Christ in many a rural community. This is nicely illustrated by the situation at Streetsboro, Ohio, which has been described by the Home Mission Council. Two tiny churches had disputed the field for years, one a Presbyterian church with forty-two members, the other a Methodist church with eighty-five members. The Presbyterians had no regular preaching and the Methodists had preaching every other week on a Sunday afternoon. The young people of the community, less interested to the denominational shibboleths than their elders, grew tired of the situation. They went out through the community to get pledges for $1,900 per year. The result is that the Presbyterians will unite with the Methodist church, the Presbyterian building has been torn down to make way for a parsonage, and a community which had meager religious opportunities is now once more on the church map. The solution in Streetsboro may not be the ideal solution. The surrender of the field to the numerically strong denomination took a lot of grace on the part of the Presbyterians, but it was better than a continuation of competition. The better solution is the community church out and out. Eventually these churches will come to have a recognized status in connection with our organized Christianity. Some day the village churches may be so predominantly of this type that the cities will grow weary of keeping old names and irrelevant loyalties which stand in the way of the interests of the kingdom of God. The community church should be free to choose its own minister without outside compulsion, though with kindly advice from the leaders of any denomination when this is requested. It should reduce its creedal requirements to the minimum and stress in place of the creed a program of service to which the members will give themselves in whole-hearted cooperation. Such a church would win in most communities multitudes of right living people who stay out of our sectarian churches whose denominational affiliation eclipses necessarily and inevitably their service to the kingdom of God.

Crane's Criticisms Not Altogether Ridiculous

CRITICS of Dr. Frank Crane's widely quoted article in the Century Magazine on "The Four Immoralities of the Church" have displayed, with two or three exceptions, singular lack of imagination. Their comments have been based upon the assumption that to call the church "immoral" because it is exclusive, respectable, free and militant is simply ridiculous, and the man who uses such terms is only making a bid for that kind of attention which our public gives to the maker of clever and daring absurdities. This, however, betrays dullness of comprehension. There is a very substantial background of present day opinion in the light of which Dr. Crane's argument must be read. A practical philosophy of religion as not a thing above or apart from our common democratic life, but integral to our democratic life is defining itself in many minds. It is this non-institutionalized sort of religion which the Crane article undertakes to set over against the sort of religion which has immured itself in a church and which keeps itself apart, making contact with democratic society only or chiefly through campaigns of invasion for recruiting purposes. The historic church institution as we now have it unquestionably goes on the assumption that its chief service to humanity is rendered through a policy of sequestration of its converts in a more or less exclusive social group entered by certain tests—creedal, ceremonial or otherwise—and within which are to be achieved the virtues and satisfactions of the spiritual life. It is against this sequestration theory of religion that Dr. Crane launches his paradoxes. He is aware of the resentment with which the non-ecclesiastical mind regards the superior assumptions of churchmanship. He is aware, too, of the many dynamic forces, essentially if not professedly Christian, which are operating outside the church. And he feels the impotence of the church as at present organized with its congenial group of souls, to control or convert the mighty forces of our social life which really determine the world's character. What he is feeling after is a more democratic status for religion, that not a few selected ones only but even those who now think of themselves as non-religious may have the inspiration of faith that comes only through fellowship.

Denominationalism the Foe of Democracy

WHETHER or not such an absolute integration of religion with our common democratic life ever becomes possible, it must be manifest that the sort of churches we now have are far from being true representatives of the principles and spirit of Jesus. The community idea has wholly dropped away from our Christianity since the Lutheran reformation broke our religion into so many competing and jealous sects. Students of social conditions in our Protestant communities agree that the churches do more than all other forces together to hinder the knitting of a community into self-conscious unity for a program of self-improvement and unselfish service. This is an awful charge for the church to rest under. The whole system of Protestant denominationalism is artificial and impertinent, playing the mischief with all our social ideals, and hindering progress. When one looks at concrete cases of our church life in relation to its own community there is poignant meaning and application in Dr. Crane's statements. The church is exclusive—artificially, undemocratically exclusive, unchristianly exclusive. The church is respectable—artificially the creator of false statuses for members of our democratic communities. The church does cheapen itself through its free appeal, and its own sense of responsibility to deliver its goods is weakened by the very lack of a quid pro quo. And the church's militancy is more often than otherwise stimulated by sectarian zeal and other motives inherent in the denominational system but neither democratic nor Christian. Whether we take the situation in ecclesiastical terms or in spiritual terms, it comes to this issue: We can never have either a united church or a pure Christianity until the democratic community is taken up as a whole into the program of religion.

The Interdependent World

DR. CHARLES W. ELIOT has shown how by reading for fifteen minutes daily a selected number of books filling a five-foot shelf, one may become acquainted with the best of the world's thought. To understand and digest Prof. G. F. Nicholai's "Biology of War," read in short installments every day for a year and then re-read, would, we believe, give the thoughtful teacher who digested it more in one book of science, philosophy and practical suggestion for teaching fundamental principles than any other reading in a given time. For research, in ancient and modern history, in science of all departments, in poetry, philology, practical business, and ancient and modern philosophy, the book is a wonder of learning which reminds one of the work of the marvelously learned Grotius. This does not mean that it is pedantic or dull, only that the author seems to have taken all knowledge for his province. The greatest marvel is the judicial poise, the insight and the good-will shown in every chapter, taken with the fact that the book was written in a prison-cell.

How such a feat was mentally possible, or was permitted; how the manuscript got smuggled from Germany to Switzerland and was carefully translated and annotated; how the professor, broken in health, escaped in an aeroplane to Denmark is a romance which has few counterparts even in the many extraordinary episodes of the world war.

The teacher who relies on prescribed textbooks and compendiums, and has never ventured outside the mechanics of pedagogy will find the "Biology of War" hard reading and may not understand what relation it has to his profession. But the volume of 550 pages is primarily written for the teacher. The last man who will read it or understand it is the man of military profession. It is a philosophy of human relationships carefully reasoned out, and was inspired by a spirit of rebuke to the ninety-three representatives of German science and art and religion whose hot-blooded appeal in October, 1914, became a notorious document.

The book opens up vistas of thought that make one gasp in wonder, as when one from the plains gets his first glimpse of a snowy mountain-peak. The unity of the world of mind and matter, the interpenetration of science, art and politics by the one informing spirit; the whole false philosophy of a narrow nationalism, of domination and war, as believed by so many of Nicholai's own countrymen, are here elaborated in occasionally such simple form that even the schoolboy can understand. For instance:

No living man can be conceived as other than part of an organism. A man talks and learns only because he sees others doing so; that is, because he has some connection with these others. He can work only because he relies on the work of other men. For instance, I can write only because somewhere men have felled trees, other men have cut them up. Others again have converted them to paper, and finally a whole series of men have conveyed the finished product to me. Another endless series of men furnish me with a pen, another with a pen-holder and another with ink. But in order that these words may be printed, more endless hosts throughout the world have been busy. Some mined the lead for the type, others the iron for the machines, others again produced the oils and dyestuffs for the printer's ink; and each of these workers requires tools and food, the production of which has employed more enormous groups of people.

Thus if we go back to ultimate causes perhaps the world may have had to help in order that even the smallest thought of an author may be transmitted to his reader. . . . Neither intellectually nor physically would man be conceivable except he be regarded as part of a great organism.

This doctrine, simplified, restated in various forms and made the subject of school themes, should be a fundamental element in all grammar school and high school teaching. Beginning with tracing the origin of everything in the home from the banana and coffee bean to the photograph of a Raphael, the child's vision must be extended with the cycle of the months to the perception of the organic nature of an interdependent world. The outburst of narrow nationalism which has recently Balkanized Europe, erected hampering political and economic barriers and set the clock back for generations must be shown as the tragic outcome of a false attitude towards the world and against man's true nature. All progress must face toward cooperation not separation.

War is not only abnormal but futile. Its glorification is an essentially modern thing and its justification by pseudo-science still more recent. The profound demonstration of this as biologic and historic fact is given, but it is not so that he who runs may read. The thinker must dig out the thought and slowly digest it to comprehend it. But the essence of it all can be made comprehensible to the high school student and partly perceived even by the child who is only beginning geography and history. It is much to be desired that a short, popularized edition should be published to bring to the common man the main principles of this volume.

Everything in the lessons on history, geography, civics, literature, and patriotism should be made to emphasize the central truth of human interdependence. Said Nicholai even in the midst of the world war: "The war is only an episode, and intercommunication, going to and fro is an epoch . . . intercommunication, which does not include merely trade, post and railroads but, after all, everything forming a tie between man and man; and a survey of the history of evolution would soon prove that all this [human relationships] springs from the same origin—love. Humanity, love and intercommunication, therefore, mean the same thing. What, therefore, ought to be done is to write a history of intercommunication from the point of view of humanity and likewise to promote it." The full significance of these words dawns on the reader only after much study of the text.

No greater boon could be given the rising generation than teachers inspired with the Kantian insight as regards the spiritual nature of the world. Nicholai's doctrine is based on Kant. He says, "Is it not at once obvious that of all conceivable moral maxims none could be so unsuited to war as the injunction, 'Act so that thy action might become a universal maxim?' For if I shoot an enemy, I can not do so according to Kant, unless I also desire him to shoot me. Kant's philosophy is absolutely irreconcilable with war. It is Kant or war." Nicholai scores the philosopher who claimed that "only a good Kantian could be a good soldier and says, 'The way Kant has been misused is even more repellant than the way religion has been misused.'"

The details of the world war will now fill school-histories, and whether war comes in future will depend upon the philosophy of human relationships that is to be taught the rising generation. If the teacher would get at the kernel, instead of the husks of what he is to teach, let him study the bold German who declaimed against the folly of his countrymen and in the midst of war serenely looked beyond to an epoch of enlightenment and reason. The final chapter is superfluous and unsatisfactory and might well have been omitted. It displays a Comptian attitude of mind which Nicholai's beloved Kant would have been the first to repudiate. It does not, however, affect the main thesis so marvelously elaborated.

The Grace of God

"My grace is sufficient for thee."—2 Cor. 12:9.

ALL lovers of Bunyan know what dealings he had with this text, whereof he has told us in "Grace Abounding." One day while reading this epistle he came upon this text, but it seemed not to have anything to say to him. Indeed, he thought it a tiny text, hardly more than a casual phrase, and not large enough to meet his need. But a fortnight later, in an hour of sadness and terror, that "piece of a sentence," as he called it, darted into his mind like a new star in the sky. Once it seemed too small, but now it seemed to have arms so wide that it could not only enclose him, but many such as he. So great was his joy that he went about repeating it, laying emphasis upon each word, especially upon the last two, which brought it home to his heart. Actually it seemed as if the Lord had looked down from heaven through the tiles and spoken those words to him in his need.

Such a book is the Bible, and there is not another like it in its power to "find us," as Coleridge used to say, revealing its deep truths to us, as it did to Bunyan, when we are ready for them. It is a book of life, not merely a book about life. It is therefore that it "speaks things," as Cromwell would say, telling us not only the truth as it has been learned from living, but the process by which it was wrought out. An example in point is the experience of St. Paul with his thorn in the flesh. What the exact nature of his affliction was is not told us. Nor do we need to know. No doubt we are designedly kept in the dark, and wisely so, lest we should feel that we could bear his burden, and excuse ourselves for failure to bear our own. Enough that it is a symbol of any trial that cuts to the quick, any handicap that hurts deeply and cannot be removed by prayer. St. Paul accepted it as designed because it was needed, and set about to learn what it had to teach and how he could rise above it. The result was a great discovery of the grace of God enabling him not only to bear it, but to overcome it. At once he saw that this abounding grace, which he found equal to the chief difficulty of his life, applies to all our limitations, infirmities, and distresses: "My grace is sufficient for thee."

No wonder the grace of God becomes the first word and the last in the gospel of St. Paul. No other theme is so often on his lips. It is his favorite benediction. It is the burden of his thought and speech alike, as it is the foundation of his faith. By grace are we saved; by grace we are sanctified and set apart for service. Progress in the life of the spirit is a growth "from grace to grace," and the further we go the more amazing becomes the revelation of the "riches of grace." Even the most casual student of St. Paul must have noticed how the phrase "through Christ" becomes "in Christ," as his life deepens into the mellow wonder of his later years. If his words often grope and stagger under the pressure of his thought, it is because he had learned, in the trial and struggle of his days, a truth as ineffable and unutterable as the things heard in the "third heaven" fourteen years before. At last, as the master became all in all, summing up all persons and all things, the words grace and Christ became interchangeable terms in the language of his faith. More and more the word grace seems to tell the whole fact and fullness of the spirit of Jesus, as that spirit was revealed and interpreted in heroic and creative experience of the greatest preacher of our faith.

What is the grace of God which St. Paul found to be more than adequate to the needs of his life, alike in its lesser ills and its great tragedies? The question recalls the saying of St. Augustine: "I know until you ask me; when you ask me, I do not know." As George Eliot said, the deepest things by which we live elude our words—they break through language and escape—speech being only "a ripple on the bosom of the unspoken." Of course, in the original tongue, the word grace means beauty, but as it is here used it means more than anyone has ever put into the word beauty—yea, though he make it to include the wonder of dawn and eve, the lilt of flowing waters, the songs of birds, the majesty of mountains and ebb and flow of seas, the strength of man, the loveliness of woman, the laughter of little children, the love of friend; the miracles of chisel, brush, and pen; the zest of conflict for the ideal and the peace of duty done:

I have known a world hang star-like
O'er a dreary waste of years,
And it only seemed the brighter
Looked at through a mist of tears.

What is gravitation? It is a subtle, invisible, universal force, steadfast, dependable, holding in its grasp the stars that swing round their vast orbits and the tiny dust-fleck that floats in the evening air. What is electricity? It is an ever-present, inscrutable, all-pervasive power, hard to know from life itself, eluding our analysis, yet waiting our patient discovery, and ready to serve our uses in forms innumerable. What is the grace of God? It is the eternal power of God, his living love in which we "live and move and have our being," everywhere present, always active, enswathing, sustaining all human life, equally the long reaches of history and the separate motions of each mind; a wonder hardly guessed by us, waiting to do "exceeding abundantly" above all we can ask and think. Many-sided, inexhaustible, accessible, unwearied, unwashed, and infinitely beneficent, it is not possible to say that there is any "higher gift than grace," or to describe the grace of God as anything other than God himself, by whose power we live every moment, who is our fullness and in whom alone we are complete—"the love that moves the sun and all the stars," and, no less, the redeeming mercy which surrounds the limitations and liberties, the disaster and deliverances of life:

God's presence and his very self,
And essence all divine.

"The grace of God!" cried Stevenson. "We live in it, we breathe it, we walk upon it. It is the roof, the rafters, the floor, and the nails of the universe!" Surely here is "the one thing needful" for us today, as it has been for all men in the past; and to know what it is that sustains us, to be aware who it is with whom we have to do always and everywhere—that is religion. All men live by the grace of God, whether they know or not. The religious man differs from his neighbor not in the facts of life, but in their interpretation; what in one is an unconscious life in God becomes in the other a grateful and joyous fellowship with him. Nor will there ever be a time, even if all the dreams of social seers come true, when the grace of God will not be the supreme need of our race, and of each one of us. Much as we may hope from human genius, some things will remain unchanged no matter how far the wit of man may go. The bodily life will always have its hundred doorless avenues of pain and anguish. Infirmities will beset us, disappointments dishearten us, sorrow be-shadow us, and the old divine discontent torment us. Until whatever is to be the end of mortal things death will not fail to haunt our days, leaving us with aching hearts and empty arms. Never, while we live upon this earth, will there be a day when we shall not need the comfort and assurance of this text: "My grace is sufficient for thee."

If all this seems rather vague, perhaps it will be at once plainer and more practical if we think of the grace of God as akin to the power of renewal, of recovery, of repair in nature. Wounds tend to heal. The body in disease fights for its health, using all its resources to repel the invader. No physician ever healed a disease. All he can do is to help the healing forces of nature to do their work. When an injury is wrought nature starts to repair it. Trampled fields soon become green again. Similarly, in the moral and spiritual world, there is a power ever at work resisting evil and striving to overcome it. As the tide of misery rises a tide of mercy rises against it. "Where sin abounded grace did much more abound."

Many theories of sin have been held, but all of them together are needed to fathom the abysmal reality of it. Socrates said that sin is due to ignorance, and that the way out of it is the way of knowledge. Much of it is the fruit of ignorance, but not all. Plato said that living is like driving a team of horses, one tame and the other wild. Occasionally the wild horse runs away and there is a wreck. Sin is thus an outbreak of the wild animal within us. This, too, explains much, but it does not cover all the facts. Aristotle went deeper when he said that there is a profound perversity of will in man whereby he does wrong deliberately, cunningly, daringly in face of the right. Until we have reckoned with this fact, testified to by our own hearts and revealed by all the masters and interpreters of the human spirit, we have not measured the reality of sin. Truly here is a fact with which only the grace of God can deal, and this is what St. Paul meant when he said that it is by grace we are saved, as every man must know who has been mercifully kept from damning himself.

Cleansing from sin, comfort in sorrow, victory over our handicaps—these things we need, as God knows; but in our day men are seeking much else. New cults are founded and flourish, which have doubtless the worship of God for their great purpose, but they also have the purpose of healing both body and mind. The quest is for power—power to master disease, to conquer fear, to subdue dark moods, to rise above the ills that beset and the shadows that becloud life. In truth, men are seeking personal efficiency through religion, and therein they are right. They have learned that they can change their lives by thinking, by altering their inner attitude, and attain to a brighter and more fruitful existence. Here again they are right. Christian Science and related cults are not accidental; they bespeak a more practical personal application of spiritual realities to the actual lives of men. The church has been remiss in the matter of specific direction in the details of the spiritual life. It has told men to pray, but it has not told them how to pray. Prayer is a high, hard, difficult art to master, as St. Teresa learned.

Many pious folk are alarmed at the study of psychology of religion, as if it somehow leaves God out. Far from it. It is strange that as soon as we learn how a thing is done we at once conclude that God did not do it, whereas our business is to learn his laws and obey them. The way to power is to remove the things that check or obstruct the flow of the divine life within us, releasing within ourselves the sources of power, always at our disposal, so that they may flood our life and fill it with light and loveliness. Thus, literally, we work out our salvation—by physical sanitation, moral hygiene, and spiritual fellowship—by the grace of him who worketh in us to will and to do. There is no need, as the manner of some is, to take this one aspect of the religious life and by over-emphasis make a new religion of it. On the other hand, if people are being led away from the church in their quest of power to overcome disease and temptation, it must be that the church has somehow failed to preach, much less to practice, a full-orbed gospel of Christ. We must rediscover the riches of grace and its uses for body and mind, as well as for the health and healing of the soul. Wherefore do we seek power, if it be not to rebuild a shattered world and help forward the kingdom of heaven?

Power sought selfishly, for our own ease, or success, or even health, will not be found, for in these high matters we get by losing and can only keep by giving away. For the healing of the world, for the attainment of the nobler mind, the great heart, the creative sympathy so much needed today we must seek the grace of God! Nothing else or less is adequate to the bewildering confusion in which we grope and stumble. Only the faith that there is a spirit in man, greater than man himself, can arm us in our war against war. No longer must we fatalistically submit to evils, however venerable, as eternal or necessary; we must gird our swords of light and make battle. For these vast enterprises we need power—even the “power from on high” promised to those who seek it—else the world will run on in the old rut. Evermore the words return to renew our faith in a day of rancour and reaction: “My grace is sufficient for thee, for, lo! I am with you all the way, even to the end of the world.”

For it is in Christ that the grace of God takes living form, looking into our eyes with hope, and touching our hands with power; even “the strange power which men call weakness.” St. Paul taxed his marvelous power of speech in trying to tell us this unutterable truth, and where his words were blinded by the glory of the vision no one else may hope to enter. The Grace of God taking win-some, haunting, hallowing Form and walking by our side; the Word of God speaking to us in human tones telling us the truth about life and death and all that lies between and beyond—it is wonderful beyond all mortal tongue or pen! There is no moral difficulty we may not master, no perplexity we may not solve, no sin we may not overcome.

no grace we may attain by the grace of him who turned a crown of thorns into a diadem of victory and redemption!

The Chalk Mark and the Blacking

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE was a certain Ethiopian, and he worked for the Pullman Benevolent Society. And he could not remember what Shoes belonged to What Berth. Therefore did he mark with Chalk upon the Sole of the Shoes the number of the Berth. And he blacked them and replaced them.

And there came a night when he had gathered the Shoes, and he fell asleep before they were blacked. And he hastened, and he wiped the dust off them with a Rag, and he replaced them under the Berths. And the passengers tipped him just the same. For they beheld the chalk mark and accepted it as evidence that their Shoes had been blacked.

And the Porter said, Behold I have made a great discovery. If people think their Shoes have been blacked, then they are blacked.

For he had been to College, and he knew the system of a celebrated German Philosopher whose name was Albrecht Ritschl.

And he said, This is a world of Value Judgments, and things are worth whatever they are accepted as being worth.

And he found his Chalk mark was worth a quarter, and the blacking of Shoes was worth no more.

But he tried it once upon me, and I gave him another lesson in Philosophy.

And I said, Oh, thou shrewd and crafty Ethiopian, there are men who have gotten rich by the sale of Mining Stocks whose value was based on thy system, and there are others who have gained great renown as Philosophers who work the same racket, but in the long run, it is nothing to write home about. The world will little note nor long remember the whiteness of thy Chalk upon the soles of their Shoes; they will want to judge thee by the blackness of the blacking upon the residue thereof.

And I said, Thou hast the number of my Berth, and I also have thy number. It is not 23, for I will not report thee for thy neglect, but speak to thee kindly. Black thou thy Shoes, and do it honestly, or else betake thee to the hay and omit the Chalk mark.

And I considered how many men there be who fall into the same system. They discover some method whereby their work shall appear to have been done, and then go to sleep with the calm assurance that their absent treatment will not be discovered. But there cometh a time when the establishment is laying off help, and then are those men on the wrong side of the Employment Gate.

For what I say unto the Ethiopian, that do I say to all men, that white Chalk mark upon the sole of the Shoe is no permanent or satisfactory substitute for the black mark of the blacking brush where the blacking doth belong. And men's sins do find them out.

War and the Teaching of Jesus

By Rufus M. Jones

A DISTINGUISHED Christian scholar in one of our American Divinity Schools declared, during the intensity of the war strain, that he had got to the point where he could imagine Jesus dressed in khaki and sighting with his eye down the barrel of a rifle leveled at his enemy. Every word of the Galilean Master which could be used to give sanction to war was mobilized into service. It was, to be sure, a very thin collection of sayings and doings that was mustered out for this purpose, but they were used many times over and with considerable ingenuity. The scene at the cleansing of the temple when the whip of small cords was used rose to a place of almost supreme importance among the events of the great narratives. Very few readers seemed to notice, however, that no one of the synoptist writers referred to any whip, or that John implies that it was used only for the sheep and the oxen. So meager were the available passages that most interpreters gave up trying to support their case with gospel texts and frankly resorted to the ad hominem method of declaring that Christ lived in an atmosphere of apocalyptic expectation when the end of all things seemed near, and that if he had lived in our day when the issues of evil had to be met, he would have spoken and acted very differently—in short, he would have been like other men if he had been in these hard circumstances!

LEVELING CHRIST DOWN

All this seems to me very doubtful exegesis. It is always sad to find it necessary to level Christ down to our standards. It is surely a sounder and truer method to admit honestly and sincerely that we have come to a crisis when we can no longer follow him, because he is too far above us, and that therefore for the moment we feel compelled to drop to a lower human standard, hoping that in happier times we may come back once more to his way of life. There are numerous texts in the Old Testament which approve of war, and if the preacher feels that he must give his blessing upon those who fight let him brace his arguments for war by quotations from "them of old time," and let him leave Jesus untarnished, standing in his faith and purity and practicing, under circumstances as hard as any we have faced, a way of life which eliminates hatred and war. Let us endeavor to discover, if we can, his spirit and his method as they are expressed and exhibited in the gospels.

The constructive task laid upon our generation calls for something more than diplomacy and statesmanship. It calls for a rediscovery of spiritual energies that will rebuild the world. The new order of things which we hope and pray may rise out of the wreck of the old civilization, which has been ground in the awful millstones of war, can come forth into life and power only through the operation of positive spiritual forces on a greater scale than has ever been known before. I believe that there are new energies of life to be found in the primitive Christian gospel, taken seriously and practically as a way of life and a way of action. The gospel of Jesus Christ is not for Utopia—some dream land built out of sheer imagination—but for this mixed world of ours. We have no way of knowing what other worlds are like. We search in vain for the scenery and conditions of life beyond our sphere of time and space. What we do possess is a luminous account of the laws and conditions that underlie and determine complete and perfect human life in this world where we are.

A PERFECT PERSONAL LIFE

The gospel presents first of all an actual instance of a perfect personal life. When we go back to the headwaters of Christianity we come not to a metaphysical theory, or a theological dogma, or a capricious fancy constructed out of exuberant hopes—we come to a personal exhibition of divine life revealed in human life, the eternal in the midst of time. We come to One who felt in his own consciousness union of mind and heart and will of God, and who was at the same time so truly of our nature that we see in him, as we see nowhere else, the goal and type of complete normal, spiritual life.

The gospel is primarily a Person. It is not a code, it is a Life. It is not a system, it is an incarnation. It is not a body of commands, it is the warm and intimate appeal of a Person who has felt and known the mystery and tragedy of this strange struggle of ours and who through it all has triumphed. It is not a magical way of escape from pain and vicissitude, it is the personal inspiration of One who can say, in quiet simplicity, "I am the Truth," "I am the Life," "I am the Way," "I am the Door." This is the innermost gospel—the gospel within the gospel—this harmonized Will, this completely adjusted Person who shows us for once Life as it ought to be.

GOD'S RESOURCES

In close and intimate conjunction with this innermost gospel there is a no less wonderful gospel-strand, dealing with the possibilities and implications of our own human life. Its diagnosis of human nature as it is now is tremendously searching and its account is grave and sober. There is something radically wrong within. Man's nature carries in it a hampering element that tends to spoil the life. There is a serious taint in the stuff, a twist in the fibre, a weakness in the grain. Man does not do what he is meant to do. He does not follow his vision. He misses the mark, he gets lost. But in spite of this elemental fact of nature which all human experience verifies, and the common consciousness of the race acknowledges, the gospel is exceedingly optimistic about man. There are no set limits to his possibilities. There is no known terminus to his destiny. There is no fixed stopping place for his potential personality. This gospel uses breathlessly bold words of prophesy about us. "You are," it says, "to be perfect even as your Father is perfect." "You are to learn how to forgive even as Your Father in heaven forgives." "You are to love," this perfect Lover of men tells us, "even as I have loved you." "All things are possible for him who believeth." - "Greater things than these which you have seen me do shall you do."

This high expectation is not due to blind enthusiastic hope. It is deeply and solidly based, as everything in the gospel is based, on the fundamental nature of man's soul and on the inexhaustible resources of the God who is here revealed. The spiritual transformations, which are the matters of real importance in the history of Christianity, are not in violation of the laws of the universe; they exhibit and illustrate the essential laws of life. The highest spiritual experiences, the supreme beatitudes of religion, all attach inevitably and inherently to the nature of life. As we go up in the scale we do not leave laws behind and go to a vacuum region beyond laws; we rather come under the operation of higher laws and enter upon a region where new and unexpected forces and energies come into play. The most wonderful thing about the gospel is its proclamation, its impressive revelation, of these higher laws and forces and energies. The amazing faith in the possibilities of men, and all the astonishing expectations that are crowded into the gospel, have their ground in a new and deeper knowledge of those regions and levels of life that had not been explored and charted before. We are dealing here with a fresh invasion of life and with a corresponding revelation of its fundamental laws and principles. So many things project and stand out and call for comment in this revelation of life that it is not easy to select the transcendently important features. But there are two peaks of truth that show forth in peculiar splendor and dominance—(1) the redemptive or conquering, power of love; (2) the irresistible expansion of the kingdom of God.

DISAPPOINTED IN JESUS

Christ was not the first to proclaim the redemptive power of love. There were flashes and gleams of its discovery as a principle of life not only in Hosea, and in "the suffering servant" chapters of Isaiah, but also in Euripides and Plato, in the stories of the Buddha, and in the highest reaches of almost all pre-Christian literature. Christ brought it from the dim light of dawn to full sunrise radiance. He raised it to the *n*th power as a law and way of life. At no point of his teaching or of his practice did he strike across and reverse popular opinion more completely than in his enunciation and exhibition of this sacrificial and redemptive law of life. The people about him all expected a Messiah who should be a world-ruler, a greater David, a breaker of the oppressor's yoke, a "mighty restorer of the kingdom of Israel." He would be, in his own power, "the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof." Every sign of the possession of magical power rallied the multitude to him. They were ready to shout "Hosanna" the moment they were convinced that their strong deliverer had come.

He finally disappointed their hopes. He persistently refused to follow the lines of popular expectation. The jeer of the mob shows why they lost faith in him. "He saved others, himself he could not save." But there is no better statement of the central principal of life than that. Repeatedly it came from his own lips in the paradoxical words of his teaching: "He that saves himself loses himself, and he that loses himself finds himself." It was his purpose, not to change the map of the world, not to set up one king in place of another, not to shift the capital from one hill to another, not to inaugurate a new political empire for an old one—it was his purpose to create a society of persons, liberated from their old nature by a fresh discovery of God, shrinking from sin and abhorring it, because they had found the divine meaning of life, throbbing with joy because a new world and new dimensions of being had opened out on their vision, living no longer by rivalry and competition, but living by love and its contagious power.

TRUSTING HIS LOVE COMPLETELY

There is only one way to produce that kind of a society. It does not come by command. It cannot be created by act of legislature or by sovereign edict. No force of battalions can compel it. The only way to create a society like that is to begin by exhibiting it in a life that incarnates and embodies it. The only way to produce love as an operative force of life is to trust love completely—and to love regardless of all cost. The only way to reveal the nature of God as love and to carry it as a constructive force into the tissues of the social world is to translate it into the vital stuff of actual life, to make it visible and vocal. The only way to break the drift of sin and the instinctive drive of selfishness is to kindle a new and higher passion and to set a new attraction at work. Just this Christ did and he did it in such a way that it comes to light not merely as the highest law of life for earth, but as the essential nature of the divine character as well.

There is a striking verse in Mark's narrative which is a crucial passage for understanding the unfolding of Christ's purpose: "And they were on their way going up to Jerusalem and Jesus was going on before; and they that followed were amazed and afraid." This is not a chance item in an itinerary. It is a crisis of consciousness, a watershed moment in a life-purpose. Until then the stress had been on proclamation; he had been a teacher. He had dwelt upon great ideas, presented with new perspective, new illustrations and new authority. Men listened to his message, were aroused by its novelty and freshness. They approved of his words. They hailed with joy the good news of unexpected privileges. But they remained entrenched in selfishness. The Pharisees made no new adjustments to fit the message. Even his simple Galilean friends, with all their enthusiasm, were still fast bound in habit and instinct and selfish desires. They saw a better life, but they were not ready to pay the price for it. The old diseases of nature and society were eating away at the heart of life. Something more must be tried, some greater dynamic must be discovered, some other force must be brought into operation, a new step must be ventured. He must make the last and greatest appeal within a person's gift and power. He must be ready to go the whole way. He must eliminate all secondary considerations, all thought of self, all expedient and utilitarian methods and stake everything on the uttermost appeal of love. Calvary is the answer.

CENTRAL SPIRITUAL FACT

The world, with its crude theories and its arid metaphysical theologies, has wrapped this central fact of spiritual history round with its own clumsy coverings, but again and again the warm, tender vital truth, in its liberating and inspiring power, has burst open the veils that cover it and has broken in like a newly risen sun and wakened men out of their sleep, made their selfishness seem abhorrent and the way of love seem the only way of life. The greatest of the spiritual awakenings down through the centuries of Christian history have come as the result of the re-discovery of the power of love as revealed in Jesus Christ, the fresh re-discovery of the living fact, the unveiled vision of One who loved men and without any reserve gave himself for them—of One who absolutely trusted love to redeem and to conquer.

This way of life—the way which he exhibited and raised to its full glory—is the kingdom of God. The kingdom is not primarily a post-mortem state, it is not a thing of geography, it is not a political achievement, it is not a millennial dream. It is a way of living. It is a spirit, a disposition, a rightly fashioned will. It is a settled, tested, unqualified confidence in, and practice of, love as a way of life. The Kingdom has come in its essential meaning as soon as there is one person in the world who has attained the Abba-crying experience, and who has added to this upward relationship of love to God the outward reaching attitude of love to all men—the relationship of brothers. But on the other hand the kingdom is the total divine task and consummation of the ages. It is the unending continuation of the work of creation, the making of man. So long as men are still selfish, so long as sin remains, so long as there are social evils to be eradicated, the kingdom will not have fully come. In fact no earthly achievement, no temporal stage, can completely express the full idea of the kingdom, for it includes in its entire meaning both the visible and the invisible, the temporal and the eternal triumph of the spiritual purpose of God.

THE KINGDOM ALWAYS COMES

The kingdom expands as fast as this contagion of love, awakened by the perfect incarnation of it, conquers men's hearts and carries them into this way of life. It does not come by "observation." It is not a spectacle to behold. It is not an event of date or locality. It is coming now. It is coming always. A Russian student who refused to serve in the army, because he believed war to be contrary to the kingdom of God, was told by his commander that his "idea" was right, but that the kingdom had not yet come. "No, sire," the student answered, "it may not have come for you, but it has come for me." The great spiritual question for any man is, how seriously he takes this way of life, how far he is ready to grow with Christ, how completely he trusts love as a method, how determined he is to back his "idea" with his life and with all he holds dear.

This double fellowship of love—a love that joins one's life in joyous union with God as Father and that binds the same life into self-giving social relationship with a world of brothers—this conjunct life is the kingdom of God. It has not come yet for the entire world. It is only in its dawning stage. There are large areas of darkness left. There are terrible moral diseases still unhealed. There are great stretches of jungle which the organizing forces of love have not yet conquered. Marks of moral imperfection mar both the individual life and the social system. The goal is still far away and there is yet much travail and tragedy to be endured. But there are persons living now for whom, as for this Russian student, the kingdom has come—persons who in the complex and difficult world are minded to practice love, intelligently applied, as a way of life.

There is, however, nothing in the proper sense of the word impractical about this way of life, nor is it in any way an irrational course of action. On the contrary it proves to be both practical and highly rational. There is no essential conflict between the method of love and the use of force, so long as force is used as discipline and not as destruction. The real problem is to discover where to mark the limits of force. The early stages of moral discipline, both in the history of the child and of the race, prove beyond any question that restraints and constraints play a great role in the formative process of fixing and settling the distinction between right and wrong, goodness and badness.

BOTH PRACTICAL AND RATIONAL

Nature herself has a forceful way of driving into the consciousness of youthful learners her preferences in the matter of conduct and she has a sphinx-like way of telling her children that the way of the transgressor is not only hard but impossible. Nature's method is tremendously effective but it is slow and the lesson is often long-delayed. Society does not wait for the slow sequences of natural processes. Parents and moral guardians anticipate results and, drawing from the experience of the race, they apply artificial restraints and constraints and so save the learner many bitter lessons. But no wise guardian supposes that the work of moralizing can be carried very far by methods of force and constraint. Higher agencies must come into operation before the goal is reached. Remarkable results have already been attained in all educational work by the substitution of the moral and psychological appeal for the use of force, and still more impressive is the transformation that has been wrought in penal institutions by the introduction of higher agencies in the place of force, for correcting, reforming and redeeming those who have gone seriously astray. The world has only begun to realize the immense effectiveness of love and consecration even with the criminal class, and great results will follow the enlarged and improved application of them.

So, too, it must be admitted that some of the civilizing work of the world has been done in the earlier stages by methods of conflict and warfare. Fighting is no doubt a primitive instinct, and instinct can be trusted to steer beings until there is more adequate light to steer by. There have been wars which left men farther on at the end than at the beginning, though it would be difficult to prove that it was the military method or the successful homicide that secured the advance. Certain desirable qualities have no doubt been stimulated by war at its best, though even here it was the moral issue, the appeal of the ideal, rather than the killing that called forth the heroic virtues and the admirable traits.

But even if we could grant all that can be claimed of fruitful result from this ancient method of instinct, what a price is paid for it! Charles Lamb has told in his humorous essay how the men in China got their roast pig. Through an accidental fire a Chinese chanced to discover how very good to eat was the pig which the fire had caught in its flames and roasted to a crisp. Knowing no other method, he and the other Chinese, who had learned the taste, proceeded to burn down their houses whenever they wanted roast pig.

FOLLY OF WAR

The method of war is a similar kind of economy. It burns down the house and the town, lays waste the land, mortgages the resources of the future, kills its finest physical specimens of the nation, tears with its merciless plowshares through the homes and hearts of the combatants on both sides in order to get results which could always be better secured by Christian methods even though they are slow, as are all rational, moral and educative methods. Other agencies, higher methods, are now available. The old way is antiquated and out-dated, and morally condemned. Truth and righteousness have now found other defenses than theegis of the strong arm. They are no longer at the mercy of the blind instinct. While instinct was in full operation, and before reflection and conscience arose, there was naturally no sense of condemnation. The bee is not conscious of wrongdoing in appropriating honey from clover which belongs to another. But as soon as the incomparable worth and sanctity of personality become clear, as soon as the meaning of social relationship and corporate life is attained, as soon as the majesty and power of love have been proved, the destructive method of war seems then to the awakened conscience inherently an evil way, not to be sanctioned or endured.

War now stands out in irreconcilable conflict with the spirit of love and with the central principle of the kingdom of God, to which the highest loyalty is due. There cannot be any occasion that warrants the suspension of the higher way now that it has been discovered and its power revealed. Love cannot deny its own nature and sanction the way of hate and rapine. However dark the hour, however extreme the crisis, love must continue to hope all things, to believe all things, and, if necessary, to endure all things. It is, nevertheless, no soft and acquiescent attitude. It does not surrender, with free hand, the reins to the capricious will of evil men. There is always a majesty attaching to determined moral goodness. Love, in this wide and deep social and corporate meaning, is power and not weakness. It will flame forth in moral indignation when injustice threatens. It will register its voice and vote for righteousness with no uncertain sound. It can speak and act with a force quite as effective as that of guns. It is possible to be militant and yet to be a member of the kingdom. It is not inconsistent with the spirit of love in behalf of truth and goodness to use the mightiest weapons there are—so long as they are weapons adapted to the constructive purposes of love.

In a world diverse as ours is, there will naturally be at any one stage of history a strange mingling of the old way and the new way, of the past and the future, of exponents of force and exponents of love. The way of the kingdom is not set up by miracle. It "comes" by the slow triumph of one type of life over other types. Those who have been awakened and who see the vision are called to live in this unfinished world by laws and principles which are only partially and feebly recognized. It requires courage and it demands high faith. But the way to make laws and principles spread and grow and prevail is to acknowledge them as true, to accept them as the way of life, and to carry them as far as can be done into operation in the complex affairs of daily life. There is no clearer call, no more rational appeal, no higher loyalty than those which rise out of the fellowship with Christ, and cost what they may, there is no nobler venture than to obey the call, to answer the appeal, to live by this loyalty.

The Fate of the Prophet

By Marshall Wingfield

IT came to pass while I was yet a sojourner in the School of the Prophets that many wayfaring men did pass by, and they spake kindly unto me saying, endure thou the penury and hardships as becometh a man who would speak the words of the Most High, and when thou shalt begin to prophesy verily thou shalt be rewarded.

And when the day drew nigh that I should receive the mantle of a prophet, behold they made a feast for me and spake many gracious words unto me concerning my perseverance. And I was filled with joy. And not many days after I opened my mouth and began to prophesy, and behold! they who had commended my patience under affliction, cried out unto the multitude, saying, Hear not the beardless prophet, for he knowest not whereof he speaks.

Then began I to write mine oracles on parchment, so that in after days men might judge my words, and know that they had been weighed well and considered diligently. And as I read unto the multitude the words which I had written behold there were men who stood up and cried unto the congregation, saying, Hear him not, for he shall bore thee exceedingly.

And after many days I took unto myself a wife from the House of the Prophets and she did journey with me throughout the length and breadth of the land. And on the Sabbath day did she stand up in the Temple for to sing. And there were some who spake against her saying, The wife of the Prophet is presumptuous: she should be seen and not heard. Whereupon did mine helpmeet cease to sing in the Sanctuary; but again did the people speak, saying, The wife of the Prophet is of the Daughters of Men, and careth not for the Sons of God, neither entereth she into their Worship.

And on the days between the Sabbaths we journeyed from house to house, ministering to the poor and the afflicted and speaking glad tidings unto them. Whereupon many waxed indignant, saying, The Prophet desireth the favor of the rabble and hath forsaken his Parchments and the Chamber of Reflection and speaketh not as in the days of old.

Then I gat me unto mine house and unto the Chamber of Reflection and I continued there many days. And as I sat at my window which looketh out toward the Temple there came unto me the voice of those who passed by, saying, The Prophet hath forsaken the poor and the needy and is seen no more in the streets of the city. He hath waxed fat and hath lifted up his soul unto vanity. He delighteth to mingle with those who dwell in palaces. And when I heard these things mine heart was moved within me and I was sore distressed.

And it came to pass after many years when my beard was full grown, and the children whom I had held in mine arms became men and women, that those who had spoken against my youth did also rise up against me and did speak against my gray hairs, saying, This man should no longer Minister in the Sanctuary.

And then I remembered that, from the beginning, the Prophets had been stoned and cast out by those unto whom they were sent. And so I was comforted.

A Self-Questionnaire

By George Gleason

DR. FITCH asks the question: "Can the church survive in the changing order?" We might reply: "The social order can survive only by a changing church." A few weeks ago, I was asked to speak to a group of church members on "Suggestions to the church from the point of view of one who has lived twenty years in the orient." Remembering the old saying, "One cannot see the mountains for the hills," and knowing that any criticisms would be recognized as coming from one who loves and believes in the church, I asked the following questions:

1. Is the church long on individualism, and short on collectivism?

From the Men and Religion Movement started by Fred B. Smith, from the work of such able social leaders as Raymond Robins, Stitt Wilson, Rufus Jones, Harry Ward, Sherwood Eddy, and numerous others of prominence, I have gathered the impression that each of these men might have been more effective had he stood out less as a leader, and lost himself more in a group. If such men and a score of others whom we could mention would really get together and work out a social program on which they all could unite; if each man would then take a definite part in the carrying out of this program, some as newspaper writers, some as promoters in the church magazines, some as investigators, some as lecturers, and others as trainers of other workers, their effectiveness might be greatly multiplied. Among us American Christians there is abundant personal loyalty to Christ, but are we not decidedly lacking in the unified interpretation of his program? I sometimes wonder if we do not prefer lone spiritual joy-riding to the slower tramp of an army marching on to collective achievement.

If, for instance, the church leaders were united in dealing with public questions, is there a single problem in the average American community which could not promptly be solved? A few days ago I met at midnight on a street in Philadelphia three girls of teen age, loudly talking and laughing. I know enough of the ways of youth to be sure that those three children were heading straight to lives of dissoluteness. Within four blocks of that corner were ten vigorous, well equipped churches. Why have not those Christian societies united and placed on the streets every Saturday night enough good women to spot such wayward moving girls and save them before they fall over the awful cliff? Look at our moving picture advertisements. The Literary Digest a few weeks ago quoted the following salacious example of an exhibitor's bid for family trade:

"COVERED WITH KISSES"

"This pretty girl, so unlike his wife, her eyes lighted with love-flames, smiling wantonly, made him feel that his life had melted to a happy sigh, and all the world was his on one warm kiss."

If our Christian workers were accustomed to more collective action, a moral emergency such as this flaring poster presents could be met just as promptly as the health department met the recent threatened plague of typhus in New York City. Immediately after such a notice appeared, a committee meeting would be called of the public moral health department of the local churches. The responsible movie authority would either tear down the sign or leave town. The thrill of such moral campaigning might bring into the church more of the keen young men and women who are uninterested in our much talk and little action. In Osaka, Japan, we have worked in three vigorous fights against prostitution and know from personal experience their vitalizing effects.

2. Is there sufficient group study of tense community problems?

Reading Miss Follett's "The New State" has suggested the necessity of Christians attacking the social questions with a new method. There may still be some place for the individualist who breaks away from his group and regardless of those around him, takes a lone stand. The logical outcome, however, of such leadership is a worn out leader. Our broken former President for whose high ideals many of us have the profoundest admiration is the type of such individualistic leadership today. What we need is a method of developing a united group idea on social and international questions. At the present moment, the Y. M. C. A. is torn between a desire to stand out boldly with the Y. W. C. A. and the Federal Council of Churches, and the fear of breaking with some of our old loyal supporters who still are undetermined as to the way out of our social imbroglio. Had we developed the custom of meeting such problems in small local groups, of continuing constructive discussion until each group came to its conclusion, and had we organized the machinery for gathering representatives of these local groups and working out an idea representing the large organization, no branch of the Christian church need be halting at this moment between two opinions. The forums are an immature effort to get individual opinions expressed, but there ought to be a scientific method of reaching conclusions. Let the church read the first hundred pages of Miss Follett's book and learn how to make democracy function.

3. Should preaching be reduced in quantity as well as elevated in quality?

Many pastors preach to the same congregation two sermons on Sunday and practically another at the Wednesday prayer meeting. Many a minister's aim in his church work seems to be summed up in the notice, "Come to church three times a week and hear me preach." Harry Emerson Fosdick is, I suppose, the peer of any preacher in America today, and yet he preaches only one sermon a week, and then for less than ten months in the year. What a labor goes into these forty sermons! Can any man preach more than four new sermons a month which are really worth delivering? I sometimes wonder whether the keen business and professional men who sit meek and dumb in our churches, could not effectively substitute for the pastor on Sunday evenings, and at other functions, leaving the shepherd of the flock more time for study, investigation and prayer over each one of his public utterances. One who speaks fluently can talk any length of time on any subject, and say nothing. The prophetic message, however, must be intensely lived by the prophet before it can move the pew. This requires stretches of quiet time, and a physical and mental vitality which no human being possesses in sufficient supply to produce more than in a limited degree. Dr. Russell Conwell's "Acres of Diamonds" has been delivered 5921 times. How far would you advise friends to go to hear repeated last Sunday's sermon?

4. Has the church adapted its program to changing conditions?

My father was brought up in the suburbs of a little New Hampshire village. Into his home by the old water power saw mill came one weekly paper, which the family read from cover to cover. For excitement they had Sunday church, with the picnic lunch and a mild form of community play and social gathering before the afternoon meeting. The school spelling match, and the spring "sugar-off" were added excitement. There were no autos making available every social function within fifty miles, no moving picture shows, no daily and Sunday papers, and no magazines pouring into the home. When I arrived in San Francisco, after seven years abroad, I stood petrified with amazement before the overflowing news counter in the Market Street Ferry. The intellectual bill of fare now available in our public libraries, and flaming in varied colors on the city street corners makes America a different world from that of fifty and one hundred years ago. Still our church service programs remain nearly the same. The hymns, the prayer, the anthem and the sermon on seething Fifth Avenue almost duplicate the meeting house exercises on the peaceful village common of a century past. What changes should be made? Anything that will make the church a spiritual power house for the application of Christian principles to all forms of public and private life. The religious tragedy of America is the inability of the church to belt into human service the idle motive power of its 27,000,000 members.

5. How can religious education be improved?

The Interchurch investigations revealed the fact that we Protestants give in our Sunday schools twenty-four hours a year of religious instructions to 16,000,000 youths under twenty-five years of age. The Jews give eighty-five hours on Sundays and two hundred and fifty more on week days, a total of three hundred thirty-five hours a year of religious education. The Roman Catholic's record is two hundred hours. Is it not obvious that any church is rotting if its future supports are not being reared? The very first work, therefore, of any church should be the informing and guidance of that precious stream of children growing in the community?

6. Have we neglected personalization?

My Japanese associate when visiting this country remarked: "Association men work with charts and not with personalities." For the making of character the charting of methods must not take the place of contacts with individuals. Mr. Sajima once told me that when he goes back to Japan he is going to advise every association secretary to gather a little group of twelve disciples, following the example of our Lord. This inner circle evangelism where every Christian worker has his own class and by personal fellowship leads each member to the Master, and trains him to be an inner circle center himself is, it seems to me, the only sure way to work. Let none of us think that attendance at any number of committee meetings, service on any number of commissions, or writing of clever graphs can possibly take the place of this quiet "hound of heaven" method of following individuals until they know the Master.

7. Is our spiritual voltage adequate?

Someone has described the midweek church service as a worship "soothing into inactivity." Do we meet for prayer or for listening to a talk? Americans are "talked to death." "Special speakers" are constantly invited to press their oratory on innocent gatherings of men and women who ought to be doing all the talking themselves, and who might be working out a program of service so large and so humanly impossible that they would be driven to prayer. This would make our prayer meetings actual gatherings for generating unseen power. Workers in the church would find it impossible to carry the burdens assumed by them without attending these gatherings for fellowship in intercession.

Is prayer in or out of style? Some association secretaries I have visited were embarrassed when I proposed that we pray together. The door was locked and the curtains drawn, for fear that it might be known that in the general secretary's office such a thing was going on. In other places, however, it has seemed as natural to bow in prayer before the Father in the business office of the head of the association as to hold a committee meeting or dictate letters. This great force of prayer we Americans, who love to "put things across," whose motto is "Do it now," have inadvertently neglected. It may be that out of the east, from India, China or Japan, some warm, meditative Christian will come and teach us to follow in the footsteps of our Lord, who went out a great while before day, and even spent a whole night in prayer to God.

Let no reader think with pessimism of the American church. We must look with awe upon these big denominational funds. In the miracle of prohibition, one must recognize the church in action. A traveler may visit Wanamaker's 2300 pupil Sunday school, and attend both in Canada and in the states churches where there is standing room only. In every city one visits can be found churches that are a vital factor in the community. The above questions are raised, therefore, as the constructive suggestions of one who, because of constant living in a different atmosphere may see some sides of church life unnoticed by those immersed in her activities. The writer believes that the church will rise to her opportunity of leavening human life with the principles and spirit of Jesus, but that constant revision of method will speed her progress.

Church Union in Canada

By William E. Gilroy

THE General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in Canada, meeting in Toronto, in June, voted by an overwhelming majority, 414 for, and 107 against—about four to one—to proceed with the necessary steps for the consummation of union with the Methodist church of Canada, and the Congregational churches of Canada. As this action of the Presbyterians was taken upon a definitely proposed basis of union, already almost unanimously approved by the Methodists and Congregationalists, who had taken official action, and were waiting only for the Presbyterians to come to a decision, it would appear that these three bodies have now entered upon the closing stages of the most remarkable church union movement in modern times.

The movement has been remarkable for its extent, covering, territorially, the entire dominion, and the interests of the three bodies in foreign lands; involving the two largest Protestant denominations in the country, and representing, all told, much more than one-half of the Protestant population, and almost one-third of the total population, of Canada. It has been remarkable for the persistence with which, in a period of almost twenty years, it has gone on, in spite of some elements of determined opposition, and in spite of the inevitable delays, which often prove more disastrous to such movements than actual opposition. But more remarkable is the fact that the movement has been from the beginning a definite movement for organic union, largely taking for granted sentimental and academic considerations regarding church union in general, and resisting strongly every effort toward compromise on the basis of federation, or cooperation. And this fact is itself the more remarkable when the elements seeking such organic union are taken into account—two great bodies, historically divided, not only by temper and tradition, but by the bitter cleavage between Calvinism and Arminianism, not only seeking organic union with each other, but putting polity as well as dogma into the melting-pot in their effort to take into the union a group of churches, small, but vigorous, and almost ferociously independent. So far as I am aware, it is the first effort upon a wide scale to bring into organic union these opposite poles of Calvinism and Arminianism, connexionalism and congregationalism.

WHY ALL ARE NOT IN

The question will naturally be asked, Why has a movement so broad, and so diverse, not taken in all the Protestant elements in Canada? The fact is that as far back as 1906, when the nature of the movement was already fairly well defined, official action was taken explaining what had been done thus far, and inviting both the Baptists and the Church of England to participate in further discussions, should they deem it advisable to do so. The Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec replied to this overture by setting forth their distinctive principles, and stating that because of these principles they considered it "necessary to maintain a separate organized existence," and "to propagate their views throughout the world." The Episcopalians received the proposals cordially. There are undoubtedly many in that communion who have earnestly desired to see their church a party to the negotiations, on much the same basis as the other bodies, but the prevailing opinion has been favorable toward parleyings, approaches and academic discussions, such as we are familiar with in all negotiations with Episcopalians on this side of the line. The Presbyterians, Methodists and Congregationalists have been unwilling to halt their movement, or to sacrifice its immediacy and its definitely practical character for the sake of some less certain, and far distant, if broader, results. There has been question, also, as to whether the result would prove broader, or whether the inclusion of the Episcopalians in the negotiations would not introduce new necessities for compromise. My impression is that the invitation to the Church of England in Canada was suggested rather as a concession to the general sentiment regarding church union, than as an act of hope. In any case, the movement nears consummation, as it began—a movement involving only the three fellowships, Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational.

BACKGROUND OF THE MOVEMENT

It is interesting to note that each of the negotiating bodies has back of it a worthy history of union sentiment and accomplishment. The Presbyterian church in Canada, and the Methodist church of Canada, both represent great denominational unions and consolidations of elements once discordant, and bitterly divided. The various types of Presbyterianism, and of Methodism, in the old land, became transported and re-established in Canada in small sects, which within the broad nomenclature of Presbyterian, or Methodist, respectively, revealed almost as intense lines of cleavage as if they had been denominations springing from entirely different roots, and bearing totally different names. When we remember that in the United States a wide variety of Presbyterianisms, and of Methodisms, still obtains, we must recognize that it was no small achievement for union sentiment to have created years ago a "Presbyterian church in Canada," and a "Methodist church of Canada." The Congregationalists, of course, lacked unifying connexional incentives, but they had established among their small and scattered churches a free Union, of much strength and prestige; their ministers had been pioneers in the proclamation of the church union idea; and they had effected a small, but working, union with the United Brethren churches in Canada.

Two great causes seem to have been at work directing this spirit of union toward larger ends. On the one hand, the vastness of the field and the rapidity of the development in western Canada and northern Ontario had rendered necessary some spirit of comity and cooperation between the various home missionary societies, if overlapping and waste were to be prevented, and the needs of newer districts adequately met. And on the other hand, both in newer and older communities, the drawing together of the churches and ministers of the different denominations in the temperance movement, and in various practical activities of moral reform and evangelism, had revealed the fact that there was a community of faith, vision and purpose, that seemed to be of more moment and importance than historic, and theoretical, differences. It was felt that newer movements of thought, and newer problems, had created new alignments; that if there were variations of temper and viewpoint, these variations were fully as wide between men in the same denomination, as between men in different denominations. Denominational distinctions had lost much of any validity that they had ever possessed. Thus, while the officials of the three denominations were learning to know and esteem one another, as they were brought in contact for the solving of the problem of establishing religion in the outposts, the rank and file of ministry and laity were constantly saying, in effect, "We have come together for the practical things of service, and of warfare against evil, why should we not come together in the primary things of faith and fellowship in which this spirit of service has its motive and incentive?"

EARLY BEGINNINGS

This attitude had become so widely developed throughout the three denominations that any exact statement as to time, or place, regarding the historical origin of the movement is apt to be misleading and inadequate. For practical purposes the movement may fittingly be dated from the year 1902, when the General Conference of the Methodist church of Canada, meeting in its quadrennial session, passed an elaborate resolution dealing with the matter. In this resolution the conference declared itself "in favor of a measure of organic unity wide enough to embrace all the evangelical denominations in Canada," but, recognizing that such a comprehensive scheme was not immediately practicable, declared further, in words of such historical importance as to be transcribed in full:

This General Conference is of the opinion that the time is opportune for a definite practical movement concentrating attention on, and aiming at the practical organic unity of, those denominations already led by Providence into such close fraternal relations.

And whereas a definite proposal has been discussed to some extent in the press and elsewhere looking to ultimate organic union of the Presbyterian, Congregational and Methodist churches in Canada, this General Conference, in no spirit of exclusiveness towards others not named, declares that it would regard a movement with this object in view with great gratification, believing that the deliberate friendly discussion of the doctrinal, practical and administrative problems involved, with the purpose of reaching an agreement, would not only facilitate the finding and formulation of a basis of union, but would also educate the people interested into a deeper spirit of unity, and into that spirit of reasonable mutual concession on which the successful consummation of such movements ultimately so largely depends.

Commending the whole matter to the prayerful interest and sympathy of the Methodist church, the resolution closed with the definite appointment of a committee "to receive communications on the subject of the foregoing resolutions from the churches named, confer with committees that may be appointed by such churches, and report to the next General Conference."

Favorable action, in the appointment of similar committees, was taken in the following year by the Presbyterian General Assembly, and by the Congregational Union of Ontario and Quebec. The committees of the three bodies met in April, 1904, and unanimously adopted the following resolution:

That this joint Committee, composed of representatives of the Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches, assembled to confer together respecting an organic union of the churches named, would reverently and gratefully recognize the token of the Master's presence as evidenced by the cordial, brotherly spirit and earnest desire for divine guidance maintained throughout the entire session.

While recognizing the limitations of our authority as to any action that would commit our respective churches in regard to a proposal that is yet in the initial stage, we feel free, nevertheless, to say that we are of one mind that organic union is both desirable and practicable, and we commend the whole subject to the sympathetic and favorable consideration of the chief assemblies of the churches concerned for such further action as they may deem wise and expedient.

This finding being duly reported to the official gatherings of Presbyterians and of Congregationalists, in June and July following, both bodies appointed committees to confer definitely with the committee already appointed by the Methodists, for the purpose of discovering if a basis of organic union could be determined.

"THE JOINT COMMITTEE"

This was the origin of the celebrated "Joint Committee," which, changing somewhat from year to year in its personnel, and in spite of the tragic removal by death of some of its leading figures, continued its labors, each denominational section reporting back from time to time to the Conference, Assembly, or Union, which it represented, seeking further instructions and authority, until gradually the "Proposed Basis of Union" upon which the decision of the negotiating churches would have to be taken, was formulated.

Visitors to Toronto are familiar with the large departmental stores of the Eaton and Simpson Companies, respectively, on opposite corners of the intersection of Yonge and Queen streets. It was in the historic Knox Church, just back of the Simpson store, and since demolished to make way for the growth of that institution, that the first session of the Joint Committee was held, in December, 1904. On the suggestion of the Presbyterian Committee the Joint Committee proceeded to consider the subjects of doctrine, polity, the training of the ministry, and administration. Almost the entire day was spent in discussion, "the interchange of views being very general and exceedingly frank." As an interested observer, and listener, on that occasion, I can fully corroborate the statement of the official report that "the whole discussion was marked by the utmost freedom, but was pervaded throughout by a spirit of kindness and mutual forbearance." The denominational committees met separately in the evening to consider the advisability of appointing sub-committees to confer further on the topics that had been discussed. When the Joint Committee assembled again the next morning, there was unanimous desire to proceed along the lines proposed. An executive, or central, committee was appointed, to act for the Joint Committee in the interval between sessions, to communicate with sub-committees, and to appoint sub-committees to deal with subjects not specially assigned. The task of determining, if possible, a basis of union was then delegated to five sub-committees, with subjects assigned as follows:

1. Doctrine.
2. Polity, including organization and government, conditions, rights and duties of church membership, etc.
3. The ministry, including training, pastoral office, period of service, rights, privileges, and relation to the doctrines of the church.
4. Administration, including all missionary, benevolent, educational, publishing, and other agencies of the church.
5. Law, including titles to church property, general and local, and legislation.

Each sub-committee was formed in the proportion of two Methodists, two Presbyterians, and one Congregationalist (the Congregationalists being numerically a small group), and consisted of forty members, with the exception of the sub-committee on law, which had only fifteen.

When the Joint Committee assembled for its second session, exactly one year later, Dec. 20, 1905, this time in the Metropolitan Methodist Church, Toronto, the sub-committees gave evidence of close application to their tasks, and presented very complete proposals upon the subjects assigned. These immediately became the bases of further discussion in the sessions of the Joint Committee, in denominational gatherings, and in the religious and secular press. The Joint Committee continued to meet annually, but at the end of the fifth conference, in December, 1908, they expressed the opinion that their work was "now substantially completed." They also expressed their belief that the organic union of the negotiating bodies was practicable, recommended that the voting on the question of union should take place in the three bodies simultaneously, and voiced the hope that in the event of the tripartite union becoming accomplished, a still more comprehensive union with non-negotiating bodies might in future be realized.

Time has vindicated the belief of the Joint Committee as to the substantial completion of its labors, in 1908. Later discussion and action have only very slightly modified the 'Proposed Basis of Union,' as then defined. The hope, however, of a speedy, if not immediate, consummation of union, which then prevailed among the most optimistic exponents of union has been long deferred and sadly disappointed. It was believed by many at that time that within a period of three years, or five at the most, the union would be an accomplished fact. It speaks much for the power of the movement, and for its moral and spiritual validity, that it has persisted and gained in strength, in spite of continued delays and postponements.

THE TIME ELEMENT

In great movements toward church union the utmost of expedition is bound to be slow. In this particular movement it was necessary that the various denominational sections of the Joint Committee should report back to annual gatherings, and in the case of the Methodists to a General Conference meeting only once in four years. The Methodists were from the first almost unanimously favorable to union. So strong was the sentiment that their conference would have approved of it on almost any terms, yet in the practical negotiations some of the members of their committee wished to enforce a form of subscription to doctrinal standards to which many Congregationalists would never have submitted. The Congregational Union—the Union of Ontario and Quebec had now become the Union "of Canada"—had no power to speak for the independent churches and ministers of which it was composed. Unlike the Methodist General Conference, and the Presbyterian General Assembly, which could take action officially committing their churches and ministers, the Union had only advisory authority and the power of moral suasion. But the Congregational churches and ministers were, almost without exception, favorable to the union movement. They recognized that there was no reason why the highly connexionalized Methodist and Presbyterian bodies should not get together, and they were prepared to go in, unless the conditions were such as to involve the complete abandonment of spiritual independence. They had come to recognize that greater catholicity of fellowship and organization might not be inconsistent with the deepest convictions of those who believed in the freedom of Christian experience.

There were a few, like the writer, who viewed with some alarm the possibility of the too great standardization of all the religious life and organization of the dominion. Recognizing that the church union movement—and this specific phase of it—was right and proper, amply justified by the facts and conditions, they felt that there might still be a place, where a sense of divine call was present, for certain ministers and churches, working sympathetically, and possibly cooperatively, alongside a great denomination, but maintaining an independence and individuality conducive to special pioneer work of interpretation and service, hardly likely to be possible or so effective if completely merged in the larger group. As a matter of fact, the greatest concessions, and modifications of the proposed basis of union, were secured by the Congregationalists. This was due not entirely to the high personnel of the Congregational section of the Joint Committee, and to the clear and determined way in which they advanced their claims, but also to the fact that many Methodists and Presbyterians desired to find in the proposed united church a freer basis of fellowship and ministry. It may be said that the Congregationalists as a whole were accorded almost all the liberty they desired, but there were some few, keen idealists, who felt that the proposed basis of union still bore the taints of the old denominationalism, and fell far short of the ideal of a church spiritually free; though they recognized that it was a profound step forward for existing denominationalism, a much larger step than the most hopeful could have dared to anticipate a few years back.

PRESBYTERIAN OPPOSITION

The most vital cause of continued delay in the consummation of the union, however, has been the existence of powerful and determined elements of opposition in the Presbyterian church. The opposition from the beginning has represented a minority, both in the General Assembly, in the Presbyteries, and in the church membership at large. That is, a voting minority, for the opponents of union have laid stress upon the fact that in the plebiscite of the membership, in 1911, only 27 per cent of the total membership voted in favor of union on the proposed basis, a large percentage of the membership not voting either way. There can be little doubt that the great preponderance of popular sentiment among the Presbyterians is favorable to union, and that time has been working on the side of the pro-union forces, wearing down opposition, and winning over some who were at first doubtful, or unfavorable to union. In the recent General Assembly meeting, in Toronto, at least one of the most notable speeches in favor of union was made by a well-known minister whose attitude had been formerly unfavorable. A strong minority, however, has continued irreconcilable, waging an organized fight against union in the church at large, blocking the movement in every possible way in the church courts, and threatening appeal to the civil courts in the event of the Presbyterian church deciding to enter the proposed union—a threat to which the amazing victory of the "Wee Frees," in their appeal to the courts in Scotland, has given an unpleasant significance.

The Methodists and Congregationalists, having by popular vote, in 1911, by very large majorities approved of union on the proposed basis, and their authoritative councils having reaffirmed such approval, and expressed themselves as ready and waiting to consummate the union, the whole movement has been awaiting the decision of the Presbyterians—a decision which normally would have been taken during the period of the war. As a matter of fact the issue came up for such decision at the General Assembly, in 1917. The debate revealed the continuance of division, about one-fourth of the Assembly determinedly opposing the union, and the majority not only favoring union, but many of them doing so with intensity, and with apparent resolve that no minority should be permitted to stand in the way of progress, or overthrow a movement which they believed to be both needful for the country, and inspired of God. It appeared as if a disruption of the Presbyterian church in Canada was inevitable, when suddenly both sides yielded to the suggestion that the whole matter be postponed until two years after the close of the war, with the understanding that there should be in the interval no propaganda, or discussion of the question, on either side.

It is in accordance with that action that the issue came before the General Assembly this year. By a vote of about four to one the Assembly decided to proceed with the steps necessary for the consummation of union. The minority has not been quite as strong numerically as formerly, and my impression is that the opposition has not been quite so intense. It is, however, still strong enough, and persistent enough, to make the way toward union hazardous with dangers and difficulties. The Presbyterians will undoubtedly do everything within reason to prevent a split in their ranks, or to keep any disruption within narrow limits. But it will be much more necessary to proceed carefully in the clearing away of administrative and legal obstacles than it would be if there were no opposition. There is room for wide latitude of interpretation as to what may constitute the steps necessary for the consummation of the union. My own opinion is that it will be some years yet, at least five, and possibly ten, before the final consummation takes place.

PRACTICAL RESULTS AND BENEFITS

Meanwhile many of the fruits of the union movements are evident. There is a fine basis of working cooperation which has practically eliminated overlapping in the mission fields at home and abroad; in the older sections there has been a drawing together of churches and there have been readjustments, and in both older and newer communities union churches have been established, anticipating the ultimate goal. There has been a decided elimination of the sectarian spirit. In the typical Ontario town, where I was born and brought up, churches and ministers who formerly pursued their own lone way are now finding new paths of fellowship and helpfulness. Joint services have been held for the first time, and recently when the Methodist minister was on the point of leaving the other congregations of the town gave up their own services and joined in the farewell service at the Methodist church. In innumerable such ways the effects of the union movement are becoming apparent throughout the country.

From my own particular standpoint I should like to feel that more was being done to meet needs and situations, which the increasing standardization of religion leaves largely untouched. There is in Canada, in my judgment, a lack of a certain type of liberalism, which in this country seems to me to be displaying its usefulness and effectiveness. I am not sure to what extent this liberalism, which seems to me bound to develop, will have room and encouragement in the united church. My impression is that where there is a great movement for standardization—which a great movement for church union almost inevitably becomes under present conditions—there will be certain unstandardized elements, a sort of vanguard and a rearguard, not fully in touch with the main army. Of the rearguard there is plenty of evidence in Canada; I am not so sure about the vanguard. Let us hope that the main army there and elsewhere will allow neither rearguard nor vanguard to become too far separated from the main movement. In expressing this possible criticism, I wish to voice also my strong conviction as to the value of a main-army movement, bringing together sects and denominations that ought to be together, and that only historic division, or some spirit of narrowness, or lack of vision, keeps apart. I wish also, from close observation of the Canadian movement from the beginning, at first as a denominational editor, and for some years as a member of the Joint Committee, to bear testimony to the fine spirit in which the whole movement was conceived, and carried on.

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS

The halting of the movement through the causes which I have indicated is apt to conceal what I wish could be grasped, namely, the remarkable way in which the leaders of the three bodies came together, and the rapidity with which they determined a proposed basis of union, acceptable to the great majority in all three bodies, and very slightly modified in subsequent discussions. I attribute this largely to the spirit displayed in the meetings of the Joint Committee. It was often said that if the entire membership of the churches could have been present at the sessions of the Joint Committee the consummation of union could have been brought about very speedily. From the first there seemed little disposition to talk for talk's sake, and I think no disposition whatever to discuss issues for discussion's sake. The one clear aim of trying to find a common meeting-ground seemed ever apparent, and the basal principle of the quest of union was evidently not compromise, but the desire that there might be found some means whereby each of the negotiating bodies could contribute to The United Church of Canada its most distinctive and positive elements of faith, experience and polity. Careful examination of the Proposed Basis of Union will reveal how ably this principle has been exemplified. One finds there no evidence of a policy of scrapping everything in order to reconstruct the material. One finds rather a blending of elements critically examined and carefully selected, and an effort to create a new body out of what was best in all three. So effectually has this been done that I have never heard regarding the Basis of Union such criticism as, "It is Presbyterian," or "It is Methodist." If there is any predominance of influence in the proposals, it would appear to be Congregational, which is as much an evidence of the growing democracy of the age as of the influence of an ecclesiastical group.

VERSE

Hooks

BUT are you growing hooks? That smug, sleek look
Of you becomes your type of pulchritude;
But, grown too smooth, you jostle through the crowd
Not taking hold nor taken hold of. Hooks
Of others slip from off your rounded sides.
And leave folks only sore from being bumped.
For everybody, 'most, is feeling 'round
To find a grappling hold. They'd rather far
Be rudely dragged along than only brushed.
No painless sliding through will ease this want:
You can't make head by being smooth. This race
The swift can't win. You get there first if stripped
And lithe and free of all encumbrances,
But "getting there" is not the end; you must Arrive with cargo, loaded down with freight,
With some one or some many hanging on,—
The more the larger the reward. The prize
Goes to the cumbered, not the fleet. The hooks Retard the going of the hooker, it may be,
But speed the going of the hooked. The test
Lies there. The speed of progress is the gait
At which the slowest moves, and not the spurt
Of Hot-foot leaping free before the host.
When any has arrived all must be there.
The glory of the race and goal is that.

Free

OH, Friend of mine,
Go free! Go free of me!
Fling off that subtle art of echoing my heart,
Smoothing my way through all the livelong day.
Forget me for a while!
Be whole! Go free!
Build round thy soul a space,
Wherein thy own life's grace
May find a breathing place.
Gird thyself now for lone adventuring
Into the land of vision.
Hear thy Great Lover's voice!
Grow strong! Be free!
And then come back to me!

Lord Robert Cecil on the League of Nations

ONE of the most engaging personalities we have met over here is Lord Robert Cecil. Lady Astor, hearing of our group and its mission, invited us to meet a number of English leaders at her house. Among them were Arthur Henderson, Mr. Barnes, late labor member of the war cabinet, and Lord Robert. The latter proved himself as democratic as are those democratic leaders of England, Barnes and Henderson, or as Lady Astor who is proud of her American birth, loves to entertain Americans and is one of the best democrats in the House of Commons. "She has more moral courage in her little finger," said a bishop that evening, "than has half of the parliament." We expected to find her sedate and dignified; instead, we found her informal, witty and more like an American woman of the unconventional frontier than a lady of the realm. Lord Robert has recently taken his seat with the opposition to the coalition government, says he would welcome a labor government, condemns the Irish policy and makes the league of nations, as does General Smuts, a religious passion. We had opportunity personally to converse with him concerning the league and a few days later he met our group at the league of nations association for more formal discussion and questioning. He is scholarly in face and bearing, deliberate and careful in expression, and thinks in the big simplicities.

The League or Catastrophe

Lloyd George told the world a few days ago that enginery of destruction so terrible as to defy the imagination is now in hand. Lord Robert agrees with the premier, and reminded us that the late war brought Europe to the verge of that sort of a catastrophe. But for America's entrance into the conflict, European civilization might have been so utterly ruined as to be more like that of the ninth century than the twentieth. He also reminded us that no one far from Europe can realize the terror of the late war, nor the desolation it has left in its wake. He assured us that the old policy of force simply means another war in time—there can be no escape. As an example of its workings he refers us to the Holy Alliance and the plans laid for preserving the peace of Europe in winding up Napoleonism. Under Czar Alexander the great powers united to compel peace by the use of force. That, Lord Robert believes, is just what the military parties now desire to do, and what, he fears, too many decisions already rendered by the supreme council (of premiers) are leading to. This principle of force has long been advocated by Germany. She had, it is true, the longest unbroken peace of all European governments, but it must be borne in mind that her "kultur" theory was simply the old theory of a superior civilization imposing itself upon others for their good and that of the world. That is what the Holy Alliance sought and that is precisely the aim of those who would continue the entente allies in supreme power.

We have our choice between the old policies, tried and discredited, or the new venture in a council of all nations: it must be either a combination of the allies using force to keep the peace by their imposed will, or a council of all the nations keeping the peace by the use of judicial means to prevent wars arising. The allied combination means ultimately a combination of those nations not included; they will of course seek a place in the sun and a balance of power. Great peoples like the Germans and Russians will not accept the permanent dictation of any alliance of which they are not a part. Smaller nations, feeling themselves discriminated against or finding superior advantages with the other side, will desert to it, and war will be inevitable. The old way insures war in time; the new way at least gives a chance for peace. We must make war as impossible in settling international disputes as force is unusual in settling personal disputes.

Establishing a Council for Peace

When in the summer of 1914 war seemed imminent, Great Britain sent out an invitation for a council of peace. No nation refused but some delayed, so that the first blow was struck. Thus was illustrated the fact that voluntary courts, or an association of nations dependent upon threat of war for action, would not prevent war. There must be a continuous machinery, always ready and always at work, and with all nations granted admittance. The great need in Europe today is that Germany be admitted to the league. Until she is, there can be no assurance of unanimity or of freedom from biased councils, because of prejudice against her; to admit her is not to favor Germany but to favor peace. Russia should be in the league but Lenin's government spurns it as a creature of capitalism, and prejudice against him thus prevents other nations from recognizing the need of having the great Russian people represented in world councils. But Lenin's government need not be recognized: the league should be one of peoples; Albania, for instance, was admitted though her government was not yet recognized by any other.

The secretariat gives the league continuity. It is always open and at work; the council may be convened at any moment, and regular sessions adjourned from time to time. The secretariat will make preparation for all events, consider all causes of irritation, record all treaties and prevent secret diplomacy from involving nations in an inescapable complex, as well as promote all sorts of councils of good will through the activities of every kind of international association. Thus the international mind may be kept active. Things settled yesterday by secret diplomacy or left to work their way through irritations to a denouement in war or in a truce of ill feeling, may be continuously brought before council and assembly and a common understanding arrived at, conciliatory attitudes attained and a mutual desire to get one another's viewpoint fostered. The assembly is the great debating chamber through which problems may be brought before the public opinion of an enlightened mankind and to which appeal may be taken on behalf of peoples as against governments. It is often such public discussion rather than authoritative action that prevents war.

Insofar as conciliation has been tried, it has proved its case. The only trouble since the late war has been in a refusal to utilize the machinery of the league. The Silesian tangle is an illustration: all is irritation, with threats of force and war. In the Aland Islands case the league settled the dispute peaceably and removed a potential source of war. It could do the same in the case of Silesia.

The United States and the League

The league is an established fact: it is only a question as to whether the supreme council of premiers will allow it to function in the settlement of European problems. They are not using it as they should, and it could die, like the Hague Tribunal, of anemia. It is largely in the hands of France. Britain is coming to her senses, thanks to public opinion, and withdrawing from her policies of force in Russia and elsewhere. At the recent conference, every speaker addressing us who has had any experience in Russia, or with her, maintains that

French policy is dangerous both there and in Poland and that it is a policy not unlike that of Prussia yesterday. Tom Shaw, the labor party authority on international politics, says he knows France's wounds and the source of her bitterness, but he holds that the militarists in Paris are exploiting France's troubles to put over their militaristic policies. Lord Robert is a consistent opponent of them and an able critic of Lloyd George's action in alliance with them.

The league covenant is interwoven with the treaty; it is the only safeguard against the wickedness of the treaty. It cannot be pared out of it nor can the treaty be enforced without it. President Harding's disarmament conference is welcome; as in building a tunnel, we will bore from both ends. Disarmament must come, step by step, through limitation until a peace spirit is built up, but there can be no disarmament until there is a permanent and recognized league for peace. Lord Robert Cecil did not say it in so many words, but he left us to infer that he thinks the league will function with the United States, and that it is an established fact which cannot be scrapped for any "association" or other substitute. But he said frankly that our abstention from active participation has been a great loss. It was much more our moral than our material power that was needed. Germany will not ask admittance for fear of offending us; small nations will hesitate until they know our mind; we are the greatest peace nation in the world, dedicated in our ideals to it and to democracy, and the league needs us both for our ideals and for our arbitral advantage as one aloof from Europe's entanglements. Lord Robert would gladly eliminate article ten. It is not, he believes, a necessity, but was included in order to insure small nations by explicit word. Articles sixteen and seventeen furnish all the legal provision necessary. No nation can be forced to fight; in the first place, the decisions have to be unanimous; in the second place, any nation concerned becomes automatically a member of the council with power to prevent unanimous decision. The only possible use of force made mandatory is that of leveling the economic boycott against a nation going to war without referring the difficulty to the league, or breaking her acceptance of the league's decisions. The reliance of the covenant is moral; it depends upon publicity and established and mandatory conciliation. America, Lord Robert holds, came into the world system when she declared war: it is much more difficult to get out, once in, than to stay out before coming in, and she cannot get out now: it is a question of her being in in a responsible and active way. She can insure success.

British Table Talk

Reawakening of the Churches

London, August 16, 1921.

BY the time these lines are printed ministers will be returning from their holidays and churches planning their autumn and winter work. Multitudes of earnest Christians realize that never was there greater need than now for the religious appeal, and they are anxious to make the most of the opportunity. Not only in religious circles but among thoughtful people generally there is a deepening consciousness that in the acceptance of the Christian gospel and the application of the teaching of Jesus lies the only hope of the race. The Rev. Thomas Nightingale, who, as secretary of the National Free Church Council, travels the country, sees distinct signs of the stirring of spiritual life in the churches, and all of them are eager to make their spiritual and moral influence effective on the life of the age. Now, it is believed, is the psychological moment. The Wesleyan Methodist Pastoral says, "From many quarters there come the glad tidings that 'the Lord is reviving His work in our days.' In some industrial areas where hitherto there has been notoriously a sordid and godless setting, the people are become weary of the fleshpots. For them materialism is bankrupt. They are asking for the Bread of Life." Dr. Horton anticipates a great religious movement, not in the form of a revival but in the direction of a change in religious forms and credal statements which will make the religion that is taught fit the new ideas and wider knowledge of the time. He can see no signs of indifference to the great questions of life, of the soul, and of God, but only signs of maladjustment between the old ways and the new knowledge. "The improvement in life and habits today," he says, "is the fruit of a religious life which has not come much to the front. There is greater sobriety and greater decency; and London is almost a reformed city compared with what it was when I first came, 40 years ago. This is due to a religion which works not through churches but through education, literature, and many other spheres." In his view Sunday is neglected because people today do not find that church services and church teaching appeal to them strongly enough. "The only way of changing their habits is to make the church and its teaching so overwhelmingly real that they will choose rather to go to church than to follow their present amusements and to observe the Sabbath as a day of rest and worship on the ground of utility instead of dogma." That is what Dr. Horton is himself working for. The Rev. Silas K. Hocking also avers that the apparent indifference to religion is due to the growing passion for reality. A canon of Westminster Abbey testifies that congregations are more earnest than they used to be and have a greater sense of responsibility, and he says the free-will offerings in many places are today twice as large as they were some years ago. Canon Glazebrook, speaking at the Modern Churchmen's Conference, said that even among trade unions, which were purely materialistic, there was a new sense of human personality which could only be satisfied by Christian faith, however far the trade unionists might be from thinking so. He was convinced that while in grabbing for wages people seemed to have sold their souls, that was not the end.

Fighting The Drink Fiend

The churches, particularly Anglican and Wesleyan, are increasing their efforts to combat the drink evil. The need is great and urgent. Last year in Britain the appalling sum of 469,000,000 pounds was spent on liquor. Convictions for drunkenness in England and Wales (excluding Scotland) numbered 95,763. These are more than in the previous year, but fewer than before the war, and the figures for the first half of 1921 show an improvement. But the drink bill steadily rises from year to year. The increased cost of wines, spirits and beer is partly responsible for last year's record expenditure. The anti-drink organizations in the churches, having formed a National Temperance Council, representing fourteen denominations, have now a united programme. The main plank is local option—localities to vote for No Change, Reduction, or No License. Long-sustained pressure upon the government resulted in a round table conference whose conclusions formed the basis of the licensing act just passed. Temperance reformers agreed to accept this as an interim measure. Perpetuating some of the salutary restrictions of the Central Control Board, set up early in the war, the new act represents a substantial advance on previous legislation. The hours of opening public-houses have been reduced on week-days to nine in London and eight outside the metropolis, and on Sundays to five; they must not open before 11 a. m. and must close for two hours in the afternoon. Total Sunday closing prevails in Wales and Monmouthshire. Temperance members of parliament unsuccessfully fought the clause authorizing restaurants to serve liquor with meals up to half an hour after midnight. The chief defect of the act is that it does not embody the principle of local option, and the temperance forces will not be satisfied until this method becomes the law in England and Wales, as it already is in Scotland. If prohibition is to come it must be through local option. Britain is not yet ripe for prohibition, but more and more people, especially business men, are realizing that a drinking nation cannot successfully compete in commerce with a "dry" nation. During the Bishop of London's recent temperance tour through the country he boldly advocated the total abolition of the drink trade. Led by the new president, Rev. J. A. Sharp, Wesleyan Methodists have organized a five-years' temperance campaign, with a three-fold appeal; to the churches to throw themselves into the fray against the trade, to temperance workers to educate young and old, and to citizens to demand the power to control the traffic—that is, local option. The drink fiend must be killed or manacled, or the nation will be strangled.

A Puzzling Case

On a hot July evening some three thousand people crowded Queen's Hall and after listening to an hour's address from ex-Archdeacon Wakeford unanimously and enthusiastically passed a resolution demanding a re-opening of his case. Convicted by the consistory court of immoral conduct with an unknown woman on two occasions at a hotel in Peterborough, he appealed to the privy council, who upheld the judgment of the lower court and deprived him of all his offices and emoluments. Since this sentence was promulgated Mr. Wakeford has held in various parts of the country a series of meetings which culminated in the Queen's Hall demonstration. Rarely is the public mind so much exercised as it is over this case. A number of highly respected clergymen believe that Mr. Wakeford is innocent, and several, together with his wife of twenty-eight years, and daughter, supported him on the platform at Queen's Hall. The case presents some puzzling features. Aged 63, Mr. Wakeford, to quote from the Lord Chancellor's judgment, "enjoyed for many years before he went to Lincoln, and continued to enjoy to this day, a considerable reputation for spiritual gifts, and a high character. He is a man of power and eloquence; he has been widely sought throughout the country as a preacher and has received the confidence of those with whom he has been associated in the work of the church." He has published several volumes of sermons. He was Canon and Precentor of Lincoln Cathedral, as well as Archdeacon of Stow. It seems incredible that in daylight, under the circumstances alleged, he should put up at a hotel in a neighborhood where he was known. The case for the prosecution was considerably weakened by evidence that was proved to be false. But most impartial critics would say that the judges had no alternative to giving the verdict they did on the evidence that was unshaken. For the defence it was contended that the charges were entirely false, and were instigated by two clerical enemies, one a brother-in-law. On the other hand, conspiracy, which would be essential to the success of such an undertaking, was not proved. Not a few people would find it easier to believe that Mr. Wakeford had committed the offence with which he was charged than that a man with his record would, if guilty, instead of retiring into obscurity, add to his wrongdoing by going about the country publicly protesting his innocence. The fact that "John Bull" espoused the ex-archdeacon's cause was, by some people, put in the scale against him, but of course Mr. Bottomley's championship in no way affects the essentials of the case. Many persons would feel easier in their minds if they could be assured that injustice has not been done to an innocent man. The "Times" evidently felt that the case was not free from doubt, for it took the unusual course of printing a verbatim report of the privy council judgment, extending to eleven columns, and remarked editorially, "Many will approach a consideration of the evidence with the question in their minds whether a jury would have been entitled to find a verdict of guilty on such testimony in a capital charge." One result of the case is that a public appeal has been made for 4,000 pounds to meet the Bishop of Lincoln's costs of prosecution.

Personal and General

Of the "Revolutionary Flags in Thaxted Church" Rev. Conrad Noel says: "The red flag stands for revolution, by which we mean a root-and-branch change in the spirit and outlook of the nation, and a consequent new order, both industrial and political, to be achieved without bloodshed, if the rich will permit us, as against mere reformist ameliorations within the system. The Sinn Fein flag stands incidentally for the oppressed people of Ireland and for our responsibility towards them."—Dr. Clifford, who is taking active part in directing the evangelistic campaign he suggested, has humorously explained to a friend that he has not "suddenly turned religious," but is merely urging the churches generally to do what he has always impressed as their duty upon his own people. He deprecates the tendency to leave all spiritual work to ministers, and seeks to encourage young people especially to offer themselves for Christian service.—Rev. Alexander Nairne, D. D., Canon Residentiary of Chester Cathedral since 1914, has been appointed to the canonry of the Chapel Royal Windsor.—Rev. Peter Fleming, formerly of Edinburgh and for the last fourteen years minister of the leading Baptist church in Adelaide, Australia, is preaching in the City Temple during the vacation.—Rev. A. E. Harris, D. D., Bethlehem Baptist Church, Philadelphia, formerly assistant to Dr. Russell Conwell, at the Temple Church in that city, is preaching in various Baptist churches in England and Wales.—Lord Langford, an Irish peer, left 11,500 pounds for helping the poor and needy clergy of the Irish Church.—In his 84th year, Dr. Monro Gibson, who, after laboring in Canada, was for many years minister of St. John's Wood Presbyterian Church, is critically ill.—Principal Forsyth is suffering from a wearying illness and gradually gets weaker.—Rev. T. Jackson Wray, of Saskatchewan, is preaching at Whitefield's, where his father was for many years minister.—Holiday preachers at Westbourne Park Chapel include Dr. Sherwood Eddy, Dr. W. A. Chapple, and Dr. Rolvix Harland.—Rev. John Hornabrook, superintendent of the Manchester district, has completed fifty years in the Wesleyan Methodist ministry.—The Bishop of Salisbury, who died last May, left 16,000 pounds.—Thousands of people of various denominations took part on August 1 in a pilgrimage to what is known as the "Rock of Ages" at Burrington Combe, eight miles from Weston-super-Mare, under which, while sheltering from a thunderstorm, Top-lady wrote his famous hymn.

"The Grand Strategy of Evolution"

IT has become almost fashionable for biologists to deal with sociological and religious questions from the standpoints of the various sciences. Even many political and sociological writers have gone to biology for the bases of their ideas and arguments. Most of these have been greatly impressed by the struggle for existence, and the principle of "survival of the fittest," and have built upon them far-reaching conclusions.

But Dr. Patten, of Dartmouth College, believes that there is a biological principle more vital than that of survival—the principle of union, organization, and subordination of the part to the whole. He traces the ancestry of man back to the scorpion-like Eutyterids, and shows that the farther back one goes, the simpler the body organization is found to be. The body was divided into distinct segments or sections, the nervous system was primitive and relatively uncentered, and much of the "brain work" was done outside the head. But the many-sectioned body gave way to one that was united closely, part with part, and preserving only the slightest traces of metamerism. The primitive nervous system became a highly complex one, with a brain centered in the head. The many legs gave way to four appendages, divided into two pairs, and adapted for different work. The whole body became more compact, more coordinated, and immensely more efficient.

But the progress of evolution did not stop with cells and organs; it embraced the activities and values of whole individuals, species, and even orders. Some animals, such as the bees and ants, built up elaborate colonies. Others associated in herds of flocks for mutual offence or defence. Still others, often distinct species, have associated in direct bodily contact, to the advantage of both. From all this Dr. Patten draws what seems to him a very clear lesson for humanity. Men should stop thinking of themselves; they should think of mankind. Strife and rivalry, between man and man, between nation and nation, and between race and race, should be abolished. Man should subserve his own wishes and desires to the good of the world, and be willing to accept the dictates of others as to the place he should occupy and the work he should do. Then, and only then, says Dr. Patten, will humanity be on the "highroad of evolution."

We shall not deal with any argument against Dr. Patten's ideas as to the origin of the vertebrates. Most zoologists and paleontologists think little of his Eurypterid theory, and prefer the segmented worms as ancestors for the backboned animals. But that does not seriously affect the "social philosophy" of the book in question. The principal difficulty is that Dr. Patten seems to have considered only part of the evidence of natural history. His book gives the impression that he has considered those facts which argue for his theory, and has given no great weight to those that oppose it.

Again, we do not quarrel with the conclusions which Dr. Patten has reached; we merely question the firmness of their biological foundations. To compare a man with a ciliated cell in his alimentary tract is not a safe proceeding. To liken human society to an organization of animal cells is going rather far. Progress is natural, for progress is; organization is natural, for organization is. But there is also progress backward, in nature as well as in civilization, and those who do not admit the idea of teleology maintain that progress downward is as natural as progress upward. Moreover, the commonly observable facts of parasitism argue against the essential biological truth of self-effacement and perfect altruism. It is hard to see what good a flea is to a dog, or a malaria parasite to man. Of course, no successful parasite can destroy the race of its host—and yet it is not plain how the destruction of thousands of Cecropia caterpillars by the Ichneumon fly is of great benefit to the Cecropia. And, although the cells achieve perfect accord (unless they fail to do so, as it quite common), and bees live in colonies, many animals war upon others of their own race, and cannibalism is hardly unnatural.

And so, since biology as well as the Bible can be made to prove two sides of some arguments, its evidence may be of very questionable value. We grant that man should think less of men and more of mankind. We admit that the hope of humanity lies in the cultivation of altruism, but we doubt if the essential truth of these beliefs can be either proved or disproved by zoologists, paleontologists, or botanists. Natural science may be a great background for the study of humanity, but a remarkable knowledge of morphology of animals does not guarantee success as a sociologist. Sociology is not the realm of the zoologist, just as genetics is not the realm of the poet. And sociological or political doctrines on animal morphology bases seem to demand firmer support. "Onward, Christian Soldiers"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The admirable editorial note in your last issue, August 18, on Prof. H. Augustine Smith awakens echoes of approval in at least one parson's mind. Especially excellent is his selection of "ten choice Christian hymns." But may not fair exceptions be taken to one of those named, namely, "Onward Christian Soldiers?" Many eyebrows may be raised at this protest as if a scandal or heresy is in the wind. But never, never would I announce this hymn in public, unless to a "closed-shop" church or congregation. And why? (1) Since learning that the author of Onward Christian Soldiers was an extreme high, exclusive churchman of the English established church, the ring and sense in these verses has been false and out of tune to my mind and conscience. (2) The sentiment of this hymn is too blatant, boisterous, boastful and many other bad h's to serve as a truly Christian song among worshippers of the Prince of Peace. No wonder that the late government of the Sublime Porte expurgated it from hymnals to be used in Turkey. (3) There are too many unconscious "lies" and straight out errors in its lines to make it suitable for a child of the church to learn and sing. Here are a few of its verses. Do not they run like Prussianized religion? "Marching as to war, With the cross of Jesus going on before." "Christ, the royal Master, leads against the foe." How untrue to the religious facts in the case! Again: "But the church of Christ constant will remain." Not at all, not at all, except "constant" signifies loyal and steadfast; but too many church people suppose that "constant" means "static," always the same in its ideals and works, at a standstill forever. Once more, What a contrary-to-fact statement this: "We are not divided, all one body we, one in hope in doctrine, one in charity." If one could get grown-ups to think this and make it real and true (a consummation devoutly to be wished), then let the hymn be taught to children; but so long as the very opposite is the fact, how can it be right to instill in a child's repertory of "ten" one that has in it so many things not true, however desirable some of them may be, if true. (4) The ordinary tune going with the stanzas is doubtless catchy at first, a march-time to be used in a processional, but oft repeated, worn to tatters, its tedious refrain gets on the nerves. Too often, as I have frequently observed and suffered, the singing drags and is heavy. Why not let "Onward Christian Soldiers" rest till more Christians catch up with its stride and can truly mean and live what is sung as if now true to fact?

Religion in State Universities

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I wish to express my appreciation of Mr. Blakeman's article on state universities. It has become a habit of some preachers to damn them with faint praise, and in some cases to damn them without any praise at all. Those who believe that the Christian religion will rise or fall with the theology of William Jennings Bryan and the Sunday School Times would probably not be greatly cheered by a closer acquaintance with these institutions, and those who think religion cannot survive without careful ecclesiastical protection will never have any great confidence in institutions whose professors are immune to persecution by the church. Those whose faith is strong enough to believe that Christian truth can take care of itself in an atmosphere of intellectual liberty will see in state universities a means of Christian progress.

There was a time when James Shannon was president of the University of Missouri and pastor of the Christian church in Columbia. Both institutions have grown some since then, and the leadership of either is a large job for one man, but there is no opposition to a man's being active in the university and the church. The present head of our university is an elder in the Presbyterian church. Eight or nine deans are active in church work. Members of the faculty will perhaps average a little better than other laymen in church attendance. Scientists and scholars are much like other people on Sunday morning. But in one way or another much religious teaching is done by the faculty of the university. I doubt if this university is an exception. State institutions are probably quite as religious as the church colleges which oppose them, and come to them for teachers.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Avoiding Offence*

WE should be very careful not to put a stumbling block in a brother's way; also brethren should be careful not to be stumbling over everything! Surely no Christian desires to injure anyone, but there are a lot of peculiar people outside asylums who would curtail the fun to the minimum. I know one good (?) sister who held up her hands in holy horror when she found a few preachers playing crokinole at a district convention! The best thing that could happen to an old foggy like that was to be shocked. One has to steer a reasonable course between the Scylla of injuring weak people and the Charybdis of the super-conscientious. A strong man delights in holding up and helping the weaker persons, but a strong man cannot permit his life to be bound in shallows by superficial ignoramuses or pious idiots.

Paul's idea that the strong ought to bear the burdens of the weak is right. Strength is for weakness, intelligence is for ignorance, light is for darkness, health is for sickness, cheerfulness is for gloom, hope is for despair, love is for hate, generosity is for stinginess, chastity is for impurity, mental brilliance is for mental dullness, sociability is for wall-flowers, the swift are for the slow and Christ is for sinners. Kant tells us that a man's measure is his lifting power. How many can you uplift? How many look to you for light and leading? How many dependants have you? A man with ten children, other things being equal, is a greater man than a bachelor, for the latter only manages to keep himself, while the father of ten supports twelve persons. An inspiring Sunday school teacher upholds the whole class. You know some thrilling examples of this truth. A great pastor is a tower of strength not only to his whole congregation but to scores outside his own church and parish. A great business man gives his time and money to many institutions, he touches and helps hundreds of people. Goucher of Baltimore, many years ago, founded the famous Goucher schools in India which have turned out literally hundreds of native leaders. Who can measure the power of such a man? Osgood, over in Chu Chow, carries that whole city upon his giant's back. He leads the leaders. In war, epidemic or trouble they turn to him as though he were a god. The temples are used for tennis courts but Osgood sits upon a throne. A college president lifts his entire college. Every young man or woman in the institution is fired by his mentality and by his personal spirit. Do you want to know your size? Go not to your tailor, but to your dependants. You may wear a large hat but possess a very small heart. You may have a large bank account but a shriveled soul. You may own broad acres but be microscopic yourself. If you are strong you are supporting the weak and helping them with their burdens. But just because you are strong you do not have to be limited and cloistered by the whims and caprices of your mental inferiors. If some dear old lady thinks you ought not to play checkers or if some excuse of a man objects to your jolly church parties, ignore their prattle; you cannot sail an ocean liner in a tea cup! Most churches are injured by some of these narrow, ignorant, irritable persons, who make life miserable for any wholesome, human red-blooded man or woman. Pass them up hard and fast, drive them into some other fold, make it so hot for them that they get out. It is a happy day for any church when one of these nuisances abdicates!

There is no consolation for a sinner in what I am saying and someone else is always involved in any sin. There is no sin that can be limited in its effects to yourself. The strong man marks out for himself a straight, true, righteous course, then with fine control and generous help he moves forward. He has abundant sympathy, his time is freely given, his money follows his sympathies. Because he is strong many people depend upon him and he disappoints none of them. We know scores of men and women of this type. Move up into that company; join the people with power. But remember power is for the purpose of helping the other man.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Sunday School Leader Starts on World Tour

W. C. Pearce, associate general secretary of the World Sunday School Association, will start very soon on a trip around the world. A special fund has been organized to provide this trip, and he will visit great leaders in various countries of the world in behalf of Sunday school work. Before his departure a special prayermeeting was held in the offices of the association for the success of the enterprise which was led by Hon. John Wanamaker. Mr. Pearce asserts that the surest and sanest way to heal the hurts of the world is to bring up a generation of children in the teachings of the holy scriptures.

Women Preachers Will Hold Meeting in Chicago

The International Association of Women Preachers will meet in the Jackson Boulevard Christian church of Chicago, September 13-16. This organization is evangelical and interdenominational. Mrs. Austin Hunter, who was recently ordained by the Jackson Boulevard church, is hostess to the meeting. The president is Miss Madeline Southard of Winfield, Kans., and the general secretary is Mrs. Sarah K. Meredith of Canton, Ohio. Miss Southard will speak on the theme "Woman's Share in the Great Adventure."

Presbyterian Story Better After Revision

Revision of the first statistics given out by the Presbyterian church for the work of the past year makes the story better than at first reported at the General Assembly in May. The net gain in membership in the church was 85,000. It was discovered that an error of nearly thirty thousand members had been made in the accounting for the synod of New York alone. The present membership of this denomination with a northern constituency is 1,722,361.

Bryan's Address in Pictures

William Jennings Bryan has an address which he has enjoyed giving in different sections of the country called "Back to God." This address is now printed, and is illustrated by finely colored stereopticon pictures which are put out by the Animatograph company of Davenport. Among the pictures used to illustrate the address are a number of reproductions of the famous paintings. The Commoner continues to lecture the young people on the subject of Darwinism, asserting that the supreme sin of our age is mind worship.

Cooperation in Santo Domingo

A most interesting and significant piece of Christian cooperation is under way in the Dominican republic. Five boards have formed a joint committee and have pooled the sum of eighty thousand dollars as a beginning in the name of their common evangelical Christianity.

They have purchased a commanding piece of property for fifty thousand dollars in the capital city. Missionaries will be commissioned jointly and their work administered jointly. The first boards are the two home mission boards (men's and women's) of the Presbyterian church in the U. S. A., the two home mission boards (men's and women's) of the Methodist Episcopal church and the Foreign Mission Board of the United Brethren. The Free Methodists have a work in the northern part of the republic, which is not yet in affiliation, but should be.

Kansas City Will Have Week-Day Religious Education

Week-day religious education for the children of the public schools will be provided in the Linwood Boulevard district of Kansas City this coming year. Four churches are combining in the support of this project. Following this there has come a demand in other sections of Kansas City for this instruction and it is likely that a number of the school neighborhoods will be organized in this way. Meanwhile in many other cities plans are going forward, and it is probable that more children will receive religious education in connection with the public schools this year than in any previous year.

Kansas City Minister and World Traveler Resigns

Rev. E. E. Violette, pastor of Central Church of the Disciples, Kansas City, has recently offered his resignation. Mr. Violette was at one time a very successful evangelist and he has had the privilege of extended travel throughout the world, conducting a number of parties at different times. His resignation at this time is occasioned by the severe illness of Mrs. Violette, who must seek another climate. He has been held in great esteem by the church. His predecessor in the work was Rev. L. J. Marshall, who is now minister of the Disciples church in Carthage, Mo.

Ministers of the Country Preaching Disarmament

No topic appears so frequently in the sermon announcements of the daily papers these days as does the interest of world peace. Press reports give no indication that there is a minister in the country opposed to a disarmament program. Recently Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones preached on world peace and presented a very impressive group of statistics by Hudson Maxim as to what the nation might do with the savings of a five year program of disarmament. These figures are as follows: "First year: build 25,000 miles of concrete road 20 feet wide, reaching from ocean to ocean, and from the Gulf of Mexico to the Great Lakes. Second year: build the proposed inter-coastal ship and barge canal from Boston to Florida. Deepen, dredge and straighten the Mississippi river to St. Louis and the Missouri river to Kansas City, so as to admit ocean liners to the centers of the west. Third year: construct a great electrical super power system connecting the bituminous coal fields of Virginia with the anthracite field of Pennsylvania, utilizing the water power of Niagara and thus supply unlimited electrical power to the most thickly populated area in America. Fourth year: build the deep waterway connecting the Atlantic with the Great Lakes and make Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit and Chicago seaport cities with ocean steamers communicating with all world ports. Fifth year: redeem 6,000,000 acres of arid lands in the far west, and by means of irrigation systems open 150,000 farms to the people—farms capable of sustaining a population of a million and a half.

Presbyterian Ministers Make Movie Men Be Good

Rev. William Jobush is the young and energetic pastor of a Presbyterian church in Cokeville, Wyo. He divides the field with the Mormons, who are neck and neck with the Presbyterians in numbers. His church is a community church, as may be judged by the fact that in unessential matters he yields to the religious convictions of others, and recently immersed nine converts. The moving picture show of the town decided to open on Sunday with special feature films. The minister replied by saying that if the show house was open seven days a week the church would be also. Recreation every evening hurt the movie business so much that the manager of the latter asked for a truce. There is now co-operation between the church and the theater, but no Sunday shows. The show house is now sometimes donated to the church for special purposes.

Roman Catholic Utterance on Industrial Question

Diverse as the testimony of the Catholics and Protestants may be on doctrinal questions, there is a remarkable unanimity among the leaders of the two great groups of Christians upon the industrial question. This may well be seen in a recent utterance of Cardinal O'Connell in his book called "Church and Labor." He says: "The social problem of the relations between employer and workers must be solved on a Christian basis, or not at all. They must face each other in the proper frame of mind springing from a Christian spirit, before even an initial step toward permanent betterment can be effected. Employers and workers must regard each other as brothers in the same great brotherhood of Christ. The church by her teaching inculcates the only sure method of social regeneration. She would purify the hearts of men of selfishness, greed, envy and hatred, which stand in the way of a better understanding. She abolished slavery, in spite of opposition coming from human interests, and made men socially free. She protected and fostered the workingmen's guilds of the middle ages, using every means in her power to keep the workers under the gracious and mellowing influence of religion. She alone can be regenerator of the social commonwealth in the conditions which confront us today."

Unitarians Will Hold General Conference at Detroit

The Unitarians will hold their next General Conference at Detroit on October 4. The program for the meeting is already nearing completion. On Tuesday the session will consider the more effective organization of the churches.

Disciples Meet at Winona Lake

THE General Convention of Disciples of Christ closed last Sunday night, September 4, at Winona Lake, Ind., after sessions covering the previous six days. Accustomed to meet in mid-autumn and in metropolitan centers, there was much speculation this year as to the effect of taking the convention to a countryside place while the summer heat was still at its height. The enrollment, however, proved to be almost as large as usual—over 3,000 persons being registered. Besides this number there were hundreds who came by automobile for a day at a time, many of whom did not register. The general feeling among the delegates as to the practicability of holding so large a convention under the restricted conditions obtaining at Winona is somewhat divided. There were special advantages, such as easy access to the auditorium, convenience in meeting one's friends and the absence of diverting interests. The hospitality provided was hearty. The auditorium, a structure seating 7,000 people, built on the well-known lines of a Billy Sunday tabernacle, made an ideal place for holding the sessions of the convention. The acoustics of the building were perfect. The sawdust floor and the stationary seats precluded the noises which generally mar large assemblies compelled to remain in session for several hours at a time. On two or three occasions the falling rain interrupted the speaking, as no voice could be heard above the patter on the roof, but the good-natured gathering sang "Showers of Blessing" until the rain passed by. The week proved to be one of the hottest of the summer, following an otherwise comfortably cool August. The temperature lent a particular appropriateness to the environment of lake and shade and hillside. Among the resolutions presented was one fixing a permanent place of meeting for the convention, prepared no doubt to test the sentiment of the assembly on the matter of meeting permanently at Winona. The sentiment was unfavorable to such an arrangement, and the committee on time and place of the next meeting is now receiving and considering invitations to several large cities.

NEW SOCIETY MAKES GOOD

The feature of greatest interest in the convention was the report of the United Christian Missionary Society. The Disciples of Christ are distinguished among all denominations by the fact that they recently merged all their boards of for-

The discussion will be led by Rev. H. E. B. Speight of Berkeley, Cal., recently called to King's Chapel, Boston, as the associate of Rev. Howard N. Brown. Other speakers on the topic will be Rev. Harry F. Burns of Baltimore and Rev. Robert Loring of Milwaukee. An interesting feature of the meeting is that it will be presided over by Chief Justice William Howard Taft. Dean William W. Fenn of Harvard will deliver one of the convention sermons. The conference will go to the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor for one of its sessions.

eign missions, home missions—including the great woman's organization—church erection, benevolences, and ministerial relief into one organization. This merger was set on its feet only a year ago. This, therefore, was the first opportunity given the denomination to test out the results of the unification of its missionary and benevolent projects. The results more than justified the wisdom of the merger. On account of a change in the fiscal year which now comes to an end on June 30, the reports at this time were for nine months only, but they showed that larger sums of money than ever before have flowed into the missionary and benevolent treasuries. The receipts for the nine months were $2,030,186.59. This amount was disbursed to the main interests as follows: foreign missions $823,286.47, home missions $295,600.94, ministerial relief $49,443.75, and benevolent work at home $218,006.86. This is by all odds the largest annual amount received and expended for these causes in the history of the denomination. A budget of $3,000,000 was adopted for the coming year. The above figures are the more remarkable when it is considered that the totals do not include an amount approximating $600,000 which was raised by special appeal for payment of the Disciples underwritings in connection with the late Interchurch World Movement.

Dr. Frederick W. Burnham was re-elected president of the United Christian Missionary Society and the list of vice presidents and secretaries of this great organization was also re-elected. While the convention was sitting a group of more than fifty missionaries sailed from San Francisco for various mission fields. To them the convention sent greetings and for them prayers were repeatedly offered. A far larger number of missionaries has been sent out this year than ever before.

PARAGUAY'S CALL

Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, vice president of the United Society and head of the woman's department, had but recently returned from a trip to Paraguay, in South America, whose field has been assigned to the Disciples for missionary endeavor. Mrs. Atwater, a speaker of extraordinary power, brought a message interpreting the whole Latin-American mission field, dwelling, naturally however, upon Paraguay in particular. Mr. and Mrs. C. Manley Morton, missionaries to Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay, were at the convention. They were home on furlough from their first term of service and brought luminous messages of the need and opportunity afforded by this South American republic for Christian service. Both Mrs. Atwater and the returned missionaries described the needs of Paraguay in terms primarily of Christian education. In all Paraguay, it was said, there is not a single kindergarten, and the society is looking out for workers who will introduce the kindergarten into the schools of that republic. It was announced that the missionaries would have hearty and practical cooperation in this educational work by the governmental department of education in the republic itself. All the great missionary fields of the world were represented by returned missionaries and native Christians who were in this country.

Over all the foreign missionary sessions of the convention there hung a certain pathos due to the absence of Rev. Archibald McLean, whose death occurred during the year. Mr. McLean had been for years not only the official president of the Foreign Missionary Society—now the foreign missionary department of the United Christian Missionary Society—but had become the symbol of the missionary ideal and passion among the Disciples of Christ, having been for nearly forty years the most outstanding interpreter to his communion of the church's missionary duty. He was always easily the most significant and electric and beloved personality in any gathering of Disciples of Christ. To many hearts the fact that A. McLean was no longer to lead the foreign missionary sessions of the general convention made the convention seem, in anticipation, like a strange place. But the strangeness was in anticipation only. For the spirit of the great leader was present and the distinctive functions always in the past discharged by him were discharged with singular power and graciousness by Mrs. Atwater, Dr. Stephen J. Corey and their colleagues in the foreign mission department.

HOME MISSION DEVELOPMENT

All the aspects of home missions received due attention. Particular interest was taken in the work among orientals on the Pacific coast and that among Mexican residents in this country. The work among the Yakima Indians proved also to be one of deep interest. The home mission task is coming to be conceived increasingly as a task in education, both by those who are working at it and those who are administering it. The various benevolences supported by the Disciples, such as homes for the aged and homes for orphan children, though growing in numbers and capacity, are yet turning away more people every year than they are able to accommodate. Six orphanages in as many cities in the country now care for over 400 children, and 125 aged people are cared for by their brethren of this communion. The church extension department, of which Rev. George W. Muckley is chief administrator, is now handling a permanent fund amounting to nearly $2,000,000. This sum is used to assist congregations to build houses of worship. The policy of this department is steadily widening to include aid in building edifices for educational work under the home missionary department among immigrant populations in the great cities.

Not quite all the organizations of the Disciples were included in the forming of the United Christian Missionary Society. Notable exceptions are the Board of Education, of which Dr. H. O. Pritchard is secretary; the Board of Temperance and Social Welfare, of which Prof. Alva W. Taylor and Rev. Milo J. Smith are secretaries, and the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, headed by Dr. Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, Md. For his board, Dr. Pritchard brought to the convention some interesting statistics with regard to the educational situation among the Disciples. In eighty-eight universities not in the control of the church, 7,786 Disciples students are enrolled, or about 5 per cent of the total university constituency. In the twenty-seven Disciples institutions cooperating with the Board of Education, there are 9,561 students of all faiths—again this year of 362. Among these there are 993 students who have expressed the purpose of entering the Christian ministry or some other form of professional Christian service. Most of these, however, are in the under-graduate courses, and the figures represent a decrease over the preceding year of thirty-eight.

THE SOCIAL NOTE

Prof. A. W. Taylor brought to the convention one of its greatest messages. He came fresh from a two months' visit to the British Isles, Belgium, and France, arriving at the convention direct from the boat only a few hours before he was to speak. His description of the industrial and economic situation in England and Germany was most impressive. With prophetic ardor and insight professor Taylor set forth the unescapable duty of the church in this day to move out into the broad field of social need, carrying its gospel of reconciliation, a gospel which he insisted must be applied to our industrial and other social problems as well as to individual life. He succeeded in raising in the thought of the convention the whole problem of the church's duty in respect to social welfare as it had never been raised before. His message was a prime factor in bringing about the adoption of a more unequivocal resolution looking toward the social action of the church than had ever been adopted by the General Convention. Again and again the social note was struck in this gathering. It was apparent that the public mind of the Disciples of Christ is opening up toward the social problem with increasing insight and conviction. The same note was struck in the closing session of the convention on Sunday night by the editor of The Christian Century, who spoke on the subject of "Christian Unity and World Peace." His thesis was the paradox that the church cannot hope effectively to represent the mind of Christ in our social and international situations until it becomes a united church—the one body of Christ, and, on the other hand, that the pathway to unity lay through the field of social service and international friendship. Dr. Ainslie and his colleague, Rev. H. C. Armstrong, reported that the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity has received nearly $10,000 from the churches during the past year, a slightly larger sum than in any previous year. Dr. Ainslie has been granted a year's absence from his church in Baltimore, which season he will spend conducting conferences and "protracted meetings" in various sections of the country, stressing particularly the spiritual life and Christian unity.

A REPRESENTATIVE BODY

All recognized agencies of the Disciples of Christ, whether represented in the United Christian Missionary Society or not, report to the General Convention. The authority of the convention itself has received much increment this year. Whatever tendency once obtained in certain quarters to decline recognition of this recently organized General Convention has disappeared. The convention is a mass meeting which any Disciple may attend and in which he may vote. However, all motions arising in the convention must be referred to the recommendations committee, a large representative body of over a hundred men and women elected by the conventions of the various states and provinces of North America. This committee deliberates on all convention resolutions, and is the real legislative body of the denomination, albeit subject to the approving vote of the convention itself.

Rev. George A. Miller of Washington, D. C., was this year's president of the convention. His grasp of the principles of parliamentary procedure, his insistence that no offensive personalities should find expression, and his inexhaustible fund of humor contributed greatly to make the Winona convention a gratifying exception to the stormy assemblies of recent years. He has helped his communion to see that they can never hope to call themselves a democratic people until they utilize the parliamentary technique by which alone a democracy may express its will. Mr. Miller was not so fortunate in his presidential address as in his parliamentary leadership. While the address could not be called reactionary in any sense, it seemed to lack the power and quality that kindles imagination and courage. It sounded no great note on world peace or industrial justice or Christian unity, such as the rank and file expects of its moral leadership today. However, it had no backward effect.

OPEN FORUM

It was manifest that the convention had acted wisely in setting up a forum of doctrinal discussion. Though the constitution shuts out legislation on doctrinal matters, there is hardly any group of Christians in America so keen in their interest in fundamental religious issues as the Disciples. In the past few years a conservative group operated a "doctrinal congress" in connection with the convention, at which only one type of opinion was allowed expression. This procedure was discouraged last year by resolution. In its place an entire day was set apart, in the midst of the convention itself, for the free discussion of any subject believed to be of interest. No more interesting sessions were held throughout the week. Whether the church is a static institution, conforming in essential structure to the model of the early church, was debated by Rev. P. H. Welshimer of Canton, Ohio, Rev. O. F. Jordan of Chicago, Rev. J. B. Briney of Kentucky and others. The reception of unimmersed Christians into Disciples churches was discussed by Prof. E. S. Ames of Chicago, Rev. John Ray Ewers of Pittsburgh, Rev. John T. Brown of Kentucky, Rev. Graham Frank and others. It was made manifest that many churches of the Disciples of Christ in various sections of the country are now receiving members of other communions by letter without re-baptism, though continuing the exclusive practice of immersion in baptizing new converts. This practice has sometimes been called "open membership," though its advocates reject this nomenclature and speak of it simply as "practising Christian union." The venerable Mr. Briney, speaking for the conservative side, said that this issue was the most serious internal issue the denomination is facing today. In the election of officers, Rev. S. E. Fisher of Champaign, Ill., was made the president of the General Convention of Disciples of Christ for the ensuing year. The vice presidents elected were Rev. J. T. T. Hundley of Lynchburg, Va., Mr. A. S. Caldwell of Chattanooga and Mrs. O. H. Griest of Indiana. Rev. Graham Frank of Dallas, Texas, continues as secretary and Mr. Orville Thorpe of Dallas, Texas, as treasurer. Mrs. Ellie K. Payne is recording secretary.

PRAYER AND SONG

The music and the spiritual life of the convention develops with the years. The hymns are less and less of the well-known evangelistic swing and more and more the staple hymns of the deeper religious experience. The few lapses from the higher standards of taste and worship which the convention is steadily approaching are more conspicuous than previously by virtue of their new setting. It is doubtful that the rather commonplace singing of ill-selected songs by certain of the male quartettes which luxuriate in the well-known "barber-shop chord" is particularly edifying.

Every morning a seven o'clock prayer meeting was held in the Westminster hotel (later removed to the auditorium for larger space) and every evening an outdoor vesper service was held on the hillside. The Sunday communion service was conducted in good taste, with probably 7,000 people present. Many people go to the General Convention for spiritual uplift. Sometimes the unhappy temper of the discussions has broken up the spiritual currents of the convention life. This year no one who came hungry and thirsty for the things of the spirit went empty away.

Probably no single event in the convention was of greater interest than the

Will Hold Preachers' Institute at Columbia

The University of Missouri has for a number of years had a Farmers' week and a Journalists' week in which these callings were stressed as significant life opportunities for young people. An innovation in the university program this week will be the Interdenominational Preachers' Institute. Preachers from all over the state will come in to hear lectures on significant topics, and to learn how to cooperate with the university in carrying its benefits to the people. It is hoped that the week may also result in a number of young men choosing the ministry as their life work. The promotion of the Interdenominational Preachers' Institute is in the hands of Dean G. D. Edwards, of the Missouri College of the Bible.

Young Disciples' College Secures a New Leader

Southeastern Christian College, located at Auburn, Ga., is one of the youngest of the Disciples' educational institutions. Recently Pres. John A. Wood resigned the presidency, and the board of trustees called to this position Rev. A. R. Moore.

Mr. Moore has been serving as regional superintendent under the United Christian Missionary Society. He will not be able to lay aside these duties at once, but hopes to do so at an early date. The four states of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Florida look to Southeastern Christian College as the educational center for Disciples young people. It is announced that the school will be filled to capacity this coming year, and funds are being sought for enlargement.

Northfield Has Interesting Program

Economic conditions have had something to do with a slight sag in the attendance at the various summer conferences this summer. The thirty-ninth annual conference at Northfield has been characterized by large audiences, sometimes reaching a total of two thousand, though the number of people in tents and cottages is less than last year. Eminent ministers of this country and Great Britain have contributed to the program. Among these is Rev. F. B. Meyer and Dr. J. Stuart Holden of London, Dr. John A. Hutton of Glasgow, Scotland, and Dr.

Charles E. Jefferson, pastor of Broadway Tabernacle of New York. Dr. Harris E. Kirk of Baltimore gave a series of addresses on preaching which proved of great interest to his hearers. Northfield has a regular summer constituency and some of the people there this year have been in annual attendance for fifteen years or more. This gives to the fellowship of this conference a continuity which is not to be found in many of the other summer conferences over the country. Northfield conference was established by Dwight L. Moody, the well-known evangelist.

Minister Has a Unique Vacation

The month of August is vacation month with the ministers and most of the pulpits of the land have been filled with supply preachers during the past month. Among the vacation experiences of the month few are more unique than that of Rev. H. H. Harmon, pastor of First Christian church of Lincoln, Neb. He and Mrs. Harmon left their family at Estes Park and went on a visit to Dr. S. Earl Taylor, Holbrook, Ariz. Here the erstwhile leader of the Interchurch debate over the policy on the foreign mission field with respect to the attitude of Disciples missionary churches toward Christians of other denominational names. This question was thrown into the focus of attention a year ago when the convention was held in St. Louis. Previously, a newspaper discussion had taken place arising out of the request of the Disciples missionaries in China to be permitted to participate in a movement toward a united church of Christ in China. Such a participation would, it was pointed out, involve the practice of Christian unity by the free interchange of members between the now existing churches organized by Disciples and those organized under the auspices of other communions. A conservative journal of the Disciples had demanded the recall of certain missionaries active in making this request, prominent amongst whom was Rev. Frank Garrett, secretary of the China mission. An editorial in The Christian Century had stated that the mission churches were already practicing in principle such an exchange of members, a practice which is popularly denominated as "open membership" by Disciples and Baptists. This statement was denied by the officials of the Foreign Missionary Society and the conservative organ called for proof or retraction. At the St. Louis convention the discussion waxed heated and personalities were indulged in without repression. The convention itself, in facing the issue, demanded that the editor of The Christian Century should speak. In response, Mr. Morrison read extracts from letters of missionaries in demonstration of his editorial utterances. Great excitement filled the convention hall. A resolution was adopted by the convention containing a statement of conformity to the practice of Disciples churches in America, the same to be sent to missionaries on the field for their signature. In due season the statement was considered by the members of the China mission, who declined to sign it.

MR. GARRETT'S PRESENCE

It was therefore a happy issue of the year's controversy that Mr. Garrett himself should have arrived in America a few days before the Winona convention assembled. Mr. Garrett stood before the convention and made an address, describing the situation in China with self-evident fidelity to fact and candor of spirit. He went into great detail to help his audience visualize the conditions faced by missionaries and the native church. In every essential detail his description corroborated the correspondence which Mr. Morrison had presented to the St. Louis convention. Whatever discrepancies there might be between the letters of Rev. George B. Baird and the statements by Mr. Garrett were negligible. Mr. Garrett did not undertake to say whether the facts as he described them constituted the practice of so-called "open membership" or not. He was interested only in describing the facts, leaving both to his missionary colleagues in China and to the convention the right to label the facts as they might. After his address Mr. Garrett submitted for two hours to a rapid fire of questions from the audience. These he answered with great clearness, showing that he had thought through every aspect of the problem. At no place did he compromise himself or the China mission with respect to the strong position they had taken when they made their first request to the board of the foreign society; nor did he, for the sake of momentary peace, weaken the testimony for Christian unity, to which the very genius of Christian missions commits every foreign missionary. The issue was discussed at two sessions, Mr. Garrett speaking again by request at the second session and submitting for the second time to a public questioning. The result of the debate was to pass a resolution the effect of which is to nullify the demand for creedal conformity—the so-called Medbury resolution—adopted by the St. Louis convention a year ago. This action was taken by a vote that may safely be estimated as four to one. It may well be believed that this will be the last attempt in a Disciples convention to impose a creed upon the missionaries.

The question of the removal of the College of Missions from Indianapolis was also the subject of an interesting debate. To perhaps a majority of the delegates the proposal came as a distinct shock and they were not ready to act on it. Hence a resolution was passed which instructed the executive committee to consider the subject for another year and bring in a report. In connection with these instructions, however, was a clause which said that the convention looked with favor upon the removal of the college. The reason given by the advocates of removal is the fact that students for the mission field are graduate students requiring the facilities of a great university and that Indianapolis does not furnish such facilities.

Everywhere there were evidences of growth in parliamentary practice, of the deepening of respect for organization and of the coming of a more spiritual interpretation of religion in this latest convention of the Disciples, whose great communion is becoming one of the more bountiful sources of spiritual power for the great world tasks of the church of Jesus Christ. Those delegates who went to Winona Lake this year are convinced that they have good grounds for thanking God and taking courage.

World Movement, now broken in health, welcomed them with fine hospitality. He furnished them with a camping outfit and a guide. A trip a hundred miles away from a railroad was made, and the Navajo and Hopi tribes of Indians were visited. The religious ceremonials of these peoples were studied. When the Lincoln minister gets back into his pulpit everybody will admit that he has had a real vacation this year.

Minister Preaches From the Farm

The voice of prophecy can never be stilled in a man who has a real message to give to the world. Rev. George Gowen was for ten years pastor of the Disciples church in Chesapeake Bay, Va. To recover his health he has retired to his old home farm in the middle of Tennessee, and from this rural retreat now sends his message out to the world through the public press. He has syndicated a three minute sermon which is now read by four hundred thousand people every week. In addition to this service he preaches to his old friends and neighbors in the surrounding churches. He finds leisure here for his books and magazines, and expects to spend the rest of his days preaching to his section of the world through the printed page.

Devoted Missionary Leader Suffers Loss

R. A. Doan, a unique figure among the Disciples missionary forces, has suffered a great loss recently. His wife, who accompanied him on two different trips to the orient, recently died after more than a year of great suffering with cancer. Mr. Doan was years ago a successful business man and an enthusiastic Bible school teacher. The call for direct service to the kingdom of God came to him and he gave up business and for a number of years has been a missionary secretary at his own charges, negotiating many important property deals in the orient for his society. His only son is in Johns Hopkins university preparing himself to go as a medical missionary to China.

Y. M. C. A. Demonstrates Power of Cooperation

Moving the hut was not the big idea the other day when a dramatic achievement was stage by the Y. M. C. A. at Camp MacArthur. They wanted to show the power of cooperation. The floors of the hut had been taken up. Eight hundred men were placed around the building. At the word of command the building was carried to its new location a half mile away. No man lifted over fifty pounds. The incident is being used this summer everywhere in Y. M. C. A. meetings to illustrate the meaning of teamwork in religious effort.

Presbyterian Minister Fights the Street Carnival

The street carnival is one of the banes of the small town, bringing as it does a good many people of loose morals to the community and gathering up the dollars by gambling devices and things far more socially hurtful. In Mitchell, Ind., Rev. Joseph Lindsay, pastor of the Presbyterian church, recently inaugurated a campaign against the street carnival in his town. The whole community was aroused by his preaching and a committee went before the city council with a protest. As a result the council has adopted a high license policy with regard to these street shows and stringent regulation will be carried out in the future.

Dr. Reidenbach Changes Denomination

Dr. Clarence E. Reidenbach, who for several years has been pastor of Downey Avenue Christian church of Indianapolis, has accepted a call to Westminster Congregational church of Kansas City. Dr. Reidenbach was trained at Butler college and later at Yale, where he took his Ph.D. degree. His position in Indianapolis was important, as he was pastor of the church adjacent to Butler college and the College of Missions. Secretaries and other Disciples leaders were in his congregation. During the past year Dr. Reidenbach has been editor of the Scroll, organ of the Campbell Institute.

Dr. Shelton Returns to Thibet

Dr. A. L. Shelton, the Disciples missionary who was in the hands of the bandits of Thibet last year, sailed recently from Vancouver to return to his field. Before sailing Dr. Shelton learned that the chieftain who had held him captive had been executed. At this news the missionary expressed regret, as he had hoped that his captor might some day become a convert. Dr. Shelton has been invited into the "forbidden city" of Lhasa, and will make what speed he can to reach this outpost of the world. Mrs. Shelton will be in India for a time engaged in some translation work which is greatly needed in the Thibet field.

Presbyterians Have a Ringling Labor Day Message

Presbyterian pulpits took fire this year from the September issue of the New Era Magazine. James J. Davis, Secretary of Labor for the United States, has an article in the magazine in which he urges the spirit of conciliation in industry. Dr. John McDowell, secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, has an article on "Industry's Challenge to the Church." He says: "Love and only love will make industry work together for good; nothing else will. Everything else has failed. Law has failed; education has failed; science has failed; organization has failed; labor unions have failed; employers' associations have failed. Love and love alone can solve our industrial problems and usher in a period of industrial peace and prosperity based on industrial justice. Love will solve the three greatest problems in industry—namely, increased efficiency in production, increased equity in distribution, increased satisfaction in work."

Christian Minister Believes Buddhists and Christians Should Cooperate

Some time ago the Christian world was startled by a challenge from Archbishop Arai, abbot of the Sojiji monastery and head of the Buddhist cult in Nippon. He suggested that the time had come for Christianity and Buddhism to co-operate to mutual advantage. This proposition was discussed recently by Rev. H. V. White, pastor of the Disciples church in Honolulu. In the Hawaiian islands the two religions come into contact with each other on more nearly equal terms than anywhere else in the world. Mr. White advocates the acceptance of the challenge of the Buddhist archbishop in good faith. His address was of so great interest that a Honolulu paper published it in full. Mr. White said: "Christ will not reject the advances of Gautama, but will rejoice in the opportunity of meeting him for an honest mutual appraisal as we face the great task of setting humanity free from the sin and ignorance that curse it. I believe that long ago the Christ and the Buddha have met in that larger world of the spirit and I cannot but believe that it was a meeting marked by mutual love and veneration."

Illinois Disciples on a New Schedule

The Illinois Disciples have changed the date of their annual convention to fit the new schedule of the national convention. The convention will be held in Decatur, Oct. 3-5. In recent years a district force of workers has been developed for each district of the state. Nearly every church in the state has been visited this year, particularly those that are weak and isolated. The money raised on local fields for the struggling local churches is one of the significant features of the work this year. It is noteworthy that this totals $180,000.

Churches Go Together for Union Sunday School

The five evangelical churches of West Salem, Ill., including the Moravian, Methodist Episcopal, Free Methodist, Evangelical and Disciples have gone together in common work in a country neighborhood and for several years have maintained a union Sunday school at Mills' Prairie School House. Evangelistic services are being held in which the West Salem ministers participate.

The Secret of Being a Convincing Talker

How I Learned It in One Evening

By GEORGE RAYMOND

"HAVE you heard the news about Frank Jordan?" This question quickly brought me to the little group which had gathered in the center of the office. Jordan and I had started with the Great Eastern Machinery Company, within a month of each other, four years ago. A year ago Jordan was taken into the accounting division and I was sent out as salesman. Neither of us was blessed with an unusual amount of brilliancy, but we "got by" in our new jobs well enough to hold them.

Imagine my amazement, then, when I heard:

"Jordan's just been made Treasurer of the Company!"

I could hardly believe my ears. But there was the "Notice to Employees" on the bulletin board, telling about Jordan's good fortune.

Now I knew that Jordan was a capable fellow, quiet and unassuming, but I never would have picked him for any such sudden rise. I knew, too, that the Treasurer of the Great Eastern had to be a big man, and I wondered how in the world Jordan landed the place.

The first chance I got, I walked into Jordan's new office and, after congratulating him warmly, I asked him to let me in on the details of how he jumped ahead so quickly. His story is so intensely interesting that I am going to repeat it as closely as I remember.

"I'll tell you just how it happened, George, because you may pick up a pointer or two that will help you.

"You remember how scared I used to be whenever I had to talk to the chief? You remember how you used to tell me that every time I opened my mouth I put my foot into it, meaning of course that every time I spoke I got into trouble? You remember when Ralph Sinton left to take charge of the Western office and I was asked to present him with the loving cup the boys gave him, how flustered I was and how I couldn't say a word because there were people around? You remember how confused I used to be every time I met new people? I couldn't say just what I wanted to say when I wanted to say it; and I determined that if there was any possible chance to learn how to talk I was going to do it.

"The first thing I did was to buy a number of books on public speaking, but they seemed to be meant for those who wanted to become orators, whereas what I wanted to learn was not only how to speak in public but how convincingly. Then came my first promotion since I entered the accounting department. I was given the job of answering complaints, and I made good. From that I was given the job of making collections. When Mr. Buckley joined the Officers' Training Camp, I was made Treasurer. Between you and me, George, my salary is now $7,500 a year and I expect it will be more from the first of the year.

"And I want to tell you sincerely, that I attribute my success solely to the fact that I learned how to talk to people."

When Jordan finished, I asked him for the address of the publishers of Dr. Law's course and he gave it to me. I sent for it and found it to be exactly as he had stated. After studying the eight simple lessons I began to sell to people who had previously refused to listen to me at all. After four months of record-breaking sales during the dull season of the year, I received a wire from the chief asking me to return to the home office. We had quite a long talk in which I explained how I was able to break sales records—and

I was appointed Sales Manager at almost twice my former salary. I know that there was nothing in me that had changed except that I had acquired the ability to talk, where formerly I simply used "words without reason." I can never thank Jordan enough for telling me about Dr. Law's Course in Business Talking and Public Speaking. Jordan and I are both spending all our spare time making public speeches, and Jordan is being talked about now as Mayor of our little town.

So confident is the Independent Corporation, publishers of "Mastery of Speech," Dr. Law's Course in Business Talking and Public Speaking, that once you have an opportunity to see it in your own home how you can, in one hour, learn the secret of speaking and how you can apply the principles of effective speech under all conditions, that they are willing to send you the Course on free examination. And for a short time only, this famous Course, that has been sold to more than 100,000 men and women at $5 each, is offered to you for only $3. This amazing offer is made at the suggestion of Dr. Law himself, who wishes to make it easy for EVERYONE to profit by his Course. But the offer can be held open for only a limited time.

Don't send any money. Merely mail the coupon or write a letter and the complete Course will be sent, all charges prepaid, at once. If you are not entirely satisfied, send it back any time within five days after you receive it and you will owe nothing.

to speak to individuals under various conditions in business and social life.

"A few weeks later, just as I was about to give up hope of ever learning how to talk interestingly, I read an announcement that Dr. Frederick Houk Law had just completed a new course in business talking and public speaking entitled 'Mastery of Speech.' The course was offered on approval without money in advance, so since I had nothing whatever to lose by examining the lessons, I sent for them and in a few days they arrived. I glanced through the entire eight lessons, reading the headings and a few paragraphs here and there, and in about an hour the whole secret of effective speaking was opened to me.

"For example, I learned why I had always lacked confidence, why talking had always seemed something to be dreaded, whereas, it is really the simplest thing in the world to 'get up and talk.' I learned how to secure complete attention to what I was saying and how to make everything I said interesting, forceful and convincing. I learned the art of listening, the value of silence, and the power of brevity. Instead of being funny at the wrong time, I learned how and when to use humor with telling effect.

"But perhaps the most wonderful thing about the lessons were the actual examples of what things to say and when to say them to meet every condition. I found that there was a right way and a wrong way to present complaints, to give estimates, and to issue orders.

"I picked up some wonderful pointers about how to give my opinions, about how to answer complaints, about how to ask the bank for a loan, about how to ask for extensions. Another thing that struck me forcibly was that instead of antagonizing people when I didn't agree with them, I learned how to bring them around to my way of thinking in the most pleasant sort of way. Then, of course, along with those lessons there were chapters on speaking before large audiences, how to find material for talking and speaking, how to talk to friends, how to talk to servants, and how to talk to children.

"Why, I got the secret the very first evening and it was only a short time before I was able to apply all of the principles and found that my words were beginning to have an almost magical effect upon everybody to whom I spoke. It seemed that I got things done instantly, where formerly, as you know, what I said 'went in one ear and out the other.' I began to acquire an executive ability that surprised me. I smoothed out difficulties like a true diplomat. In my talks with the chief I spoke clearly, simply, con-

Frederick Houk Law

As educator, lecturer, executive, traveler and author, few men are so well equipped by experience and training as Dr. Law to teach the art of effective speaking. His "Mastery of Speech" is the fruit of 20 years' active lecturing and instruction in Eastern schools and colleges, preceded by an education at Oxford Academy, Amherst College, Columbia University, The Teachers College and Brown University. He holds the degrees of A.B., A.M. and Ph.D.

Dr. Law is the author of two novels, two books of poetry, and editor of six school text-books. He was lecturer in Pedagogy in the Extension Work of the College of the City of New York, and is Head of the Dept. of English in the Stuyvesant H. S. and writer of the Weekly Lesson Plans for The Independent.

Singing the Social Gospel

AN OUTSTANDING characteristic of the new hymnal, HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH is its modernness. This has been widely commented upon by the hundreds of church leaders who have adopted the book for their congregations. As an illustration of this quality of modernness we would call attention to the unique section on "The Kingdom of God," with sub-sections entitled "Social Aspiration and Progress," "Loyalty and Courage," "Human Service and Brotherhood," "The Nation," "Peace Among the Nations," etc. In this section are 101 great hymns which sing the evangelical social gospel which the modern pulpit preaches. Many of these have never before been used in a Church hymnal. Here are some of the authors' names:

Emily Green Balch
Nolan R. Best
John Hay
Felix Adler
Charles Mackay
John G. Whittier
Ebenezer Elliott
W. Russell Bowie
Charles Kingsley
Rudyard Kipling
Frank Mason North

John Addington Symonds
William DeWitt Hyde
Richard Watson Gilder
Algernon S. Swinburne
Gilbert K. Chesterton
Washington Gladden
William Pierson Merrill
Katherine Lee Bates
Frederick L. Hosmer
John Haynes Holmes
T. Wentworth Higginson

Think of being able to sing the social gospel as well as to preach it! The social gospel will never seem to be a truly religious gospel until the Church learns to sing it. HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH is the only Church hymnal in which the social note of today's evangelical preaching finds adequate expression. The use of this hymnal will thrill and inspire your congregation with a new vision and purpose.

*A returnable copy of the Hymnal will

Looking Toward The Disarmament Congress

THE INDIANAPOLIS NEWS says: "In looking forward to the great gathering of representatives of the nations that is to meet in Washington November 11, it is the duty of Americans to cultivate a peaceful spirit, and to recognize the fact that peace can be won and enjoyed only by those who earnestly desire it, are dominated by a passion for it, and are willing to work and make sacrifices for it. A good deal more than diplomacy is needed to bring it to pass. Probably not since the beginning of the Christian era has there been a more moving call to the Christian church. Does it believe in the possibility of the fulfillment of the angelic prophecy of 'peace on earth' or is the church itself infected with the foul disease of cynicism and 'practicality?'"

It would perhaps not be too much to say that the fruitage of the coming Congress will be according to the active will and working of the Churches of Christ. If their effort results in a general and persistent demand for disarmament—or approximate disarmament—that wished-for goal will probably be attained. If the Churches are lukewarm in their attitude, the advocates of "practicality" will no doubt win the day. Ten thousand American ministers thoroughly alive and alert to this great opportunity would perhaps bring to pass the fulfillment of the ancient prophecy of perpetual peace. Every minister should have at hand the following books, as aids in a campaign for the making of sentiment for disarmament.

The Next War. By Will Irwin. By no means a war book; rather one which points out the course leading to world peace. A book, which by its general tone and by the wealth of facts and statistics that it presents, leads to comment and discussion. ($1.50.)

Economic Causes of Modern Wars. By John Bakeless. A prize essay of William College, setting forth all the economic factors which have played an important part in bringing about modern warfare. The period covered is from 1878 to 1918. ($4.)

The Sword or the Cross. By Kirby Page. Prof. Harry F. Ward, of Union Theological Seminary, says: "Mr. Page has faced the issue and has found an answer that satisfies his soul. What he has written, therefore, deserves the thoughtful consideration of all those whose duty it is to teach the people concerning the moral and spiritual validity of modern war." ($1.20.)

Reactions to the Lambeth Proposals

THE Lambeth proposals for the unity of the church have now been before the Christian world long enough to have produced quite definite reactions among the various Christian bodies. The approach of the Anglican episcopacy has been met with hesitation and in some instances with coldness. The Methodist denomination particularly has felt that these proposals mean a relapse to the sacramentarian type of religion against which they have so successfully protested throughout their history. Presbyterians, likewise, have not grown enthusiastic over the implications of a union based upon a reordained ministry. Curiously enough, it is among people more widely variant from the Episcopal conception of religion that one finds more sympathy with the Lambeth proposals. In Congregationalism there is a considerable group who would accept reordination, believing that division is worse than the compromises involved in adjustment to the Episcopal scheme. Those denominations which have no authoritative national organization would not be able to deliver their people en masse. Baptists generally treat with scorn all talk of church union. The Disciples have talked union but at this stage in their evolution would certainly not accept the Nicene creed or the episcopal form of church government. It cannot be doubted, however, that the bishops of the Episcopal communion felt that they had gone a long way in making a friendly approach to the Christian world. To meet their warmth and cordiality only with coldness and criticism would be displeasing to the Holy Spirit. The times demand frank statements of difficulties, in considering the Lambeth proposals, but at the same time the greatest of Christian courtesy. Since the last Lambeth conference it ought to be possible for the evangelical denominations to assume a more friendly spirit to the historic church of England instead of continuing captious criticism. Both the Episcopal church and the free churches must continue to grow before they find a basis for union. The sacramentarianism of the older communion must be abated, and in the free church group must come a new respect for order and organization.

Public School Opens Its Doors

CHILDREN are wending their way once more to the halls of learning. They are not going unwillingly, though the cartoonist loves to picture them so. For even the most active boys, vacation has been long enough. The schools of today are so interesting that it is no hardship to attend them. Learning is mixed with recreation rather than with the birch rod as in former days. The children like this new mixture a great deal better. Once the schools were taught by ministers. Since then a strange indifference in these educational processes has developed in church circles. Just because the church does not any longer do this work, should she be unconcerned with the process? Is there anything in the community more fundamental to the church than the spirit of the school-room? The minister who will visit class-rooms and show an intelligent interest in school programs finds contacts here that are very rewarding. The church should be continually alert in aiding in the enforcement of the law with regard to school attendance. Religion has no enemy worse than ignorance. Letters and literary appreciation open the door to an understanding of the Scriptures and of the deep things of God. In many more communities than at present there should be well-directed attempts to open up classes for religious instruction in connection with the public school curriculum. Such instruction cannot be paid for with tax money. It may even be advisable to give it in some other building than in the public school property. But the instruction must be given, or our juvenile delinquency will become an increasing menace. Public school superintendents in many communities are ready to give hearty cooperation with such a plan. The churches must believe that religious education is as important as scientific and literary education if they are in dead earnest about the things they profess.

Religion's Present Opportunity

MATERIALISM may obsess a people for a time, but it is never in the long run satisfying. There are too many good things that money cannot buy, and that cannot be captured with guns. From all over the world reports are coming of a fresh interest in the church. In Germany after the war many insisted that there was no divine providence or they would not have been defeated. Now a number of religious workers report that there is no subject in all Germany so interesting as religion. One by one the great religious organizations of the United States have held their national meetings. The reports run uniform. They indicate not only larger missionary offerings, but also a considerable increase in the membership of the churches. If the past five years have been difficult ones in the promotion of the cause of religion, it may be confidently predicted that the next five will be filled with unusual achievement. This does not mean that every congregation will be built up. During this rebirth of religious feeling there will sometimes be destruction to make way for construction. In over-churched communities the rising tide of religious feeling may insist upon unions and federations, thus eliminating many useless organizations. Just as surely many communities now without even a Sunday school within a reasonable distance from the children, will be organized to give instruction in the principles of spiritual living. To meet these new opportunities something more than the conventional and evanescent fall "rally day" is needed in the evangelical churches. It is time to go over the whole program of the churches, restricting here and expanding there, until the program fits the community life. Above all it is time to examine the motive power which operates all of these activities. The times demand more than machinery. Each congregation must make sure that it draws upon the divine resources for power with which to meet the new day.

Judge Landis's Momentous Public Service

THE work of Judge Landis this summer in arbitrating the difficulties of the building trades and their employers has been a note-worthy service. Through the years a steady accumulation of restrictions had made building at last a next to impossible adventure. In a time when there was more demand for housing than ever before, capital shied off and thousands of men have walked the streets looking for jobs. Not only have the various labor unions sought special privileges, but employers' associations have sought monopolies through alliance with labor unions. It has been the achievement of Judge Landis to break up the unholy alliance between crooked contractors and grafting walking-delegates, and to start the wheels of industry going again. It is not yet certain that the parties to the arbitration will accept the awards made by the judge. If they do not, so much the worse for them. The public has suffered beyond all patience with the housing situation. Whoever gets in the road of this settlement, which is as nearly just as any that can be secured at the present time, will find that the public will deal with him with short shrift. The crowding in great cities has gone on to such an extent that sanitation and public morals are both threatened. In many cities the newspapers are appealing to families to take in roomers as a public duty. The advertisements of desperate families for quarters occupy a considerable space among the want ads. The man with several children often finds himself without any shelter at all. It is either arbitrate our labor troubles, or raise enormous charity funds for the coming winter. There is sufficient capital lying in the banks awaiting the coming of right conditions in the building trades to preclude the need of such charity. The next few weeks are fraught with great significance, for if arbitration in Chicago succeeds, it will set standards throughout the middle west. Christian sentiment should be on the side of industrial peace, when it is based upon justice, for the whole people will gain when the sound of the saw and hammer is heard once more in the land.

Discussion Without a Sting

IN early days, the Disciples were great debaters. It is strange that those valiant theological warriors should produce sons who could stand in fear of discussion. Yet for years those in control of the general conventions sat on the safety valve, and effectively suppressed discussion. The most important matters were hidden away in committees, and only brought out in phraseology that was deemed safe. The officers of the 1921 convention whose sessions recently closed at Winona Lake, Ind., are to be congratulated upon their faith in the good sense of the brethren. They believe that it was possible to carry on a discussion in a way that would not prove divisive. The most delicate matters were put to such a test. The removal of the College of Missions, the report of missionary procedure in China, and the examination of the practice of "open membership" churches in America were all subjected to the forum treatment, and there is nothing to regret. Whether the multitude arrived at right or wrong decisions is beside the point. In the long run they will arrive at right decisions. The success of the discussions this year arose from some very simple considerations. The business was carried on according to Rules of Order. The chairman had the courage to gavel down personalities, no matter how soundly conservative the speaker might be, and to uphold the right of any speaker to express his opinion no matter how heretical he might be. When democracy functions through proper machinery and is held to proper rules, it may discuss anything under the sun and gain only good from it. A convention forum is a far better thing than a partisan "congress" where only one side has the right of speech. Under a policy of free speech and no favors, the Disciples may hope to resolve their inner differences, so long acute, in a few years. They will never all think alike, but discussion will help them to understand each other. Without this understanding Christian brotherhood is quite impossible.

The Curve of Disciples Progress

AN evangelical religious body born in America in the formative days of American ideals, and now numbering 10,000 churches with 6,000 ministers and 1,300,000 members presents a phenomenon of capital importance to all students of church life in the new world. Numerically the Disciples of Christ are but slightly less in strength than the Northern Presbyterians and the Northern Baptists, almost twice the size of the Congregationalists and one and one-half times as large as the Episcopal communion. In the three decades between 1870 and 1900 their growth reached its peak. Their reputation gained during that period as "the fastest growing religious body in the United States" has not been sustained in the opening decades of the new century. Their recent growth has gone pari passu with that of their Christian neighbors showing no exceptional expansion in comparison with the rest.

Several explanations have been offered to account for this falling off in the rate of multiplication. One is the fact that their communion, being a frontier communion in its origin and in the line of its development—the term "frontier" being used in the technical sense familiar to sociology rather than in the mere geographical sense—has fallen victim to the fate that has everywhere overtaken the rural life of America. Hundreds and thousands of Disciples rural churches, as of Methodist and Baptist churches, have dwindled or ceased to exist. Meanwhile the Disciples had been slow in establishing churches in the great centers where the older denominations were in a position to take advantage of the enormous movement in population.

A second explanation is the equally obvious fact that the Disciples recruiting or evangelistic passion has in the present generation suffered measurable diminution. The aggressive temper of their recruiting activities in the fifty years prior to the modern period is well known. Conceiving their mission in terms not only of saving the unchurched but of teaching "the way of the Lord more perfectly" to those already churched, they drew no sharp line of distinction between evangelism and proselytism. The scars of their not always gentle attacks upon prevailing denominational doctrines and practices are still carried in many hearts. But this type of recruiting activity has passed. Two reasons account for its passing. One is that the Disciples have come to feel themselves less and less a "peculiar people" and have come to possess a deeper sympathy with Christians of other names. Their cooperative spirit has grown greatly in the present generation.

The other reason is that the issues upon which their former evangelism was based have ceased to have living reality in the mind of our generation. Over against a prevailing pseudo-mystical view of conversion the Disciples set their clean-cut, objective appeal to the letter of the New Testament, declaring that faith, repentance and baptism constituted the human side of conversion and the forgiveness of sins the divine side. If a penitent believer submitted to baptism, they said, he need have no anxiety or uncertainty about God's part of the transaction being faithfully performed. This view of conversion and salvation was almost sensationally new in the early western days, and it brought spiritual relief and peace to thousands whose hearts were mystified with the type of Calvinistic preaching then extant. But today this issue has practically ceased to be. At any rate the Disciples solution of it is no longer distinctive to themselves. It has come to be the prevailing view upon which the recruiting appeal of all evangelical denominations proceeds.

Moreover, in close connection with this rationalization of the conversion process the Disciples, standing with the Baptists, preached with great tenacity and argumentative power the doctrine of baptism by immersion. This doctrine was without doubt one of the chief sources of their strength in making converts. But the mind of our generation has lost interest in the old controversy. The immersion dogma is rarely preached, except in unprogressive communities still amenable to the old arguments. Many Disciples ministers of the more cultivated sort who yet affect to cling to the old position take a certain pride in testifying that they never preach on baptism any more but that they let their practice of immersion speak for itself by simply reading from the New Testament, when the ordinance is administered, the passages believed to be relevant, without comment. This is an altogether new evangelistic technique as compared to the way of the fathers. It reflects the growing impatience of public intelligence with the dogmatism characteristic of immersionists in other days.

These two factors: the dwindling of rural churches generally, and the obsolescence of much of the Disciples distinctive subject matter account, we believe, for the loss of that conspicuous position of precedence in rate of growth which the Disciples attained in the latter half of the nineteenth century. Henceforth their destiny would seem to be, and is by their leaders felt to be, bound up with the destiny of Protestantism in general, rather than with any unique truth of which they are the peculiar custodians.

To say all this is, however, to say but half of the truth. For it is steadily coming to the front of the Disciples mind that, after all, the subject-matter of their evangelistic preaching during the period of their great expansion as a denomination did not contain, or at least did not exhaust, the message with which at their origin they were commissioned. Steadily, out of the dim background of their history, there is arising another conception of their genius as a religious movement. It is dawning upon the minds of this virile American communion that the entire range of particular doctrines, whether of conversion or immersion or what not, represents something quite incidental, opportunistic and unessential in the working out of their divinely given task. Many Disciples are coming to see that they might, conceivably, confess that in all these matters of specific doctrine they were mistaken, without invalidating their essential mission and genius at all.

Tracing their history from its beginning, Disciples are able to see how their movement began in the passion for uniting the dissevered sects of Christ's body. They are discovering the liberal words of the youthful Alexander Campbell who on coming from Scotland flung his great personality with enthusiasm into the movement which his father Thomas Campbell had already launched. Asked what was the meaning of the movement the son replied to his questioners: "We intend to form a church whose door will be as wide as the gate of heaven." Whom Christ receives we should receive, the father had reiterated in his famous document the "Declaration and Address" which Disciples regard as the magna charta of their movement.

The Disciples movement and its principles arose with the attempt to overcome the jangling discords of sectarianism which scandalously divided into unfraternal and futile fragments the one body of Christ in those pioneer communities. This passionate purpose was the original genius of the Disciples. Specific doctrines came in, together with other influences, to confuse and eclipse that purpose though it was never wholly lost. Even in their most belligerent and dogmatic period the Disciples always preached the ideal of Christian unity, though it must be confessed that they gave to their neighbors the impression that unity was impossible save by accepting the particular doctrines and formulas upon which they had hit in their pursuit of this catholic ideal. It is now dawning upon them that these doctrines and formulas are to stand or be abandoned upon their inherent merits, and that the Disciples "plea" for unity does not stand or fall with whatever fate overtakes the dogmas associated with Disciples history.

This insight is giving a new kind of passion and enthusiasm to the forward moving body of Disciples. True, there are many to whom the present interpretation would be unacceptable. They still speak a message whose words and concepts lack altogether any vital contact with the word of our time. But their voice sounds hollow; it is the voice of logic and literality, not the voice of insight and passion. True also, the large body of Disciples only dimly sense, and are not yet willing frankly to formulate, the vision whose adumbrations are arising out of the historic background of the past one hundred years. But there is in the midst of the denomination's life a very rapidly increasing fellowship of enlightened and influential men and women who do see clearly, and who have reached the place where they may speak the truth that is in them, frankly, and without hazarding their ecclesiastical heads.

It is with such impressions as these that a modern-minded Disciple returns home from the latest General Convention of his communion held at Winona Lake, Ind., the first week in September. There for the first time in Disciples history an official convention made a place for discussing the question of practicing Christian union in local churches by receiving unimmersed Christians without demanding that they be rebaptized. There the denomination's most outstanding, as he is also the most gallant, protagonist of the traditional procedure, declared with great gravity that the question had come to be the most urgent and serious internal issue in Disciplesdom. He wrongly fears, as we see it, that the abandonment of the sectarian practice of rebaptism jeopardizes the practice of immersion. But he rightly perceives that it carries with it a new emphasis, a new vision, a new technique, a new goal and a new spiritual life as compared to those with which his own great generation of Disciples had grown accustomed.

The action of the convention in nullifying the creedal resolution unwittingly adopted a year ago, demanding that missionaries in China should conform in their practices with respect to fellowship to the extra-scriptural practices of the churches in the United States put such an accent of progress and Christian fraternalism into the convention's utterances that only one blind and deaf could fail to discern the direction in which this great body of Christian people is moving.

Opening the Paths to Unity

THE articles on "Church Union in Canada," which Mr. Gilroy has contributed to our columns, meet a wide demand for a clear, precise and authoritative account of a remarkable movement. They tend to clarify the issues relating to all movements for Christian unity, and provide some incentive toward greater activity in the approach toward union of the great religious bodies on this side of the border. A former Congregational editor, ex-chairman of the Congregational Union of Canada, and member for several years of the Joint Committee which elaborated the Basis of Union of the proposed united church, Mr. Gilroy has also written out of wide and varied experiences of church life in the dominion. A pastorate of three years in this country has enabled him to appreciate the points of deepest interest to American readers, and the phases of the Canadian movement which are most closely related to our own problems of church union. He has deemed it his duty to narrate and expound, rather than to discuss, to let the facts speak for themselves; and where he has suggested doubts, difficulties and differences of opinion he has sought to deal with them as they arose in connection with the movement itself, as elements in a full and impartial account.

The Christian Century is in substantial accord with this attitude. It is our judgment that any movement professedly designed to take away the reproach of division and sectarianism in Christendom should be viewed sympathetically, examined with a deep sense of responsibility, and treated with coldness or hostility only when there arises the clear conviction that the movement is calculated to defeat the very end that it professes to seek. In all the proposals and movements for ultimate unity and for more immediate co-operation and union there is, we believe, the evidence of a spirit working toward larger and better things, an idealism lifting men out of the narrow ecclesiastical ruts. If these proposals and movements are to prove thoroughly effective they must move in an atmosphere of the freest and frankest criticism. But is it too much to ask that the criticism shall be dominated with a corresponding spirit of idealism; that it shall not be cold, capitious or quibbling, but conceived and directed with the Christ-like purpose to fulfil rather than to destroy? Though we should deem the duty of private judgment to be much wider and more fundamental than Newman evidently conceived it to be, we are disposed to accept the validity of his principle, in relation to all these matters of catholicity in faith and organization, that "private judgment, if it is not a duty, is a sin." And we are inclined also to that attitude which Carlyle assumed toward Mohamet: I mean to say all the good of him I justly can. It is the way to get at his secret."

From this point of view of the longing for catholicity, a catholicity that shall be as much of love and liberty, as of faith and organization, one surveys the Canadian church union movement with great hopes, and, it must be confessed, with deep solicitude. A movement for organic union, which seeks to wipe out forever old rivalries and worn-out distinctions, has about it something that in spirit and vision transcends cooperations and federations. Already that idea appears to have uprooted in Canada much of the sectarianism that might have long continued under federation. It seems at least to be a striving for the proper goal, though one cannot help wondering if the organism will prove in every way large enough and free enough for a growing and ever-developing Christian life to find fulness of expression. It is satisfying to discover that the intricacies of Calvinism, and the axioms of Arminianism, have not proven impenetrable barriers to union. Canada has, indeed, been charged with a paucity of theological thought, and a Scottish professor declared—not so long ago—that the need of that country was for "more doctrine," but it must not be forgotten that among those to whom the Basis of Union has proven acceptable are a large number who by heredity, intelligence, training and experience are closely linked with the best doctrinal traditions of the past.

Likewise, there are not a few who have had the finest opportunities of old world training and culture. For not only have Canadian students "finished" in the greatest institutions in Scotland, but the finest minds of Scotland have been freely imported into the dominion. The evidence of their influence is apparent in the doctrinal statement of the proposed United Church, but the point of principal significance is that these men, and Arminians with a corresponding background, have felt so imbued with the practical exigencies of the church's mission that they have come to the place where the old things must be gateways to new paths, instead of barriers in the way. Who can say that that attitude is not just and sound?

Less remarkable, perhaps, is the blending of local independency, or congregationalism, with connexionalism, but this likewise is no small achievement. Here we see some of the advantages of making a union movement wide enough. Manifestly it has been much easier to come to a basis for a tripartite union of Presbyterians, Methodists and Congregationalists, than it would have been to arrange a basis of union for any two. Each of the three bodies has represented a sort of midway position between the other two; and the principle of endeavoring to conserve in the United Church the most distinctive elements in all three original bodies has greatly expedited matters when once a meeting-place was found. The polity of the United Church will be tested only by practice, but it looks as if the proposals bid fair to combine the freedom of itineracy with the advantage of the indeterminate pastorate.

This matter has already had a testing on a small scale in the union between Congregationalists and United Brethren, to which Mr. Gilroy has referred. The United Brethren in this case came into the Congregational Union, as a separate association, maintaining their former organization, and some of their practices, among others that of annual appointment of ministers to stations. This particular arrangement did not work out entirely satisfactorily, as the small group of United Brethren ministers had access to the larger fellowship of Congregational churches, and were freed from the disciplinary authority that seems essential to the maintenance of intineracy. The United Church, however, will be so large numerically, and so varied in types of local churches that the proposals are likely to have a fair show. The proposals appear to make it somewhat easier for a minister to change his charge, than for a charge to change its minister. Perhaps this is as it ought to be. Churches, particularly in these modern days, under any system, have their own methods of getting rid of their pastors when they desire to do so.

The one thing that stands out from the proposals, and from the environment of the whole movement, in Canada, is the fact that apparently it is easier to effect union between any sort of different and opposites, than between old and new—the conservative reactionaries and the men of modern vision. This might be expected, and it is the crux of the church union problem in our land. The Baptists of Canada, numerically about one-sixth as strong as the three uniting bodies, have politely, but firmly, refused to participate in the negotiations, considering it "necessary to maintain a separate existence" and "to propagate their views throughout the world." When one considers that in England and America some of the most outstanding leaders in movements toward union are in the Baptist communion, this attitude is disappointing, but it is no doubt attributable to the dominant, and almost all-pervading, extreme conservatism of the Baptist body in Canada. That body has some very able men, and a strongly entrenched university, McMaster University, in Toronto, but the weight of influence is almost wholly on the side of conservative reaction.

Mr. Gilroy has said that there is not in Canada much ultra-liberal religious opinion of a type that is fairly common, and useful, over here. Unitarianism, for instance, is weak and uninfluential except in a very few urban centers, and the aggressively independent types of preachers and churches, which have had sporadic growth, but no small influence, in American cities, are almost unknown. English and Scotch influences have been powerful, and in the ministries of all three negotiating churches there will be found a large proportion of men of moderately liberal views and tendencies, men whose atmosphere is pretty much that of The British Weekly, and whose attitude in matters of biblical criticism is mainly that of the school represented by a critic like, say, Sir George Adam Smith. Though these critical tendencies have been probably sufficiently strong to repel the Baptists, they have not been so massed, or so extreme, as to put any great strain upon the Basis of Union. The achievement of the Congregationalists in securing the withdrawal of formal and explicit subscription to the doctrinal standards, and the establishing of the principle that the question of fitness for the ministry should be determined by the living church, apparently provided for all the liberty that any one desired.

A question that naturally arises is, whether the Canadian Basis of Union would provide all the liberty demanded by all whose proper place would be in any large and representative united American church. For instance, a movement is very quietly going on, with practical results in some places, for the healing of the breach between Congregationalist and Unitarian in the family quarrel of a century ago. How would such a movement fare under the Basis of Union? And would Congregationalists generally exchange the simple, broad, practical basis of fellowship upon which their National Council is now established for an elaborate statement of twenty articles, covering many speculative and disputable points? Would other bodies of free organization, such as the Disciples, Quakers and Baptists, accept as large a measure of mechanism, and denominational control, as the proposed United Church of Canada will undoubtedly have?

All such questions are probably futile and wide of the mark. Every such movement must create its own atmosphere, ways and methods. What is especially significant for us is the spirit in which the Canadian movement was initiated and carried on. From the first the desire was to find a basis of union, to seek common ground, and not to emphasize and expound differences. There was an atmosphere of mutual respect, confidence and brotherly love. Much is possible in such an atmosphere, and Mr. Gilroy is probably right in saying that the union would have been consummated long ago, if the whole rank and file of the membership of the three denominations could have been brought into the atmosphere that pervaded the meetings of the Joint Committee. With this general spirit of the movement must be equally stressed its general principle—the effort for synthesis, rather than compromise and elimination, the desire to build up a union out of the best things in all. It is significant also that Mr. Gilroy, who does not write by any means in the spirit of a passionate enthusiast to whom all is roseate, expresses it as his calm opinion that this practical, definite movement toward organic union has done more than anything else to break down the prejudices and to uproot the bigotries, without the removal of which, many would claim, no such movement could arise. It would almost appear that one great, effective way of removing difficulties is to go ahead as if they were not there.

Are the times not ripe for a great liberal movement of real “fundamentalism,” which shall center in fellowship and activity around the only fundamental thing that Jesus ever proclaimed—the love of God as the power able to save men, to restore harmony in a discordant world, and to purify human relationships? If professing Christians were half as much concerned about the salvation of the world as they profess to be, they would get together, even if they had to sacrifice a mass of metaphysical conceptions and theories of the plan of salvation. If they were dominated with the spirit of Christ who came “to seek and to save the lost,” they would find some means of fellowship, even if it were on no more elaborate basis than the conviction that “whatever saves men is gospel.” After all, would it be so strange if the church of the future should define the gospel, not in terms of metaphysics and theories, but according to its practical power, purpose and results?

Crisis

AMERICA, the shrine of pilgrim souls,
Beloved of all who value freedom's prize,
To you the whole world lifts its eager eyes,
And you today are goal of all earth's goals.
You did not spurn the cry of sister states,
Who long had battled with the fiends of night;
You took from them the flickering, failing light,
And held it forth, amid war's bloody fates.
Nor did it fall; more brightly shone its beams
As on the breeze the spangled blue unfurled;
Torch passed to torch, with still increasing gleams,
Till day blazed forth, and night was backward hurled.
America, the hope of human dreams,
May you not fail the need of all the world.

To Poetry

POETRY, return to earth;
Give the world a glad new birth.

Grant us power again to feel
In this age of stone and steel.

Free the fettered fount of joy;
Fret and foolish care destroy.

Lift for men the star of hope;
Let them not in darkness grope.

Slay the demons, Doubt and Fear,
Through thy angels, Trust and Cheer.

Keep in us thy vital breath,
Lest our souls partake of death.

Poetry, return to earth;
Bring the golden age to birth.

Church Union in Canada

(Second Article)

By William E. Gilroy

THE optimism with which one surveys any great practical movement toward church union will depend largely upon the standpoint from which one looks. From the standpoint of deliverance from narrow and exacting denominational standards and sectarian rivalries there may seem to be almost miraculous progress in a movement which to the extreme idealist appears to fall short of the ultimate essentials of full freedom of Christian fellowship and Christian catholicity. I have felt it my duty, in reviewing the church union movement in Canada and in interpreting it for American readers, to endeavor to survey it from both standpoints; though I am aware that in so doing I shall probably disappoint alike those who regard every such practical movement as the unfolding of, and progress towards, a great ideal of catholicity, and those who regard such movements as involving the weaknesses and dangers of compromise, and the sacrificing of the ultimate ideal of fellowship for immediate, but less worthy, ends. It has seemed to me that a truthful portrayal was to be found rather from this dual standpoint than from some middle-ground. The consciousness that my own convictions with regard to the large possibilities of Christian fellowship would appear to most of my friends nebulous, visionary and impractical, has led me to seek very carefully the appraisal, impersonally and impartially, of the Canadian movement as definitely practical and related to actual historic, ecclesiastical and organic conditions.

My intimate knowledge, from the associations of childhood and manhood, of all the facts underlying, and pertaining to, Canadian church life has enabled me, "visionary" as I am, to appreciate the full worth of the movement for church union in Canada, the sincere and progressive spirit that has inspired it, and what it has already accomplished for the dispersion of narrow sectarianism and for the enlarging and strengthening of the religious life of the dominion. I should not wish any suggested criticism, or deficiency, to detract in any way from the full force of this verdict. Back of it is my own personal memory of the utter cleavage of denominationalism no longer ago than my own boyhood. 'Predestination,' 'perseverance of saints,' 'falling from grace,' 'Christian perfection,' and many other elements that entered into the conflict between Calvinism and Arminianism, were not merely matters of academic interest and discussion; they were still occasions of controversy and bitterness in local communities, of complete separation between churches, and of barriers even between friends in business and social life.

PERSONAL EXPERIENCE

I was brought up in Methodist circles, by parents both of whom had formerly been Episcopalians, and among relatives who were of this latter communion. My father's most intimate friend was a devout Presbyterian doctor, who was habitually in our home; and other intimate friends were associated with other churches. My people were practical Christian people, with little interest in theology as such, so that the environment of my own life was not by any means as narrowing as it might have been. Yet I confess that the atmosphere of my early life so affected me that, even after a broadening development and an intervening twenty years of Congregationalism, I catch myself thinking of a Presbyterian who is warmly evangelical as being somehow outside his proper metier. I do not know that I was exactly taught it, but I came almost inevitably to think of the real Presbyterian as a rather cold person, very formal, precise and theological, and very apathetic, or even hostile, toward the revivalism that I associated with true faith and evangelical fervor. I mention these personal experiences only because they were typical, though not by any means typical of the worst. My home town was marked by the separations, but was comparatively free from the intense bitterness that characterized many communities. I remember, in the Methodist backwoods mission where I began my ministry, two old men, one revered and devout Methodist, and the other an eminently respectable Presbyterian, who attended my services as there was none of their own in that locality. These two men were going together in the work of township assessment, and, arguing upon predestination by the way, their contention became so sharp that one of them pushed the other into the ditch. I have forgotten whether the Calvinist, or the Arminian, was the aggressor.

THE BASIS OF UNION

Only as these backgrounds are fully appreciated can the full optimism and significance of the church union movement in Canada be grasped. It may be said that the inauguration of such a movement was itself an indication that the tide had turned, that the old narrowness was breaking down. Possibly that is true, but I express it as my candid judgment, after much opportunity of observation, that no one force has done so much for the uprooting of narrow sectarianism as this church union movement itself. I am sure that the movement has been even more a cause than an effect. That is a great fact of progress, no matter whether the "Proposed Basis of Union" be thought of as involving the attainment of a great ideal, or of a new denominational standard.

The divergence between the two viewpoints, of which I have spoken, becomes very evident when one examines the details of the "Proposed Basis of Union," as I have promised to do in this article. In doctrine, policy, and every other phase, the "Basis" involves the mixing and inter-mingling of elements, so far as I am aware, never before mixed, and in many instances heretofore thought of as mutually exclusive. The stickler for accuracy of theological thought, and precision of expression, and the carping critic who looks for contradictory and inconsis-

ent things, will find much to cavil at in the "Proposed Basis." I have never felt the need of an elaborate doctrinal statement, after the manner of ancient creeds and articles of religion, as part of a basis for modern union movements, and I was among those who rejoiced when, as I shall indicate, in the progress of negotiations, the doctrinal part of the "Proposed Basis" was relegated to a somewhat secondary place. But, if there must be such an elaborated doctrinal basis, the defects and inconsistencies in the Twenty Articles, which set forth the doctrine of the proposed United Church of Canada, constitute something of the glory of that document. For these defects and inconsistencies arise, so far as I can see, through the following of what I have already enunciated as the general principle underlying the "Basis of Union," viz, to avoid compromise by having each party to the union contribute its most distinctive elements, and to make the new basis inclusive rather than exclusive.

For instance, the articles setting forth such matters as "The Divine Purpose," and "The Grace of God," might have been thought of as involving an impossible compromise, or harmonization, of the Calvinistic and Arminian essentials. The creed-makers of the proposed united church have solved the difficulty by asserting both the Calvinistic and Arminian essentials, leaving the individual to make the reconciliation, or harmonization, for himself. While creed-making is somewhat out of my own line, I am disposed to regard the discovery of this method as little less than a profound stroke of genius, and, apart from the general example of a movement eminently sound, I believe it is probably the greatest suggestion, and contribution, that the Canadian movement offers to the ecclesiastical world. Let me cite the text of the articles to which I have referred and one or two other articles, which illustrate the same principle:

Article III. Of the Divine Purpose.—We believe that the eternal, wise, holy and loving purpose of God so embraces all events that while the freedom of man is not taken away, nor is God the author of sin, yet in His providence He makes all things work together in the fulfilment of His sovereign design and the manifestation of His glory.

Article IV. Of Creation and Providence.—We believe that God is the creator, upholder and governor of all things; that He is above all his works and in them all; and that He made man in His own image, meet for fellowship with Him, free and able to choose between good and evil, and responsible to his Maker and Lord.

Article VI. Of the Grace of God.—We believe that God, out of His great love for the world has given His only begotten Son to be the Saviour of sinners, and in the Gospel freely offers His all-sufficient salvation to all men. We believe also that God, in His own good pleasure, gave to His Son a people, an innumerable multitude, chosen in Christ unto holiness, service and salvation.

Could one imagine a more definite assertion of both the freedom of the human will and predestination; and of free grace and election?

AVOIDING DIFFICULTIES

In addition to this principle of inclusiveness, which is exemplified also in other articles, I think that the doctrinal section of the "Basis of Union" especially bears evidence of the effort to supplant theoretical elements and suppositions by practical statements, and also of the aim to avoid difficulties by statements somewhat general and not too explicit. For instance, I can find in the Articles no direct reference either to the Methodist doctrine of the possibility of "falling from grace," nor to the Presbyterian doctrine of the "perseverance of saints." Instead I find this excellent statement in Article XII, Of Sanctification.

We believe that those who are regenerated and justified grow in the likeness of Christ through fellowship with Him, the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, and obedience to the truth; that a holy life is the fruit and evidence of saving faith; and that the believer's hope of continuance in such a life is in the preserving grace of God.

As a concession, apparently, to the Methodist doctrine of Christian Perfection, there is added to the above Article:

And we believe that in this growth in grace Christians may attain that maturity and full assurance of faith whereby the love of God is made perfect in us.

An eminent Methodist seminary professor, and leader, who had been born and brought up in a Presbyterian manse, said to me a few years before the church union movement began that, though he still held the views that had led him to leave the Presbyterian church, if he were facing the issue at that later time he would not feel under the necessity of withdrawing. He felt that the times were more liberal, and that practical aspects of religion were of greater weight. He acknowledged that the old doctrinal statements lagged behind this practical progress, and expressed the need of revision, but he thought we were still so much in an age of transition that the time for such revision had hardly arrived. There are places in the "Proposed Basis" where the diversity and unsettlement of opinion seems to have led either to an old-fashioned statement, ignoring such things as evolution or critical thought, or to a statement manifestly intended to suggest that the matter is still open. I think I may cite as an instance of this,

We believe that our first parents, being tempted, chose evil, and so fell away from God and came under the power of sin, the penalty of which is eternal death; and that, by reason of this disobedience, all men are born with a sinful nature, that we have broken God's law and that no man can be saved but by His grace.

This is somewhat removed from the doctrine of "total depravity," but it seems even more remote from the oft-expressed notion that "the Fall was a fall upward."

Without examining all the Twenty Articles in detail, for which our space is hardly adequate, I think I may conclude this paragraph with the full text of Article XV, Of the Church. A movement exemplifying a great purpose toward Christian unity might be expected to enunciate a high ideal of the church. The Article, which nobly fulfils these expectations, is as follows:

We acknowledge one holy catholic Church, the innumerable company of saints of every age and nation, who being united by the Holy Spirit to Christ their Head are one body in Him and we have communion with their Lord and with one another. Further, we receive it as the will of Christ that His Church on earth should exist as a visible and sacred brotherhood, consisting of those who profess faith in Jesus Christ and obedience to Him, together with their children and other baptized children, and organized for the confession of His name, for the public worship of God, for the administration of the sacraments, for the upbuilding of the saints, and for the universal propaganda of the Gospel; and we acknowledge as a part, more or less pure, of this universal brotherhood, every particular Church throughout the world which professes this faith in Jesus Christ and obedience to Him as divine Lord and Saviour."

Would that include the Unitarians? I am not sure. It may not be perfectly inclusive, but it is evidently meant to be very comprehensive and as catholic as Christian experience.

TESTS AND SUBSCRIPTION

The task of the creed-makers for the "United Church" was greatly expedited by the fine spirit, and the keen desire to attain to an acceptable practical basis, displayed from the beginning. I think, however, that it was also rendered easier by the fact that the more liberal element were more concerned about the relation of the new creed to the church and the ministry, and about the terms of subscription, than about its actual contents. Many, I believe, regarded it as impossible, considering the time and situation, to produce a creed entirely satisfactory to all. They regarded any creed rather as a working basis, and were more concerned about establishing such terms of subscription as should enable any man of evangelical convictions to retain his place in the "United Church," without despite to his conscience or self-respect.

In the report of the sub-committee on the ministry, as first presented, the clause covering this matter of subscription was in the form of the following question, recommended to be asked all candidates for ordination to the ministry:

Do you believe the statement of doctrine of the united Church, as you understand it, to be agreeable to the teaching of the Holy Scriptures, and is your own personal faith in essential agreement therewith; and as a minister in this Church do you pledge adherence thereto?

The nature of the discussions on this matter of subscription is indicated in a brief addenda to this report, stating that the Methodist committee had expressed a desire that the words "as you understand it" should be eliminated from the above question.

When the matter, however, came before the Congregationalists in their Unions, during the following summer, in 1906, the Congregational Union of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick expressed the general desire for "a simpler and more liberal expression of doctrine than that now under consideration," while the more representative Congregational Union of Ontario and Quebec directly attacked the questions proposed to be asked regarding the doctrinal statement, and urged that these questions should "be so framed as to make the determination of a man's soundness in the faith rest as closely as possible with the living church." The Union also urged that "the most ample constitutional provision be made for welcoming and giving due consideration to any proposal for the revision of the standards of the church," "in order to the full recognition of the possibility of progress of thought, under the guidance of the Spirit of God."

The result of these representations was that the objectionable questions (as printed above) were entirely eliminated from the ordination service, and examination into soundness in the faith was made to rest "with the living church," though possibly not so freely as the Congregationalists intended. The provision now covering the matter lays the responsibility upon the "conference," and states that candidates shall be examined "on the Statement of Doctrine of the United Church, and shall, before ordination, satisfy the examining body that they are in essential agreement therewith, and that as ministers of the church they accept the statement as in substance agreeable to the teaching of the Holy Scriptures." The terms "essential agreement," and "in substance agreeable," were evidently intended to provide necessary latitude and to prevent the doctrinal standards becoming tyrannous through literalistic and narrow interpretation.

POLICY AND ADMINISTRATION

Matters of polity and administration present hardly the same general interest as the more universal elements of doctrine, and relation to creed, but a few of the salient points may be worth noting. The sub-committee on polity in its labors pursued also the general principle of inclusiveness, endeavoring to preserve in the United Church, the distinctive elements in each body which might make for efficiency in the new organization, and they worked from the first on the express conviction that "it is possible to provide for substantial local freedom, and at the same time secure the benefits of a strong connexional tie and co-operative efficiency."

In accordance with these general principles, the unit of organization in the United Church is to be the pastoral charge, and the governing bodies, or courts, higher than those of the pastoral charge, are to be known as: 1. the presbytery, 2. the conference, 3. the council. It will be seen that each of the negotiating bodies contributes a name, and the tendency toward more democratic practice, and toward the increase of the power of the laity, which has been evident for some time in both the Methodist and Presbyterian communions, is maintained in the provision for an equal number of ministerial and of non-ministerial members in each of these governing bodies of the United Church.

The assurance of an adequately trained ministry is effected in the "Basis of Union," by the strong recommendation that every candidate shall attain a B. A. degree, including Greek, to be followed by three years of theology; and by the express provision that the minimum requirement shall be two years preaching under the supervision of a presbytery, with appropriate studies, and four years of a mixed arts and theological course in college. Every candidate, no matter what his academic training, is required before ordination to spend twelve months in preaching and pastoral work. The Presbyterian standard has already been high, but the minimum requirement as above stated is much higher than that now in force in the Methodist church, and it involves a change from the free usage among Congregationalists.

The Methodist itinerant system, with its annual appointment of ministers by a stationing committee, and its four-year pastoral limit, gives way in the United Church to a pastoral relation without a time limit, but the Methodist principle "that every pastoral charge shall have, as far as possible, a pastorate without interruption, and that every effective minister shall have a pastoral charge" is specifically defined as the new policy. To carry out this policy a "settlement committee" is provided for, with wide powers, including the right of appointing ministers to pastoral charges, though the latter may extend calls, or invitations, and ministers themselves may seek appointments, or change of location, by appeal to the "settlement committee." If these proposals should some day actually solve the problem involved in pastorless churches and churchless pastors, we might find some means of removing a great reproach from religious life in the States.

A FREE NATIONAL CHURCH

In this, and in my previous article, I have been able to touch upon only a small part of the complete "Basis of Union." In my selection from the whole I have chosen not only the most salient things, but those which most clearly exemplified the general principle underlying the proposed union, and those which would be apt to arise, and involve the chief difficulty, in similar movements toward union here and elsewhere. I have had in mind always the question, which I know many leaders of religious life in the United States are asking: Does the church union movement in Canada afford any lessons, examples, and inspirations by which we may profit, and which suggest the advisability and practicality of a similar movement over here? Instead of directly answering that question, I have preferred to present the essential facts, and the answer can be found only in weighing them carefully. It may be said, of course, that the proposed union is as yet neither consummated, nor tried out in actual practice, but I am reasonably sure that the spirit that has characterized the movement thus far, and that carries it on to consummation, will be able to vindicate the plans and purposes in the actual maintenance and administration of the United Church.

The most pointed criticism that is apt to be offered is that the proposed United Church of Canada, so far as it is in advance of existing denominationalism and sectarianism, is itself after all only a bigger denomination. I feel hardly competent to discuss that criticism, but reaffirming my conviction that the movement has been indicative and causative of immense progress religiously in Canada, I wish also to express my assurance that it has been very close to the life and genius of the Canadian people, and that, once consummated, the "United Church" will become virtually, if not by right, a sort of great free, national church of the dominion. Does a great, free, national church, without state establishment, still leave place and value for non-conformity? Perhaps. But it is a great thing that Canadian people have caught the vision of such a church, and are on the way to realize their vision.

An Early Prophet of Today's Reform

By Kirby Page

"THEY are not ashamed to eat up the earnings of the poorest of the poor, without compensation or reward. They pilfer from their cooks; they rob their wash-women. Nay, they are not a whit better than mere cannibals! They virtually devour the human hearts on which they lay their rapacious hands."

No, these are not the words of Karl Marx or of Eugene Debs.

They come from an unexpected quarter.

This is only one of many striking utterances contained within the faded pages of a dust-laden book accidentally discovered during a recent ramble through some ancient works in the New York Public Library.

The author of this somber-colored volume responded to the name Green. Beriah was his given name—the Reverend Beriah Green. A photo engraving at the beginning of the book reveals a man with rugged countenance and piercing eyes—with a huge wart in the middle of the forehead and another on the left cheek. We are informed that he was Professor of Sacred Literature in Western Reserve College. The book was published in the year 1860. Its contents consist of sundry sermons preached by the Rev. Mr. Green covering a period of some thirty years, one of the most significant having been delivered in the year 1833.

These sermons have a strangely modern tone. Even the titles are up-to-date—"Work and Wages," "Personality and Property," "God and Humanity," "The Idea of Civil Government," etc. Certain ideas proclaimed in this book parallel in a striking way those set forth in volumes now appearing from the press. The paragraph quoted above is not the only one that might have been written by any one of a number of modern writers who are giving expression to their convictions concerning certain types of politicians and capitalists who prey upon the weak and oppressed.

MAJORITY OPPRESSED

The following words sound very much like a present day discussion of the possessive versus the constructive instinct: "A majority of the human family are almost everywhere subject to embarrassment and oppression. Their rights are ruthlessly invaded. Their very existence is often robbed of everything attractive or significant. And yet they constitute a majority! Their oppressors are few and weak and foolish. Why then do they not break away from the grasp in which they are held, and assert their own dignity and vindicate their own rights? Why? Because the multitude, in estimating themselves and others, apply a false standard. With them, the dignity of man consists rather in the capacity of eating than in the power of working! Into the divinity of work, they have never seen. Far enough from that. They despise work as mere drudgery. Show them one who, while he does nothing, eats much, and their admiration is at once kindled. He is their man! . . . While the multitude in this and other countries continues to give its countenance and support to such Do-nothing-eat-alls, what else can it expect and deserve than embarrassment and oppression and misery?"

The following paragraph might easily have been written by a modern writer in discussing the commodity theory of human labor: "An attempt on a broad scale has been made in this republic to legalize a deliberate gross and wanton assault upon the objects which the constitution holds up to our veneration and confidence. The inalienable rights of our common nature have been ruthlessly assaulted. Millions of human beings, unstained with crime, without accusation and without suspicion, have been subjected to inflictions too heavy and crushing to be employed in restraining and punishing the most audacious and reckless criminal. A bold and stout attempt has been made to reduce them to property as such, and in the language of legislation, they have been thus described. They bear the name of slaves." (The term used is wage-slave) . . . "Slaves may not only be unruly as chattels, but commit crimes as persons. Thus they pass from one extreme to the other—swinging at the mercy of the oppressor back and forth without end—without intermission—back and forth from personality to property—and property to personality."

THE CREDIT SYSTEM

The following sentence might easily have been taken verbatim from the writings of one of the National Guildsmen or from the New Age: "What a hot-bed have we in the credit-system, where villainy of all sorts and sizes flourishes!"

In these days when the churches are being assured that the principles of Jesus are impracticable in the realm of industry, and are being urged, in the words of a prominent judge, "to stick to their Bible" and keep out of politics and industry; when the magazine "Industry" devotes many pages in admonishing certain church leaders for taking an active part in the industrial struggle; when the National Association of Manufacturers refers deprecatingly to the fact that the church "invades industry"; and when the National Civic Federation labels "Red" or "Rad" any minister expressing other than conservative economic views and warns the public against his deadly influence—at such a time, it is interesting indeed to read the following words written by a theological professor nearly a century ago:

"May you give countenance to arrangements, which force one to work without eating, and enable another to eat without working? which go to make the rich still richer, and the poor still poorer? May you do such things with the consent of the Gospel, and be, notwithstanding, a true disciple of the Carpenter of Nazareth? Surely not. The Gospel spreads its authority over the whole field of political economy. . . The Gospel comprehends in its doctrine and demands and arrangements, all human interests; and he is unworthy of the name Christian, who would reduce the limits within which its influence is to be exerted.

A FALSE GOSPEL

"The accusers allege that the gospel takes society as it finds it, whatever may be its character, and adapts itself to its usages and arrangements. These may be in the highest degree absurd and mischievous. The rich may devour the poor; the strong may trample on the weak. Rights may be invaded; injuries inflicted; hearts may be bruised. No matter. The gospel, we are told, has not a word to say against any such abomination, provided it may have entered into the organization of society. It is too busy in saving the souls of men to have an eye to see, or a heart to loathe, or a hand to abolish the wrongs which society may inflict upon them. They may be crippled and crushed, robbed and polluted, may be exposed to manifold temptations and driven to desperation; the gospel has no word to utter on their behalf if in these things they are victims of society!

"And is this the gospel which Jesus Christ proclaimed? Never. The thought is full of blasphemy. He demands, with a kingly voice demands, a radical revolution in human society, as it is generally maintained. Its designs and arrangements and spirit—all are in the harshest collision with the objects and methods which he enjoins. Justice, Mercy, Fidelity, these with him are the end of our existence, as truly in society as elsewhere. Whatever is inconsistent with these, the Gospel peremptorily and strongly condemns. In every Society which, directly or indirectly, sets Justice, Mercy and Fidelity at naught, the Gospel demands a radical revolution. And a radical revolution it will certainly effect." (The author here uses the word revolution in the sense of fundamental change, not in that of violence or bloodshed).

"Justice, philanthropy, magnanimity, are in bad odor amidst the practical arrangements of life; what can be effected by asserting their authority and insisting on their claims? Thus men allow themselves to talk—thus absurdly and wickedly. For all history proves clearly and certainly, that in the sphere of politics, as elsewhere, all other methods are impracticable.

A SOCIAL PROPHET

"Let the reformer look far above these petty views of expediency, which superficial thinkers so boldly propose, so stoutly maintain. . . Apply, I would say, faithfully apply the standard which he has set up, in detecting and exposing the moral evils which you are anxious to remove. . . Upon the understandings, consciences and hearts of wicked men, pour the piercing light of heavenly truth. Hold before their faces the record of their crimes. Urge upon them the hateful nature and damning tendency of their cherished sins, till their understanding shall condemn them, and their consciences upbraid them, and their hearts sicken within them. Cherish, moreover, a deep and lively confidence in the promise of God."

Such solitary figures as Beriah Green, and others like Washington Gladden and Walter Rauschenbusch who followed, help to explain why the spark of vital social Christianity has never died out in the churches and today is being fanned into a flame that is destined to sweep away much that is heartless and oppressive in our present industrial system.

All honor to the memory of Beriah Green!

British Labor and Utopia

THE great manifesto on the new social order issued by the British labor movement at the close of the war was one of the most encouraging signs of those times when men still believed they were to have a new world as a reaction from the horrible debacle brought on by the old. Woodrow Wilson had charted a new era for the peace of mankind and Lloyd George had declared he was going to Paris to help bring in the kingdom of heaven. We really believed, with General Smuts, that humanity had struck its tents and was once more on the march and it seemed as if British labor had actually drawn up a charter for the new social order.

But now our glorious sun is under clouds. We got the wicked peace of Versailles instead of the league of peoples, and there is gathering today at Paris a Supreme Council of Allied Premiers instead of the Supreme Council of the League of Nations. With them will sit the ambassador of our country to England, whose cynical and insulting words regarding the motives that led his countrymen to fight make him a sinister representative of that malevolent spirit which today unfortunately seems to dominate the world, just as Woodrow Wilson represented that benign and prophetic hope which sprang from the sacrifices of the battlefield.

Utopia in British Labor

When one gets down to concrete realities in the rank and file of British labor, one does not find a great deal of Utopia. There is day dreaming of a new and better world among the leaders; but in the rank and file there is just about the same lack of interest in anything beyond material gains as one finds in the rest of the money-mongering world. This morning The Times prints articles on the wickedness of taxing the great landlords, inspired by the Duke of Portland's pathetic announcement some days ago that he might have to give up living at the magnificent and ancient family seat. With them is a picture of his great abbey and villa and the declaration that "someone must own the land." In parliament we have the grim defeat, one by one, of every promise of social reform made during the war, from housing for the crowded city areas to drink reform. The word "reform" is applied instead to bills intended to increase the number of hours the public houses (saloons) may be open, and to decrease the excess profits tax. The leaders of labor are not "hard faced men who made money out of the war," as the personnel of this parliament has been so aptly described, but they are leading great masses of men multitudes of whom accept this post-war spirit as inevitable, who never think beyond bread and beer, and care as little for Utopia as do the hard faced profiteers.

Their first act after the war, when Lloyd George went to the country with his promise to hang the Kaiser and pave British commercial highways with German gold, was to turn down such lofty souls as Ramsay MacDonald and Philip Snowden and even to defeat their old war horse, Arthur Henderson, sending up to parliament, instead of such men, a group of district union leaders whose chief ability was that of organizing workmen and keeping the barbed wire of organizational bickerings running through their hands. The surrender of the party of the Grand Old Man to the wiles of the Little Welsh Wizard and his coalition of five parts Tory and one part Liberal, left them as the opposition without a leader and a bunch of provincials whom no one could lead. Here was the back-wash of war over the shores of Utopia.

The Labor Party and the Labor Unions

We must not confuse the labor party with the labor unions. True, the rank and file of the party come from the unions, but they are two entirely different organizations. In the party are large numbers of intellectuals and forward-looking men and women who are not wage earners, while in the unions there are still great numbers who cling to the party shibboleths of their fathers and vote the ticket of their employers, whatever that may be. "I never believed in opposing the hand that feeds me," said one of these serf-souled "subjects" to us the other day. It was the intellectuals of the labor movement together with a group of great hearted men who have toiled their way up from the lowly ranks of labor through non-conformist chapels and union organizations, whose formulation of economic and industrial reconstruction seemed to chart a Utopia for the new social order.

There are three great organizations here in England in which labor operates: the party, the unions and the cooperatives. Some laborites are in all of them and some are in only one of them. When all the voters in all three of them get together at an election, there will be a labor government. That will happen sooner or later, but for the present the unions are more concerned about the hours and wages in their industry than about Utopia. The cooperatives are more concerned about prices in their little town than about the great ideal commonwealth. And the politicians in provincial communities are more anxious to get a seat in parliament than to chart a great future for the British people. Meanwhile, the great bankers and land-owners, the big businesses and profiteers know just what they want and will trade with one another and with brewers or bishops to get it—and the "pubs" are filled with men and women. "Prohibition would help the labor movement more than any other one thing," said one of Oxford's best known economists to us, "for intoxicants are benumbers of minds and souls." But there is not much prohibition sentiment in the labor movement outside Scotland, it seems.

This picture may be disillusioning. Things look differently across the sea from what they do in the midst of the scene itself. Three years ago we Americans read the reconstruction document with enthusiasm and hope. Our observations at first hand have not killed our hope, but they have substituted patience for enthusiasm. The wisest minds tell us labor cannot win in the next election, and they say frankly it would probably be disastrous if it did. It must mature a leadership, kill off provincialism and win to its ranks that left wing of Gladstonian liberalism which gave Britain her great reform measures during the past half-century. Lloyd George had the chance to assume the leadership of that liberalism and by losing one election give England a coalition of liberals and labor which would put her at the forefront of industrial commonwealths.

Is There Hope of Utopia?

Labor will never rule in this country as a pure class government, as Tory aristocracy has so often done, but today great minds in the universities and pulpits, bishops of the new and better kind, and even employers of the enlightened type are joining the labor movement as the only hope of liberalism and progress. If labor is willing to welcome such reinforcements and work for all the people and not narrowly for themselves against all the others, it will win in the election after the next, or at least within ten or fifteen years.

What will such a government do? That would be a mere guess. It will never do as Russian labor has done. Englishmen are not built that way. Besides, a labor government here will represent the will of a majority and not as in Russia, the dictatorship of a minority. "The first thing we would do," said J. H. Thomas, leader of the great railway union, "would be to disappoint a part of the rank and file." That is, there would be no revolutionary innovations. "There need be no fear of a labor government," said Lord Robert Cecil, adding that he thought it inevitable and rather to be welcomed. It will do, no doubt, about what its best minds advise, and its best minds know history and sociology very well. They will chart the future in the light of these two lamps and they will do it for all the people and not for a class. Lloyd George's great pre-war speeches might well furnish them with shibboleths: The land for the people; Arousing is more important than battleships; Education before imperialism; Less for the few and more for the many; The control of drink—England's greatest enemy.

There is hope in patience and evolutionary processes, but more in violent and cataclysmic revolution. First the aristocracy wrested the magna charta from the king and gave England a house of lords. Then the burghers gained the house of commons, which from Cromwell to Gladstone wrought its way into power until at last it denatured the lords, depriving them even of the right of veto as it had done to the king. But commoner then meant property holder. Now the toiling wage-earning millions vote, and though they still sweat in "working class quarters" and are largely deprived of schooling for their children beyond twelve years of age, and although "burgher" England still owns the means of livelihood, the workers now bargain for their wage, and with the help of real liberals will tomorrow enthrone the entire democracy with a liberal-labor government—a government liberal in a political sense and not labor in a class proletarian sense. Labor in Britain may today be stupid in rank and file, but the leaven of idealism is there as nowhere else in our Anglo-Saxon civilization, and the rank and file will ere long vote for those great-hearts who today work for their redemption through education, sobriety, and the possession of a larger measure of the world's goods and good things.

British Table Talk

Modern Churchmen's Difficulties

London, August, 1921.

THE outstanding feature of the eighth Conference of Modern Churchmen at Cambridge in August was an outspoken speech by Dr. Foakes-Jackson, joint author with Bishop Kirsopp Lake of "The Beginnings of Christianity." First, he accused the Lambeth Conference, while inviting Christians to unite on the basis of the Nicene Creed, of evading the issues it raises. "No one," he said, "could fail to notice how carefully last year the official leaders of the church abstained from raising the question of the fundamentals of our religion. Apparently they were contented with a formal acceptance of a dogmatic statement almost incomprehensible to those unacquainted with the theological terminology of a remote past, and to which it was practically impossible for a man living today to give assent. The bishops offered no solution of the difficulties which confronted many people." Then, turning to his immediate audience Dr. Jackson said the liberals of the church of England were fighting a hard fight. They were losing the support of the public because, as a consequence of the prevalent apathy there was little demand for a reasonable presentation of Christianity. Liberal churchmanship was in danger of becoming the Canute of the age. It had too long endeavored to sit on its throne and tell the advancing tide where to stop. He had tried to do this himself. "We hoped we could accept the criticism of the Old Testament," Dr. Jackson continued, "and reconstruct the history of Israel and yet leave the New Testament untouched. We tried to expunge the miracle of the virgin birth from the creed, and at the same time to accept the rest. We tried to sacrifice the fourth gospel, and at the same time not to question the historicity of the Marcan tradition. We are always wondering where to draw the line. Our efforts are doomed to failure. In no field of human activity has it been possible to follow truth to a certain spot and there stop; for whenever men do this, truth advances and is lost to them; and this is pre-eminently true of theology. Christianity can never survive among the educated—and that means at no distant date among mankind—unless we face them and prefer truth to all other considerations." Among those who took part in the Conference were Professor Percy Gardner, who, without proposing like the Dean of St. Paul's to "drop the three creeds," thinks that the Te Deum "might be suggested as an alternative;" Canon Bindley, who thinks creeds "neither necessary nor desirable;" Dean Rashdall, Professor Bethune Baker, and Dr. Cyril Norwood, who favor a simpler creed; and the Rev. C. W. Emmet, vice-principal of Ripon Hall, Oxford, who holds that "A creed should not be regarded as a 'test,' which must be accepted by individuals, whether laity or clergy, as a condition of membership or office, but as the general standard of the church's teachings. It should not," he says, "be the fence which must be surmounted in order to enter in the fold, but the goal towards which we work."

A Foreign Mission's Problem

One of our great missionary societies has been called upon to pronounce on a question that is of importance to all workers among non-Christian peoples. Certain of the responsible agents of the London Missionary Society in Bangalore prepared a hymn and prayer book for the use of Indian students who have not accepted Christianity, and deliberately omitted any appeal to the name of Christ. Great hymns and ancient prayers are included, but none of them with distinctive Christian theology. The object is to lead Hindu and Mohammedan students to the practice of prayer to God the Creator and Father, in the hope that in this way they will make religious progress and be brought nearer to Christ. A few leading missionaries of other societies have adopted this practice with the same aim. The L. M. S. Board had to consider whether the method in question could be approved by a Society avowedly and sincerely evangelical. The society's India sub-committee, after carefully studying the devotional books used at the opening services of the two Bangalore high schools, came to the conclusion that "there is no occasion for the interference of the board with the liberty of method in evangelism which has always been recognized in the L. M. S., so long as the ultimate aim of that evangelism, the bringing of men and women to Christ, is fully kept in view." The committee recognized the intention of the compilers to use the form of daily prayer as a means of bringing non-Christian students to a knowledge of Christ, but expressed the opinion that to each of the books of prayers should be added a section containing prayers specially intended for the use of Christian students in high schools and hostels, or of students who are approaching the Christian position. At two sessions the L. M. S. board very earnestly discussed the issue raised. A highly-esteemed lady moved a resolution in definite opposition to the committee's point of view, and it met with some support. Dr. Horton and others, however, spoke strongly in favor of the committee's resolution on the basis of their experience of work being done in and through Christian schools in India. The predominant feeling was that liberty should be extended to the authors of "this experimental method in missionary service," and by a majority of more than seven to one the resolution of the committee was finally adopted. In reporting and commenting on the proceedings, which were marked throughout by Christian courtesy and grace, the official organ remarks that "In a society such as the L. M. S. which by its very catholicity comprises men and women of different points of view, bound together simply by their common motives of desiring to serve Christ and lead men and women to him, divergences of opinion about methods are inevitable," and testifies that

"throughout the proceedings of the board there was evident the unchanged loyalty of the directors of the society to the evangelical declaration of the founders, namely, that the society existed 'to preach the glorious gospel of the blessed God' to the heathen world."

Spanking the Dean of St. Paul's

Dean Inge is being severely taken to task for certain of his public utterances. He recently said, "The labor leader has become a wealthy and powerful person, and no one knows how great his unavowed and unavowable sources of emolument may be." The suggestion of course is that labor leaders are financed by enemies of Britain. Challenged, the dean refused either to substantiate or retract his allegations. Of the recent meeting, in which members of practically all denominations united, to emphasize the social message of the gospel, he wrote: "A batch of episcopal busybodies must needs organize a socialist demonstration in Hyde Park, and endeavor to excite the populace by heady and inflammatory harrangues." Dr. Inge has also been speaking in such strong terms about the church and the clergy that Canon Anthony Deane has publicly rebuked him for his "intemperate language," his "wild exaggeration," his "lack of charity," and asks how the temper of his utterances can be reconciled with the temper of the gospels. He warns him of the bad effect on the average man when he "sees the Dean of St. Paul's, who draws a very substantial income from the church in return for duties that are not onerous, using his position and his leisure to disparage, with acrid ill-temper, the church and his less fortunate brother clergy." Admitting that it might be desirable to raise the intellectual standard required of ordination candidates, Canon Deane characterizes as "wild nonsense" Dr. Inge's assertion that "in many dioceses the intellectual standard is so low that the most illiterate candidate need not fear rejection." Against his declaration that the church of England "has been steadily losing ground for the last hundred years" his critic appeals to history: "In 1800 there was just one celebration of holy communion in Dr. Inge's cathedral on Easter Day, and the total number of communicants was six. Clerical pluralities were the rule. Drunkenness was considered a venial fault in the clergy. The cathedrals and many of the parish churches were dusty ruins. Services were conducted with a lack of reverence almost unimaginable to us." In the kindest spirit, Canon Deane gives the following advice to his fellow dignitary (whose chronic ill-health may explain some of his outbursts): "Drop this unhappy pose which you have taken up of late years. It may amuse some, it pains many, it helps none. It is quite unworthy of you and of your calling. A man of your gifts has no excuse for playing to the gallery. In private life you are kind, sympathetic, genial. Why figure in public as a soured misanthrope? You should be loyal to your brother clergy. Instead of attacking them and belittling their work, learn what they and their work really are. Go and stay for a time in the clergy house of some well-worked parish in east or south London. And bring to them, and to all whom your voice or pen can reach, a message of sympathy, kindness, encouragement, love. That is what they need; clever epigrams and jibes are useless. So you will take your position, to which your fine gifts fully entitle you, as a real power in the church. You may have less place in the newspapers; you will have far more in the hearts of men." If only Dr. Inge would hear such counsel and act upon it!

Dr. Clifford's Protest

It is a very remarkable fact that today in Britain Dr. John Clifford at eighty-five is at once the most influential free church leader and the foremost champion of religious liberty. For more than sixty years he has neither abated in spiritual zeal nor wavered in his advocacy and defence of the fundamental principles of non-conformity. He is now making vigorous protest against the act of parliament facilitating the union of Scotland's two great Presbyterian churches. The desire for Christian unity and for organized union is good, he says, but its value depends upon how we get it, what price we pay for it, and to what uses it is put. "Here is the fatal blot on this bill. Its real effect is not on the front of it. Its aim is to secure for the established church of Scotland the spiritual independence the United Free church enjoys but to escape disestablishment. It is still to be the favored child of the state, with state prestige, and state endowments, though nothing is said about them at the moment, are to be for the exclusive enjoyment of the two churches made one. The state connection is to be maintained. The state is to continue the violation of the law of religious equality. Anglican Episcopalians are outside the favors of the state in Scotland, though in England they are the recipients of special parliamentary favors. The state is to continue, and that on a larger scale, its unjust discrimination against Wesleyans and Congregationalists, Romanists and Baptists, and others who voice a different creed and adopt another polity. It is against the continuance of that wrong by the state of which we are members that we enter our decided protest." As the result of inquiries Dr. Clifford asserts that there is no popular demand for the bill outside the two churches concerned; that whilst the established church is keen and assiduous in support of the measure, the United Free church is not without misgivings; that those misgivings have been increased by the grave situation revealed in the course of the debates; that if the whole scheme is carried out and the property of the people is handed over to the two churches as one state church, secession, if not of churches, yet of individuals will follow; should the bill become law it will seriously aggravate the difficulties of Englishmen in seeking freedom from the entangling and injurious alliance of the Anglican church with parliament; and that the bill is obviously antagonistic to the trend of modern judgment and experience as to the just relation of states to Christian communities; and experience shows that independence and unity, together with spiritual efficiency, are secured where the state holds a position of complete neutrality towards all Christian churches. "The American republic," this old man valiantly concludes, "is a sufficient evidence that such neutrality does not exclude full and repeated recognition of the sovereignty of God in and over this kingdom of this world." It is significant of the changed attitude towards the principle of the state-establishment of churches that Dr. Clifford stands almost alone in his protest.

RELIGION AMONG AMERICAN MEN

A GREAT cross section of American life —this our army in the World War has surely been. What it has shown of the real religious life of American men, and the vital lessons which the church should learn from it, are presented in this, the first of the studies made by the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook. Every minister who wishes to know the heart of the average American man—and especially the young man—should read this significant volume. Cloth, $2.00.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Village and the Double Barrelled Profession

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have read with a great deal of interest the article, "A Double-Barrelled Profession," by Burris Jenkins in the September 8 issue of The Christian Century. In our village there is a Presbyterian minister who served one church twenty-five years and during twenty of those years edited and published a weekly newspaper. If a city newspaper can exert a great influence in a community, a village newspaper can move mountains. It is read by everyone, there is no competition that will dictate a policy and it can, therefore, be the greatest asset in the community. An article showing its possibilities for influence would throw a great deal of light on the so-called "rural problem." Young men hesitating about entering the ministry can find here a place of service worthy of their best effort. The Christian Century would be one of the journals to show them this great opportunity.

Mr. Sherwood Eddy's Party in England

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Since landing in England we have listened to an astonishing array of speakers on social and industrial problems. The plan usually followed has been for the speaker to address our party at Toynbee Hall for forty-five minutes or an hour and then permit us to ask questions for another hour. You may well believe that we are having an exceedingly profitable time.

Thus far the following persons have addressed us: R. H. Tawney, the well-known author of "The Acquisitive Society;" Arthur Henderson, member of Parliament and secretary of the Labor Party; J. R. Clynes, leader of the Labor Party in Parliament; Lord Robert Cecil, who next to President Wilson probably had most to do with the formation of the League of Nations; Sidney Webb, authority on trade unions; Seebohm Rowntree, employer and sociological investigator; Harold Laski, professor in the London School of Economics; P. J. Pybus, Managing Director of the English Electric Co.; G. D. H. Cole, author; Ramsay MacDonald, author and former M. P.; Arthur Greenwood, authority on workers' education; W. E. Orchard, one of the leading ministers of England; A. E. Garvie, president of New College; J. H. Thomas, member of Parliament and head of the National Union of Railwaymen; Hugh Dalton, professor in the London School of Economics; George Lansbury, editor of the Daily Herald; Bishop Temple, of Manchester; J. J. Mallon, Warden of Toynbee Hall; Archibald Ramage, of the League of Faith and Labor; Major Douglas, author; George Dallas, authority on rural problems; Margaret Bondfield, a sort of Jane Addams of England; Tom Shaw, member of Parliament; Henry Clay, professor in the London School of Economics; Philip Snowden, author; Fred Bramley, of the Trade Union Congress; Ben Spoor, member of Parliament; Philip Kerr, private secretary to Lloyd George for four years; Professor J. A. Hobson; Malcolm Sparks, of the Builders' Guild.

Lady Astor honored our party with a special reception at her home, where we met a number of important personages. Mr. Arthur Henderson and Mr. J. R. Clynes invited us to tea on the terrace of the House of Parliament. Lord Robert Cecil invited us to the League of Nations Union House, where he addressed us. We have visited the Labor College and other points of interest.

This morning our party was addressed by U. S. Senator France, who is just returning from a visit to Soviet Russia. His address was exceedingly illuminating and thought provoking. He requested us to regard what he said as confidential until after his return to America. We were very favorably impressed with his spirit and message.

So much has been crowded into our stay here that one feels almost dizzy. And yet, certain definite conclusions seem to be forming in my mind, which may possibly be of interest.

(1) England is facing enormous economic difficulties as a result of the war and trade depression. We are told that there is greater unemployment this year than at any time since 1843. Many industries are practically at a standstill. Mr. Pybus, who in his own and subsidiary companies employs 120,000 men, expressed the fear that the standard of life of the average workman would soon fall below the standard of 1914. Every speaker agreed that the old industrial system is failing to function and that drastic changes must be made within the near future.

(2) Organized labor is very strong here. Collective bargaining and the right to organize are taken for granted. An Open Shop Drive to weaken or kill off the unions would be impossible here. Mr. Rowntree said very frankly that he greatly preferred to deal with the union rather than with the individual workman, and his view is shared by the majority of employers here.

(3) There is a decided tendency in labor circles to turn away from direct economic action to political action as the means of achieving social ends. There are now 70 Labor members of Parliament, which makes the Labor Party the second largest political party. Mr. Lloyd George said recently that a change of only four per cent in the vote would put the Labor Party in power. It is freely predicted that England will have a Labor Government within ten years. The Labor Party is composed of workers by brain as well as by hand.

(4) We have been greatly impressed by the high quality of leadership in the Labor Party. Especially have we been impressed with their idealism, fairness and frank recognition of their weakness and their total lack of bitterness.

(5) Almost every speaker has emphasized the importance of international affairs. We have had presentations of conditions in Russia, Central Europe, India and Ireland. All of the speakers have agreed that no solution of industrial problems is possible apart from the solution of international problems. The anti-war sentiment is exceedingly strong and several speakers have expressed the opinion that it would be impossible to get British workmen to go to war on any pretext.

(6) Not a single speaker has advocated violence as the means of bringing about the new social order. All are agreed that the method must be that of evolution. There is a total lack of dependence upon suppression as the way out. These people are out after drastic and fundamental changes in the spirit and structure of society, but they are using the method of discussion and experimentation.

Most of our party are leaving tonight for the Continent where we expect to visit Belgium, Holland, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Italy, Switzerland and France. I hope to write you about this trip later. We expect to return to England in time for the important Trades Union Congress at Cardiff early in September.

Experiences of a Church Tramp

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The writer's circumstances render him temporarily a church tramp. Finding himself on a Sunday now in one city and now in another, he looks about for a place to worship; and by now he is prepared each week to make a choice between different kinds of dissatisfaction.

Because he was brought up on good sermons, he usually seeks out in the morning some church where this is the specialty. But for the good sermon he usually pays a price of dissatisfaction. First of all, the place is designed frankly as an auditorium, not a shrine. Central before his gaze is the row of organ pipes and a choir loft, and in front of this a platform with a reading desk. Then the service is at worst undignified, and at best informal. Everything but the Scripture reading is in the words, more or less suitable, of the minister in charge. There is little that is historic, classic, or of more than a temporary application. Where an attempt has been made to beautify the service, the only result, usually, is to turn the service into a concert. Before the service begins, most of the congregation are engaged in quiet conversation. To be sure, why not? They have come to hear something, and while nothing is as yet going on, why not talk, as in a theatre? So, edified by the sermon, but discontented with the effort to worship in an auditorium, the church tramp emerges.

Still seeking a place where he may worship, he goes where this is the specialty. He goes to choral evensong in some Episcopal church and at first feels that his search has been rewarded. This place is not an auditorium, but a house of prayer. Its central object is not a choir loft and platform, but an altar and a cross. As one enters, one feels a hush of reverence. It is natural, and expected, that one shall kneel in prayer. The service is not in the trifling words of today's minister, but in noble, ancient words, which have endeared themselves to the hearts of generations. The music is not a concert, though there is an anthem, but for the most part a simple and worthy setting for the ritual. As the churchgoer hears the rise and fall of voices chanting ancient prayers, he is transported out of today, he forgets the individual personality of clergyman and singers, and feels himself one with the great company of the believers of the ages.

But again, he pays a price. He is lucky if the sermon is worth hearing. And the service itself produces its effect best if he does not attend too closely to it. The actual words of the liturgy are full of things he does not believe. They express an outlook which no modern man holds, and so again he is but partly satisfied. No liturgy composed in the sixteenth century is fit to be used without modification and in its entirety for the religious needs of a man today. One waits expectantly for certain choice portions of the service where he can join in whole-heartedly.

So the church tramp feels he has just ground for complaint. Why must he choose between the sermon and the shrine? Why, in order to be uplifted by what he calls worship, must he seek it from one of the most inflexible of denominations? (Many of course ask no other edification than gospel hymns and the glad hand. Such will not know what ails the church tramp.) Why should not our free churches develop a worship that might compare for beauty and dignity with that of the prayer book, and yet one in which a modern man could heartily join? Nay, more, (for it is our auditoriums that give the chief offense), why should not our Protestant churches replace their choir-lofts and platforms with a chancel-sanctuary,—yes, with an altar and cross and candles, as symbols of worship?

BOOKS

ANCIENT MAN. By Hendrik Willem Van Loon. Dr. Van Loon has two boys, one of them eight and the other twelve, and it seems that he is on terms of pretty good comradeship with both of them. So, when he began to write a series of children's histories, he wrote for his two youngsters, with the result that his first book is a child's history such as has never been seen before. It is written not for "children," but for "kids." Its language is a live, everyday kind such as one hears from almost any boy, and for that reason it will interest the people for whom it is intended. "Ancient Man" begins with prehistoric times, even before the last great ice age. It traces the rise of civilization, the history of Egypt, of Mesopotamia and Assyria and Babylon. Other chapters give the story of Jerusalem, the great trading excursions of the Phoenicians, the spread of knowledge, and finally the end of the ancient world. The chapters are short, but tell about all the readers want to know about the particular subjects treated. They are illustrated by numerous diagram maps, black and white drawings, and color plates, all done by Van Loon. In their way, these pictures are quite as remarkable as the text. Instead of being illustrations of the time-honored children's book sort they are first-rate examples of impressionistic art. Their striking color combinations, heavy, rough lines, and general indefiniteness suggest rather than depict. They, like the text, call for imagination and constructive thought on the part of the children who read the book.

THE PARENT AND THE CHILD. By H. F. Cope. A "case book," with a wide range of parental problems clearly set forth and analyzed. Valuable for teachers, as well as mothers and fathers. (Doran. $1.50).

CHILDREN BY CHANCE OR BY CHOICE

Will chance ever be cast out of the highest function of human beings, or must children continue to come into the world haphazard? Which will grow up to be better American citizens? Which would you rather have in your family: Children unlooked for, unprepared for, even unwanted; or, children watched for, hoped for, even prayed for? These are the questions considered in CHILDREN BY CHANCE OR BY CHOICE.

The book is written by WILLIAM HAWLEY SMITH, the well known author of THE EVOLUTION OF DODD, ALL THE CHILDREN OF ALL THE PEOPLE, etc.

HAVELOCK ELLIS, the highest authority in all the world on this most vital and delicate of human problems, says: "I have read CHILDREN BY CHANCE OR BY CHOICE with great sympathy. The argument is so reasonable and so persuasive that I should like to see the book placed in the hands of all who have not yet thought about this most fundamental question, or who are still the victims of prejudice regarding it."

Another reviewer says: "The book has a decidedly religious trend, and it is thoroughly Christian in spirit."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

A New Ananias Club*

WE are allowed certain liberties when we come to the review, so we will go back to the lesson of July 17 and very profitably consider a man whom I was reluctant not to consider as we passed along, Ananias. Usually, when we come across that name, Ananias, we think of Sapphira's husband, the liar. We think of Roosevelt's famous club, composed of the liars whom he nominated for membership. Some way or other, this Ananias of Acts 9:10ff always leaves a wholesome impression. Only a few words are written about him but they sketch the picture of a warm-hearted, brave and most Christian man. What did he do? When Paul, under deep conviction, had been brought into Damascus, some disciple had to be found who could go to him, sympathize with him, teach him and lead him clear into the fellowship of The Way. Ananias was the man first thought of to do this important work—he was what we call a Personal Worker. Andrew could do this work—he could win people to Jesus; Barnabas had this excellent ability, he could bring people to accept his Master and here is Ananias who had the distinguished honor of baptizing Paul and guiding him into a clear relationship to the newly formed church or fellowship. The formation of such a club would be a blessing to any church. Every wide-awake minister has a list of prospects. This list is composed of the names of new families that have moved into the community and who have attended the church, the names of people who have moved into the vicinity and someone has written a letter informing about them, the names of members of the communion whose letters have not yet been presented, the names of Sunday school scholars who are old enough to enter the church, the names of strangers who have dropped in more or less frequently to the services. It is quite out of the question for the minister to call upon all of these people. He must have help and here is where Ananias comes to the fore. The pastor of one of our eastern churches showed me a list of one hundred and fifty such names. With the help of his organized and inspired personal workers he has since received seventy-five of these into the church. A group of men and women were selected who could and would call upon these prospects and definitely and earnestly talk to them about confessing Christ or joining the church. Today the church rejoices in the results. This ability should be recognized and highly honored. Those who qualify as personal workers should be given a place ranking with the most generous givers and the strongest leaders. Greater than a singer, greater than the talker is the winner of men. The church should cultivate and appreciate such workers and should keep them constantly employed. It is a talent of the noblest distinction. Here is one who can call acceptably upon the sick, here is one who can organize the finances, here is one who can create enthusiasm for missions, here is one who can bring together those who disagree—all of these are worthful, but above all is the one who, like Ananias, can go out and meet the strange folks and lead them tactfully and intelligently into the fellowship of the church. There should be several of these groups in every church, one group composed of men, another of women and still another of young people. Before every important decision day these groups should be handed lists and set definitely to work upon them. Each group should meet separately and should frequently hold meetings for conference, inspiration and prayer. Only those who are qualified and who are interested should be permitted to remain in these groups. Take this example of Ananias seriously. What would have happened if that early group had possessed no such worker as this choice man? God needs the help of such people and they must be ready for instant service. Let us close this quarter with a deep appreciation of *International Uniform lesson for September 25, third quarterly review.

Ananias. May his spirit enter the hearts of scores to whom these lessons may come, enthusing them with a great desire to be used of the Lord in leading others into the fellowship. Surely Ananias is not lacking in your class of men! Discover him, use him. Who knows but that another Paul may be brought into the church.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Claims Two Million Have Been Added to the Churches

The magazine pessimists who from time to time proclaim the downfall of the church have had considerable comfort out of church statistics for two years past. The reports this year will not be so comforting. Rev. Jesse M. Bader, Disciples Secretary of Evangelism, has gathered reports not only from Disciples churches, but has secured the reports of the Easter Week accessions of the various denominations of the country. He claims that over two million new members have been received the past year. The Disciples have already reported 64,650 in their pre-Easter campaign, and this is only part of the year's work. The inadequacy of the reporting system makes these figures below the facts.

Disciples Year-Book Will Appear Earlier

The Disciples church year has been shifted up, the fiscal year ending June 30. This will make the year-book of the denomination appear earlier also. It had been hoped to get the new year-book from the press in September, but it is now announced that it will not appear until in October. It was formerly circulated in January.

Dr. Mathews Feels Church Is Menaced by Gold

For decades the church has been saying that it lacked only the money to do many wonderful things. Gold has poured into the coffers in recent years in a way to eclipse any record made in Christian history. That this flood of gold is not an unmixed blessing is the view of many, particularly that money which has conditions attached which compel silence upon modern issues. Dr. Shailer Mathews of the University of Chicago regards such gold as a great menace. He says in a recent article in the Independent: "Millions of dollars are being offered to carry on the activities of the religious boards in such a way as to divert the church from any application of the gospel to social affairs. Men are being influenced not to contribute to Christian associations or to support ministers or missionaries or to endow schools or to countenance church action looking to the christianization of industrial affairs. The situation is one that prevents clear-cut issues. Are our mission boards to be under the direction of rich men who are more interested in their own theories of inspiration than in Christ's sermon on the mount? Are our church workers to be subsidized into theological subservience and made silent as to industrial justice and Christ's gospel?"

Religion at the University of Illinois

Few of the state universities, if any, have so active a religious organization as does the University of Illinois. The ministers and Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. secretaries of the twin cities, Urbana and Champaign, form an organization of religious workers which studies the situation at the university with great care. This year a number of courses in the study of religion are being offered for which the university will give credit toward its degrees. The Wesley Foundation is offering most of these, but some are being given by the Columbus Foundation. In addition there are non-credit courses of Bible study offered by the various churches for which competent teachers are provided. When the new freshman class gets to Champaign this year it will find a sixteen page booklet announcing the religious opportunities of the university life completely. This efficient organization of the religious forces results in a great many life recruits for the great Christian professions. Church attendance runs to a high percentage.

Columbia University Offers Correspondence Bible Courses

After years of successful operation of a plan of home Bible instruction by the University of Chicago, the plan will become a part of the schedule of Columbia University. This university has discovered a widespread ignorance of the Bible such as does not befit young people claiming university culture, and hopes to reach many who have already passed through the university halls with its plan. The first course is on "Old Testament History and Literature" and will be presented by University Chaplain Raymond C. Knox and Dr. Frank Knight Sanders.

Dr. Ramsey Will Lecture at Newton in October

Prof. William Mitchell Ramsey, well known authority on the life and travels of St. Paul, will lecture at Newton Theological Institution in Massachusetts in October. Dr. Ramsey is author of "The Letters to the Seven Churches" and "A Historical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians." He will make a considerable tour in the United States before returning to the University of Aberdeen, Scotland, where he is a professor.

Studies Use of Bible in Public Schools

The use of the Bible in the public schools of the nation is much more widespread than is commonly believed at this time. A survey has been made recently by Dr. W. S. Holt, associate secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation. He finds that only a few states forbid the reading of the Bible in the schools, and these are mostly states in which the Mormon influence is dominant, among these being Utah and Arizona. Five states specifically provide for the daily reading of the Bible in the schools, the most curious of these laws being that of the state of Pennsylvania, which requires the reading of ten verses daily without note or comment. In about half the states of the Union the reading of the Bible is permissible and is the common custom. The Christian forces may have attached too much importance to the matter of a perfunctory reading of the Bible in the schools, for it is well known that were this reading carried out universally it would not be an adequate program of religious education. Many leaders in religious education express themselves as opposed to compulsory reading of the Bible in the schools, preferring to leave this matter to the discretion of the teacher in charge. Such an attitude was expressed by Rev. J. Leslie Lobingier, head of the commission of religious education in Chicago last year when the matter of securing a new law in the state of Illinois was up for discussion in the Church Federation meetings.

To Organize a Fellowship of Progressive Churchmen

Recently a group of earnest minded Christian leaders met at Yonkers, N. Y., to consider the organization of a new fellowship. The interest of the group is in social and industrial problems and the problem of international relations. Among those present were Mr. Sherwood Eddy, Charles Stelzle, John R. Voris, Mornay Williams, H. F. LaFlamme, Bishop Paul Jones and Nelson B. Chester. The purpose of the new organization is stated to be "mutual inspiration and cooperation in their respective tasks." Mr. Sherwood Eddy was made chairman of the continuation committee which is to draw up a statement of principles and to call a future meeting of the group.

Presbyterians Establish New Man on Chinese Work

The number of Chinese in British Columbia makes the work of the church in that section very important as it relates to these orientals. The Presbyterian organization in British Columbia has selected Rev. D. A. Smith to head up their activities in that province. Mr. Smith has spent a period of service in China during which time he has made himself familiar with the Cantonese people who furnish most of the immigrants to the United States. On arriving at Victoria he was given a reception by the Presbyterian clergy of the city, and great things are expected of his work in that section of the world.

Archbishop of Baltimore Is Selected

The death of Cardinal Gibbons left vacant one of the most important positions of the Roman Catholic church in this country. Rev. Michael Joseph Curley has been selected as the successor of Cardinal Gibbons as archbishop of Baltimore and official confirmation of this selection has been received. The new archbishop is only forty-two years of age. He was ordained a priest in 1904 and in 1914 became bishop of St. Augustine. He is known as a man of exceptional scholarship, having studied in many countries. In his zeal as a propagandist he organized many new Catholic churches in Florida. His friends also remark the exceptional number of friends he has among Protestants, owing to his broad and tolerant attitude. The selection of this type of leader is suggestive of the policy of the Roman Catholic church in America at the present time. The exclusive and arrogant ecclesiastic of former times tends to be displaced by men who have social vision, and who will go as far in fellowship with all religious people as the canons of the church will permit. Wherever this kind of leader has been chosen the Roman Catholic church has made great progress.

Bishop McConnell a Figure at Chautauqua

Religious interests have always been foremost in the unique program of the original Chautauqua in New York. While recreation and culture are subordinate interests, the founders designed Chautauqua to be an agency for the dissemination of religious idealism free from sectarian bias. This year one of the strong figures on the program has been Bishop Francis J. McConnell of Pittsburgh, of the Methodist fellowship. Bishop McConnell is particularly sane in the discussion of evangelism, one of the big interests of the church this year. He says in this connection: "As Christian workers we have given too much thought concerning getting people enrolled in the church and have forgotten that such act is only the beginning of the Christian life, and that it is followed by continuous training and development. The Christianity of daily life is a progressive matter. Though it were possible for every evil propensity to be entirely eliminated from our nature, even that would be but the beginning of the work of grace in the life. Human redemption goes on forever. Like education that begins with the dawn of consciousness and continues endlessly, the Christian development of man never ends. I like the term Christianizing better than evangelizing or sanctifying. Jesus used it to denote the drawing out and developing of all the powers of the religious nature and every other phase of human life."

College Church Calls Prof. A. W. Fortune

Following the announcement that Rev. I. J. Spencer had been made pastor emeritus, comes the further announcement that Professor A. W. Fortune, of the faculty of the College of the Bible has been made the pastor of Central Christian Church of Lexington, Ky. Dr. Fortune was trained at Hiram College and the University of Chicago. At the latter institution he became a Doctor of Philosophy in the department of New Testament. Professor Fortune was a pastor before he was a teacher, and his pulpit gifts have made him in demand all over Kentucky. For a number of years he was the target of conservative attack among the Disciples but his sterling worth has given him an unimpeachable position.

Aged Bishop Preaches From a Ladder

No personality in Chicago church circles is no nearly a part of the landscape as is Bishop Fallows of the Reformed Episcopal church. He is now in his 86th year, but is younger than are many men at sixty. He was used not long since as the text for a health article in a Chicago newspaper. As an evidence of the virility of Bishop Fallows, it may be chronicled that he addressed a street meeting not long since in front of the Central Y. M. C. A. from a ladder. This is part of a program of street evangelism carried on by the Chicago Church Federation.

Ministers Beat Prize Fight Bill in Illinois

It was largely due to the activities of the Chicago Church Federation that a prize fight bill was defeated in the Illinois State legislature this year. Rev. M. P. Boynton, experienced in legislative matters, spent considerable time in Springfield. Rev. T. R. Quayle of Chicago, went to Springfield, and stayed for five weeks. At one time the ministers met in committee twenty professional fighters. Following the war there has been much favorable sentiment in various parts of the country in favor of prize fighting, and it was feared that the bill might win. The determined opposition of the church, however, brought the bill down in defeat.

Tract Society Leader is Deceased

The American Tract Society loses a strong leader by the death of Rev. Judson Swift, D. D., who passed out of this life at his residence in New York on August 19 after an illness of several months. Dr. Swift was a graduate of Wittenberg College and a member of New York presbytery. He was the author of "A Manual of Devotion for Soldiers and Sailors" and "Looking Forward Day by Day." He had an abiding faith in the power of the printed page to create Christian conviction.

Episcopalians in Rural Work in Rhode Island

The Home Missions Council relates with approval the story of a piece of rural work carried on by the Episcopal church at Coventry Center, R. I. A rector and his wife have settled on a farm of forty acres which has buildings that were modernized by the former owner. The boys and girls of the community are encouraged to raise a kind of white corn that is famous in that community, and make from it "Johnny Cake Meal." The religious workers have a method of combining recreation and industry with religious instruction. The country retreat is delightful and visiting rectors and wives will be encouraged to spend their summers here and help in the work.

State Convention Season is Now on for Disciples

Owing to the change in the calendar of the International convention many state conventions of the Disciples are being held this year at a different date. The Illinois Convention will open at Decatur on Oct 3 with a very attractive program. Kentucky Disciples will hold their 89th convention this year at First church, Louisville. Among the prominent speakers from outside the state is Prof. Alva W. Taylor. Various officials from the United Christian Missionary Society will present the work of the church from the international point of view. Kentucky is one of the strong states for the Disciples.

Ozark Assembly May Become Interdenominational

A few years ago the Disciples of Missouri began an assembly in the Ozarks where they used Presbyterian property on Lake Taneycomo. The location is delightful and the fellowship has been very rewarding. The Methodists and Baptists are now seeking concessions from the Presbyterian owners. This has led to the suggestion that a great assembly of an interdenominational character be built up at this spot.

Out-door Services Eclipse All Records

Springfield, Ill., has been going to church on Sunday evenings this summer. The out-door meetings on the court-house lawn have drawn audiences variously estimated at 2,500 and 3,000 people. For the most part the preaching has been done by the local pastors. A budget of $2,300 was used on the meetings, a considerable part of which was spent on the music. Mr. Fred G. Fisher, former chorus leader for Billy Sunday was in charge. On one evening a section of Handel's Messiah was sung. The subscriptions to finance the meetings were in small sums, running from 50 cents to $5.

Son of Great Evangelist To be College President

Rev. Paul Dwight Moody was elected recently to succeed President John M. Thomas at Middlebury College. He has been assistant pastor in Madison Avenue Presbyterian church of New York, associated with Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin. In the absence of Dr. Coffin this summer, the son of the famous evangelist preached on Sunday evenings to great audiences upon the roof garden of the church. In a recent address on the Prodigal Son he said: "The parable was called into being because some conventionally good persons asked with lifted eye-brows why Jesus fraternized with publicans and sinners, eating with them as with others."

Gloom Prevails at Moody Institute

The characteristic melancholy of pre-millennialism is to be found in the address of Rev. Joseph Taylor Britain of Columbus, O., at the summer graduation exercises of Moody Bible Institute. Mr. Britain said: "Notice how subtle is the attack, for it is being made upon the word of God which heretofore has furnished the basis for political and religious truth, given the race purifying and satisfying doctrine, and forms of worship; yet there are national and religious leaders today, of which a large number are so-called scholars (and we are well acquainted with many of them) whose chief purpose for the last few decades has seemed to be to take out of this Word of God every vestige of the supernatural and to make the people believe that after all it is only an ordinary book; that each individual is competent to criticize it, to accept any parts of it he deems best, and that the brainy ones of earth are those who have succeeded in dissecting this Word of God into a thousand unrelated and uninspired portions, and who rejoice at the readiness with which the institutions and educators and teachers and others have accepted their destructive theories and are teaching others the same. The church can recognize and proclaim that every preacher who denies the virgin birth of Christ, the sovereignty of God and the vicarious atonement and the resurrection of Christ, is taking the foundation stones from our government, for the republic's life is founded on faith and is built on Scripture, even as is the life of an individual.

Large Class Will Study Theology

One hundred and fifteen students have already completed advance enrolments in the Boston University School of Theology for the entrance class. It seems certain that this school will maintain again this year its reputation as the largest graduate school of theological instruction in the country. Dormitory and class accommodations are so restricted that the school authorities have been obliged to restrict the enrolment of students. This school for the training of the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal church is strong in its departments of Religious Education and Social Service. Few schools for the training of ministers put the students so thoroughly in touch with a city environment as this one.

Will Issue New Document On Mormonism

The war of the evangelicals with Mormons continues in various parts of the country. Recently the Mormons got a foothold in Maine and the evangelicals immediately took up a campaign throughout the state. Recently the Home Missions Council decided to issue a tract, now twenty-five years old, and the answer to it by a Mormon elder. The name of the tract is "Ten Reasons Why Christians Cannot Fellowship the Latter Day Saints." The Mormon elder answers these reasons, acknowledging the truth of some of them while entering denials of others. The documents will be circulated side by side by the Home Missions Council as a means of instructing study circles in the issues involved.

Methodists at University of California

It is claimed that no university in the land has grown so rapidly in recent years as has the University of California, located at Berkeley. This school outranks all others in the nation in size of student body, according to recent claims. The Methodists, in studying the problem of the care of their students at the state university found that they had a thousand students in the universities and church buildings which would seat only five hundred. The next step at Berkeley for the Methodists is to enlarge their auditorium to seat 1,200 people. An educational and social center will be built adjacent to the church building at a cost of $150,000.

How Religious Work May be Revived in the Country

At Lynn Grove, Ia., as at a thousand other country places, religious work had come to an impasse. Three churches, Methodist, Disciples and Congregational had disputed the field until all of them were dead and the community without the word of God. Recently Rev. W. J. Lockhart, a Disciples minister of community vision, went to this Lynn Grove to spend his vacation. It proved to be a pretty strenuous vacation. Hundreds of people gathered nightly under a tent that was erected to hear him preach the gospel. As a result of these labors the Lynn Grove Federated church was organized with 160 members, and Rev. C. E. Carter was called as a resident minister. The members of the Federated church continue their allegiance to the denomination of their choice, but cooperate in the maintenance of religious work at Lynn Grove.

Unitarian Laymen's League Takes up Social Problems

The Unitarian Layman's League is the liveliest organization of laymen to be found in any communion in the country. Though only two years old, it has many creditable achievements on its record. At a dinner at Unity House, Boston, it was recently announced that the League would go on record with regard to the social problems of the day. At this dinner the relationships of the League with the ministers of the churches was discussed. The laymen will not be bossed by the ministers, but they expect from the ministers a friendly cooperation in the work of the League. It is just this problem of the relationship of the laymen's organization to the ministers that has in other communions proven to be troublesome.

What Denominations Build Enthusiasm for Education?

Denominations have their distinctive enthusiasms and special points of interest. Congregationalists have a historic interest in education. The report of the Council of the Church Boards of Education indicates the degree of educational interest in the various denominations. As was to be expected, the Congregationalists lead all the rest. The number of college students per one hundred thousand of membership is given in the comparison of the denominations. In this test the Congregationalists had in the tax-supported institutions of the country 1,200 per hundred thousand members; Presbyterians, 1,030; Unitarians, 1,000; Episcopalians, 900; Disciples, 600; Methodists, 500; Lutherans, 300; Baptists, 200. These figures should stir up the denominations low in the list.

People Flock to Hear Dr. Campbell

The summer slump did not occur at First Congregational church in San Francisco. While the pastor, Rev. J. L. Gordon, was away on a Chautauqua circuit in Canada, Dr. R. J. Campbell of London, Eng., preached to the largest summer audiences ever assembled in the church. The mid-week meeting, according to the church's custom, has been conducted as a question box. This is preferred by the people rather than a

Missionary Heroine Dies

LIFE has seldom meant more to anyone than to Miss Mary L. Graffam, a missionary of the American Board in the Near East, who died recently as the result of an operation. In the good old days before the war she was the head of a school with two hundred girls enrolled. Teaching the subjects not interesting to others, devoted ever to the interests of the girls, she was even before the war one of the outstanding figures of the orient. It was the deportation of the Armenians that revealed her true mettle. When she was unable to persuade the authorities that her village should not be deported, she followed along with the people that had to leave their homes. On this journey she saw things too horrible to be related in detail. The murder of squads of men, the looting of the pilgrims of their necessities, the enslavement of the girls, were daily incidents on the horrible journey. She saw the pilgrims drop to the ground from hunger, thirst and weariness. She visited men in prison, and brought them tidings of their families, often supplying the courage by which men went to their death rather than abjure the faith. She was able to secrete many girls from the fiends who would seize them. When the worst of these sufferings were over, she organized the relief work for the destitute people. She started a factory which employed 200 women in the manufacture of flannels and sweaters. Worn to a skeleton by her labors, Miss Graffam never gave way to nerves, but continued to bear the burdens of each day without complaining. At one time in her career she took steps which she believed would mean her certain death at the hands of the Turk. That they did not kill her is another of the evidences of the reverence which human life ever has for goodness. In defiance of Turkish authority she stood ever stalwart in her loyalty to the Armenians among whom she labored. She often made appeals to Turkish authorities on the basis of Mohammedan principles and in some instances was able to secure the release of captives and restoration of property. Her passing enriches the missionary annals of the church with one more wonderful story of heroism and devotion to a great cause.

set address. The crowds for the mid-week meeting grew so that it had to be taken into the main auditorium of the church. San Francisco has been known as one of the most difficult cities on the continent for religious work, and this success is heartening.

Dr. John Clifford Opposed to Scottish Union

Dr. John Clifford of England is speaking against the proposed church union in Scotland. The ground of his opposition arises from his Baptist heritage. Baptists have always protested against a state establishment of religion, and the united church will be a state church. Dr. Clifford feels that parliament should not approve the proposed union for this reason, and he anticipates that if the union goes through it will greatly affect union projects in Great Britain.

Vacation Schools this Summer Greater Than Ever

The Daily Vacation Bible School Movement has met with greater success than ever this summer. It is estimated that three hundred thousand children have been gathered up out of the streets, and given the rudiments of Christian training. Large numbers of these do not attend any Sunday school and it has been the non-sectarian approach which had made the success possible. Chicago has led in this matter with over 200 schools. New York has been a close second. Philadelphia has conducted 150 schools during the summer. As a device for spreading the knowledge of right living and of bringing the churches into contact with neglected areas in the population, the vacation schools have been wonderfully successful.

Lake Geneva Still Great Student Center

No summer assembly in the country means quite as much to students as does the great summer assembly at Lake Geneva, Wis. This year 800 students were in attendance representing 100 different colleges and universities. At Lake Geneva the students hear some of the very greatest Christian leaders and are guided in their conceptions of vocational choice. In the recruiting of the ministry, the mission field and other forms of Christian service, the summer conferences at Lake Geneva have been of outstanding importance. The students go back to their colleges to be strong and competent Christian leaders. This is one of the forces which has brought it to pass that 85 per cent of American students are Christians, while only 5 per cent in South America are believers.

“The ablest and most influential religious paper in America”—says the London Westminster Gazette

The Christian Century's Greatest Campaign for New Readers - Coming!

NEVER in the history of American religious journalism has there been so eager and widespread a response to a program of complete freedom in the discussion of religious themes as that which The Christian Century is receiving. The drab and timid discussion of religion within a horizon narrowed by denominational interests has lost its appeal to earnest men who desire squarely to face the problems of this new age.

The discovery—and it has been a discovery—that a periodical can be religious and at the same time free, positive and at the same time liberal in its hospitality to all enlightened points of view, has seemed to thousands of unsatisfied hearts like coming upon a refreshing spring of living water in a desert place. The Christian Century has extended its influence into all the communions of the American church. Its circulation has burst all denominational bonds. Thoughtful churchmen, both lay and clerical, in all communions are enthusiastic subscribers.

Its subscription list is an album of the signatures of the church leaders of the nation. Besides, it is gripping the minds of thinking men and women who have no church connection. They are astonished that from within the church which they supposed had become moribund and incurably denominationalized in its vision, there should emerge a journal loyal to the church, devout and evangelical, and at the same time as free as a university class room. And they stand amazed to find themselves actually enjoying a religious paper!

EDITORIAL

The Cleansing of Popular Imagination

PEOPLE sensitive to the health of their inner life must feel particular and especial need of going to church these days, if for no other purpose than to wash their minds clean of the foulness which no one could escape who has been reading the newspapers. The turgid flood of scandal and crime has left deposits in the secret places of even the chastest of souls. It is doubtful that we have ever had a week in which so great a volume of vileness synchronized with so great a volume of brutality in the stories of our daily press, as was true of last week. Even though one wished to close one's eyes to it and read only of the developments in the Irish situation or of the coming disarmament conference, one was unable to escape the allurements of headlines and graphic recital with which page after page was filled. Let us hope that the churches of the land were filled last Sunday with congregations drawn by penitence and shame to the place of prayer, and that at God's altar there was wrought in many a heart the work of grace which means renewal and cleansing of the imagination. There is no way to sweeten the inner life, to give our polluted thoughts a refreshing bath, to purify our stained ideals, like humble and penitent and responsive participation with our fellows in the solemn and inspiring act of social worship. What need of prayer these days! For it is a simple fact that there is no other way to cleanse the soul but by praying. And what an opportunity for the minister to lead his people in public prayer when the sense of sin overcasts the common mood and is so unescapable! It is not by negative reflection upon the evil facts which the press is exploiting to the last detail that our mind is to be purged of the deposits left by the stories of sensual and brutish events, but by positive turning of our thoughts toward those things that are lovely and of good report. The act of worship in a true house of prayer should be a means of grace to that holy end.

Are Non-Episcopal Churches, Churches?

IT IS a kind of misnomer to apply the name church to any denomination, whether it be Methodist, Disciples or Roman Catholic. Only by modern and acquired usage have denomination and church come to be used interchangeably. Those who talk with their Episcopalian brethren about the meaning of the Lambeth proposals may well omit the discussion of the denominational question. The Lambeth proposals make a full and generous acknowledgement of the Christian status of baptized believers in the free churches. But are free churches, churches. Is the village of Smithville which has only a Presbyterian conventicle, without a church? Are the Christians there organized only in an unauthorized and partly sinful society, or do they indeed constitute a church of Christ? In the New Testament, the word "church" is used both with regard to local organizations, as the church in Ephesus, or with regard to the whole group of believers, when the phrase is sometimes "the church of God." What does it take to constitute a church? Some would say the sanctioning voice of the bishop. This is to bring into the discussion elements which had no meaning to the writers of the New Testament. The scriptures of the first century go into great detail on many matters. Can it be that a matter that is fundamental to the very being of the church has been passed over entirely without any notice?

There can be no progress in Christian unity discussions until there is a frank recognition all around that the worshipping groups of believers, with whatever denomination now affiliated, are Christian churches. We cannot begin negotiations for the consummation of Christian union by any process involving the unchurched of organized groups of Christian people.

Bishop Explains Action Against Premillennialists

THE Pacific Coast is honeycombed with premillennialism and the result of it is seen in the controversies in both Baptist and Presbyterian denominations. Agents from the Bible Institute of Los Angeles are reaching into every congregation where they can find entrance. Bishop Adna W. Leonard, of the Methodist church, has explained recently why the Methodist church on the coast is so free from this teaching. His superintendents are directed to examine every candidate for the ministry carefully for any taint of the doctrine, and if a premillennialist presents himself, he is refused admission. The bishop insists that premillennialism is amended Calvinism, and for this reason is heresy for a Methodist! Here is a pretty effective answer to the question, Why are Congregationalists, Baptists, Presbyterians and others so much disturbed by the millennial aggressiveness and the great Methodist denomination so little disturbed? The situation is cleared up by Bishop Leonard. Premillennialism in its fatalism and pessimism is essentially Calvinistic and it confronts in Methodism's case not only the flaming sword of episcopal authority but the stern barrier of Arminian conviction. One of the devices to be employed by the Methodist church throughout the United States in opposing this disturber of the peace is to get out an abridged edition of Professor Rall's book on premillennialism. This may even be reduced to the size of a pamphlet, and circulated widely through all sections of the Methodist church. It is hoped by this means to prevent the division and scandal which has arisen in some other denominations through allowing these disguised Adventists and Plymouth Brethren a free course.

Tight Purse Strings In the Face of Need

THE United Charities of Chicago have been borrowing ten thousand dollars a month this summer to keep going. They report that during the past six months they have been compelled to care for twice as many destitute families as ever before. How could it be otherwise? Rents have continued to soar and even the protection afforded by the Illinois legislature through laws considered among the most drastic ever passed have failed still to prevent the continued rapacity of landlords from finding a way of exacting ever larger demands. The poor man who heats his own place must soon face the heaviest fuel costs in the lifetime of this generation. The reductions in food and clothing are too small to balance against these increased costs of housing and heating. On top of the mounting costs of living has been the fact of unemployment. Government reports have shown that over five million people are out of work in the United States. The winter is coming on apace. President Harding's conference on unemployment is coming too late to prevent serious tragedy. In the face of these appalling facts, is the still more alarming fact of the stinginess of the citizens. By the side of this poverty are the thousands of war profiteers who have cornered rice and other food articles and made millions out of the necessities of the poor. That the rich should insist on spending their wealth on luxurious motor cars, swell parties and self-indulgence of every sort increases the social tension in the great cities almost to the breaking point. Every kind of an "ism" that thrives upon social discontent will be rampant. The rich will be alarmed after awhile at the threats of violence and disorder. Then they will remember with regret that even so elemental a need as providing the funds for scientific charity were denied. "Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad." Selfishness is about to overreach itself and bring destruction upon those who have seemed to prosper by it.

Ministers Not All Reactionary or Dull

ON no subject does the ordinary literary hack writer know so little as on the subject of religion. He will spook around auto camps with a camera to illuminate his articles on camping in the Yellowstone, and he will make pictures of the poor little slum children for his articles on social conditions. It never seems to have occurred to him before he writes a very wise article on the failures of contemporary religion that the simply obvious thing for him to do is to go to church. It is for this reason that so many ludicrous errors get into our contemporary writing as it touches the field of religion. Some writers assume that all ministers are reactionary. A good many of them are. A considerable number of them are looking up at the clouds and watching for Christ physically to return on a cloud. One can even find ministers whose zeal for a certain form of administering baptism will quite obscure their sense of duty to tell the truth about a brother minister. It is not to be denied that there are ministers with a knowledge of the world of culture. But there are thousands of ministers in this country whose culture makes them the peers of any men in their cities. Not all ministers are trained in sequestered theological seminaries. At all the leading universities of the country are men training for the ministry. Through the years such men have formed an intelligent and progressive fellowship. Men not a few who have been denied the advantages of university training have come out of their colleges or seminaries with eyes open and are maintaining through books and current journals a cultural life far ahead of their neighbors. Very often literary men who are quite intelligent about other things, conceive their neighboring church in the light of some unfortunate experience of the past. They do not give it a chance to revise their earlier impression. Such men do not realize that the world has moved on in the matter of theological education as in every other particular. We shall have a better community life when the talents of cultivated and consecrated religious leaders are appreciated by the whole community as they are not appreciated today.

Conducting the Church On Wheels

RAILWAY station crowds in metropolitan cities seem sometimes to be but little more mobile than some of the city churches. Congregations are on wheels and move with ever increasing velocity. A city minister reports this as his experience: In two years his new members represented thirty-five per cent of his original membership. In the same period his losses had equalled fifty per cent. The balance is on the wrong side of the ledger. The denominational year-book will show that his church is going down. He has lost no members in that period from other than natural causes of death and removal. Yet, judged statistically, he seems to be failing. Chicago has six hundred Protestant churches, more or less. Most of them are just such churches as we have described. Business changes determined on by corporation heads may move a man and his household on twenty-four hours' notice to a distant state. Restricted housing facilities may send a family to an entirely different section of the city. Theoretically, such a church as the one above referred to would have no one left in its membership at the end of six years who had belonged to the congregation through the whole period. Actually, however, there are some left. But the change of lay leadership makes adjustments constantly necessary which tax the capacity of the minister. Unless he is an acute judge of human nature, he is sure to make some mistakes. He will try to fit square pegs into round holes. There is consequent friction in such churches, more or less, especially if the congregation cares enough for the church to resent mistakes. And yet there are those who think of the minister's job as a sinecure. He must know books well enough to preach to the mentally awake people who move all the time. He must be an organizer and a money-raiser. He must know all about religious education and be popular with the young people. He must be an excellent judge of human nature and qualities of leadership to find the right man or woman for the place left vacant by his departing leaders. Sometimes the minister quits his post, and there are still people in the world dense enough to wonder why.

Expose of "Invisible Empire"

THE New York World has undertaken a sweeping expose of the Ku Klux Klan and a wholesale denunciation of the organization on the ground that it is coming to be a powerful, vicious influence in American life. The World has been conducting an investigation of the Ku Klux Klan for some months and professes to have learned what the Klan is "down to the last fatuous bit of verbiage tucked away in the secret ritual." The Knights of the Ku Klux Klan was organized October 26, 1915, in Atlanta. Its originator and "imperial wizard" is Colonel William Joseph Simmons, who was formerly an itinerant Methodist exhorter, also a professor of southern history at Lanier University which has now been purchased for him. The Klan, according to the World, is active in every state in the union but three, and has a membership of more than 500,000. It is growing faster in the north and west than it is in the south. It is anti-Jew, anti-Catholic and anti-alien. According to the World expose, it propagates itself everywhere by appeals to local or sectional prejudice. On the Pacific coast it appeals to hatred of the Japanese; in the central west it pretends to devote itself to stamping out radicalism; on the Atlantic coast it has preached that 'an alien-born man or woman, even though naturalized, has no place in America.' The Klan maintains paid organizers or "Kleagles," who, it is asserted, collect a donation of ten dollars from every new member of which they keep four dollars as a commission. Thus the Ku Klux Klan has developed an enterprising sales organization. The World quotes extensively from a letter addressed to Colonel Simmons by Henry P. Fry, who was formerly one of the Kleagles but who has renounced the organization and bitterly arraigned it. Captain Fry asserts that since the active propagation of the Klan began there has been a wave of crime in the southern states, that the regulation of public affairs has been taken into private hands, that men have "gone about their respective communities wearing disguises, taking into their own hands the functions of prosecuting attorney, witnesses, judge, jury and executioner in direct contravention of the Bill of Rights of the federal and state constitutions. Men have been dragged from their beds at night, forcibly abducted on the streets and in their homes, arrested without warrant on the public streets, conveyed to secluded places, there to be flogged, tarred and feathered. In two instances helpless women, after being stripped of their clothing, have been similarly maltreated." Other organs of the daily press throughout the country are publishing the World articles or conducting a similar expose on their own account.

The Life Story of a Journalist

LIBRARIANS tell us that there is an unprecedented demand this year for biography. The telling of the life story of a number of the successful men of the age in which we live has turned the attention of the reading public to the fact that a biography, if rightly written, may be just as interesting as a novel. The story of the life of Theodore Roosevelt has been told several times. It is a theme that no one writer could hope to compass fully. The life of Andrew Carnegie has proven of interest to many. Carnegie and Rockefeller bore the sins of the industrial order in their day and generation. A study of the life of Andrew Carnegie does not leave him guiltless in our eyes, but it does leave upon our minds the distinct impression that he was not the least humane of the employers of his age. Indeed there are elements of real greatness in the steel king. It is the story of the journalist, Edward Bok, however, which seems to have the vogue in the libraries at this time. It is told by himself but in the third person. It bears the engaging title of "The Americanization of Edward Bok." He traces the influences by which a poor Dutch boy who was glad in his boyhood to wash a baker's windows for fifty cents became, before he was seventeen, the guest of presidents and of the leading literary lights of his age. He was an autograph collector, and through this hobby found an open-door to the homes of celebrities. His first literary commission was to write sketches of great men to adorn the backs of picture cards that went into cigarette packages. From this he came to be the editor of the most successful monthly magazine in America. He even finds a connection between washing windows for his invalid mother, and becoming editor of a woman's magazine. No biography is ever dull that relates the essential facts of life, but there is in this recent publication the human interest and timeliness which justifies the awarding of the Pulitzer prize for the best biography within the year. Its practical usefulness for parents and teachers of boys is apparent on every page.

Political Disloyalty Under the Guise of Religion

NOTHING can justify or excuse the resort to secrecy and under-cover methods in the defense of American institutions. Those with a discriminating understanding of the nature of democracy can never be long confused at this point. The hundreds and thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of sincere citizens who are now taking secret oaths and supporting the activities of cloaked and hooded organizations alleged to be committed to the enforcement of law and order, will ere long learn from grievous experience, their own perhaps, that of society certainly, the folly of such devices.

The foes of law and order, against whom they are thus arrayed, work under cover and veil their machinations in darkness? All the more reason why the friends of the only kind of law and order which can satisfy a democracy should seek the light, and remain and carry on their operations in the light. It is not true that it takes a rogue to catch a rogue, or, if it is, once he is caught, you have two rogues where there was but one before. Compounding the deeds of darkness never yet proved the effectual means of dispelling the darkness, to say nothing about being a guarantee of righteousness.

Yet, however sound may be the intelligent and conscientious American's social philosophy, and however he may resent the prostitution of all which democracy must hold sacred by lawless organizations claiming to uphold law and order, he cannot properly close his eyes to the profound evils against which these sweeping secret movements are directed. Indeed, there is the more reason for his facing all the facts squarely.

Disregarding for the moment the racial animosities which these movements arouse and feed upon, it is to be noted even by those least graced with an inner knowledge of these enterprises, that their attack is concentrated upon the Jew and the Roman Catholic. Frequently the attempt is made to enlist support for their cause by an appeal to "Protestant" loyalty or prejudice. Happily, Protestantism is so general, not to say vague and irresponsible, a term, that only the prejudiced can be reached by any such appeal. Protestants, in the degree in which they are loyal to ideals worthily going under that name, do not believe in winning even their own most cherished ends by such means as are advocated and practiced by these organizations. It is a highly gratuitous proceeding to assume to support or advance "Protestantism" by these means. This is more of the evil which such a program involves: it injures and degrades causes which it assumes to defend.

If the Catholic and the Jew had set out to invite the attack from which they now suffer they could scarcely have contrived more effectually. Not all they have done has justified the methods employed against them; any fair mind must concede that much. But their course has not merely rendered exceedingly difficult a defense of them by clear-headed and loyal American citizens, but has tragically embarrassed the whole cause of open-and-above-board democracy. The political disloyalty which they have shown, and in which they have gloried, makes it impossible for the unprejudiced to defend them.

On the grounds of religious liberty it should be the profoundest joy of every loyal Protestant to contend for the liberties of these now attacked, as for the liberties of all others. But these have so hopelessly confused issues, and so definitely committed themselves to doctrines and programs inimical to all for which American democracy stands, that none who comprehends our civilization's genius can defend them for a moment.

Zionism is creating a Jewish state, or trying its best and most to do so. The amazing number of American citizens who have espoused this cause while proposing at the same time to retain their American citizenship, and their eminent positions of trust in our commercial and political life, would be unbelievable if the demonstration were not so complete. Granted that their condemnation out of their own mouths is often a choice bit of malignity on the part of their foes, yet the condemnation is clear, and is veritably out of their own mouths and through the contrivance of their own deeds. Their own leaders claim for their cult a nationality, not simply a right to worship God after the dictates of freemen's consciences. They have either repudiated the definitions of religion which have passed current throughout the history of the American republic, and, under the rights of religious liberty, have laid claim to a license not accorded by our system, or they have claimed that Judaism is not a religion. The Hebrew people have been formally set forth as a nation. The Zionist movement, in the very nature of its program and by virtue of its deeds as well as its words, involves a divided citizenship and a political disloyalty which, if yielded to, would bring the American system, its whole social and political order, to wreck.

The indictment is different but not less clear against the Roman Catholic. Hosts of loyal American citizens, professing the Roman Catholic religious faith, continue to protest that their loyalty to the supreme Roman see is "spiritual" and not at all political. And their friends should not arbitrarily attack their sincerity, or their devotion to American institutions. But events since the war have spread facts and claims so thick and so plain on the pages of world history, that surely only prejudice can blind American eyes to their significance.

Nations, not religious cults, or groups of organizations eschewing all but "spiritual" ambitions, send "ambassadors" and "ministers of state" and political plenipotentiaries to the "court" of the "pontiff" in the vatican. An authoritative writer in one of our most trustworthy magazine dwells at length upon this "very remarkable phenomenon of the times, the rush of civil governments to Rome. Before the war the holy see had diplomatic relations with a dozen states; now it has such relations, either sending a representative or receiving one, or, in the large majority of cases, both sending and receiving, with twenty-five."

After cataloguing the civil governments thus related to the Roman see, including even Great Britain, whose former "special mission" has recently been converted into a "permanent legation," the writer adds: "There is one great country to which the pope's eyes turned specially in every crisis of the war; which, up to the last minute he believed never would come in; to which the eyes of the vatican are still turned, the more so in view of its increased prestige and objective and subjective importance—and that is the one country which is not joining in the rush to Rome."

By what default or by what grace is the United States the "one country" not joining in this rush of the nations? Because the Roman see resists? Because American citizens maintaining "spiritual" allegiance to the Roman see would generally disallow the proposal? The questions answer themselves. The whole history of the Roman see and the whole theory of its aspirations shout the answer. What the other nations of the world are doing is the triumph of a program and of forces which Americans can only know as political, and for which they make provision in their system under sanctions which the Roman see violates in the very substance of its organization and aims.

But is there not significance in the fact, as our writer remarks, that the political world is itself rushing to Rome? These new relationships established, and old relationships strengthened, with the Roman see, are the voluntary motion of enlightened, modern states, the majority of them now democratic, at least in name and formal institutions. There is indeed much significance in this fact. All its significance will not appear until the program has been further worked out. But whatever may prove its significance, it does not appear that American enlightened sentiment will be moved to recede from its historic position relative to "spiritual pontiffs" who wield "temporal power." The very fact that a large proportion of their fellow-citizens yield, under the guise of religion and under the dearest sanctions of American religious liberty, to the absolute and total claims of an alien hierarchy gaining such wide and strong political power, must seem the most ominous incident of the whole affair.

The American mind has found itself capable of maintaining a double sovereignty when one sovereignty lies in the spiritual or religious field and the other in the temporal or political, and when rigorous and unremitting zeal keeps the two realms and their institutions separate. But the citizen unreservedly committed to American ways and ideas is incapable of conceiving a double loyalty in the political field. He is keenly apprehensive that the issue may arise when choice will have to be made between the two among his fellow-citizens professing this double allegiance. In such an event he must anticipate with dismay the collapse of the social system upon which his civilization is builded.

All the signs point to the necessity of the American's reorganizing his social ideals, and of finding a new basis and relationship for his political ideas on the one part and his religious ideas on the other. Probably millions of thoughtful Americans realize this, and are groping for guiding principles and adequate social forms. But if American history and American social ideals mean anything consistent, it would seem perfectly clear that the Roman see and its historic or present program cannot offer them an acceptable basis of reconstruction. When it comes time for American society to readjust the relations of politics and religion it will certainly not be under the dominance of alien "supreme pontiffs" or under the sanctions of any form of absolutism, political or religious. It is not their differences in religion—or what the American knows as religion—which prompt American apprehension over the growing claims and power of the Roman see. The sincere American cannot help but entertain a suspicion of one who has taken upon him the vows and yields the kind of allegiance which his Roman Catholic fellow-citizen accords an alien political power, under the guise of his religious faith. That suspicion is dissolved in the intimate and neighborly association which he enjoys with some of his Roman Catholic friends, but he cannot help but feel that all which saves these friends from disloyalty to the society of which they are a part is a benignant inconsistency: they are blessedly better than their professions.

Here is a state of affairs which will not adjust itself. The new program of secret machinations and intimidation is a flagrant violation of sacred American ideals. It offers no solution of our problem, but rather compounds the evils from which we suffer in abundance from the original sources. But the evils must be faced. It is time for sincere and intelligent Americans who profess the Roman and the Jewish religious faiths to make good their Americanism, and permit all right-minded, freedom-loving and light-loving Americans to rally to them in the support of common liberties and truth. This they are now making difficult, if not impossible. Their position is indefensible. Unreserved loyalty to Zionism or to the political program of the Roman see cannot be justified, and not the most charitable American can defend those now under attack against the charge of disloyalty, however reprehensible and revolting the methods of those attacks may be agreed to be.

The final infamy would be to drag in "Protestantism," and make it a party to and a participant in this disgraceful and menaceful affair. The issue is not religious. Certainly it is not sectarian. The loyal American has least of all a desire to win capital for his religious faith through such a lining up of forces, and that in the dark, as is now taking place. He does not care to profess a religion which needs to be supported, or will permit itself to be supported, by secret oaths and deeds requiring disguises and the cover of night. But the very sanctities of his religion compel him to resent and denounce a citizenship which deliberately cultivates the kind of double-dealing inherent in and essential to those systems now under covert and embittered attack. Is there not some way that the Catholic and the Jew can right himself with the intelligent and true-hearted American who would like a free hand in rebuking and quelling deeds of lawlessness and aggression perpetrated in the alleged defense of law? Exposure of these evil methods of attack, and revealing their thoroughly un-American animus, will not suffice. The evils which bred them remain, and so long as they do remain the right-minded citizen is distressingly handicapped in his efforts to vindicate pure and whole-souled democracy.

The Pilot Fish

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I JOURNEYED unto a place beside the Sea, where there was a great Aquarium. And therein they had Fishes of many kinds. And in one of the Tanks was there a Shark. And the Tank had Glass upon the one side, that we might behold the Wonders of the Deep.

And with the Shark was a smaller Fish. And I inquired, saying, what is the smaller Fish?

And certain that were there spake unto me, saying, That is the Pilot Fish. And he hath a Sponge or Suction Pump upon the top of his head, so that he fitteth himself against the body of the Shark, and goeth withersoever the Shark goeth. And he plyeth not his own fins, but letteth the Shark propel him.

And I said, Doth he really show unto the Shark the way he should go?

And they said, Nay. He is of no use unto the Shark, and the Shark at the first would eat him if he could. But the Pilot Fish is too spry, and after a time the Shark getteth rather to enjoy the companionship; for thou canst get used to anything, and so, apparently, may a Shark.

And I had but little liking for the small Fish, that sought not his own way and swam therein, but pretended to guide, whereas he only followed and fed. For I have known the like of that among men, both in religion and in Politicks; and it is an unlovely habit of life.

And they who spake unto me said, Thou needest not feel so badly about it. If the Shark objecteth not, thou shouldst worry.

And I said, I worry not for the Shark, for he is getting a part of what is coming unto him; but I worry for the habit which the other Fish is forming. For he might be a very Respectable sort of Fish if he were more Independent.

For however much of Honour or Reward may come from swimming in the wake of a mightier Fish, it were better for every man to learn to Paddle his Own Canoe.

The Eternal

THE dust is ages deep
On boastful Babel land,
And Cleopatra's wealth
Is lost in drifted sand,
And paralyzed for aye
Is Caesar's sceptered hand.

But Greece—what glory hers
For art and mystic lore!
Old Aeschylus still sings,
And Plato opes the door
To Wisdom's high retreat
For man—still drunk with gore.

Jerusalem, once proud,
Is now a beggar throng;
Its walls are broken down
Though once serenely strong;
But the air is sweet
With plaintive Hebrew song.

The Golden Age

THE golden age will dawn
When man shall dare to be
From false ambition free,
His goal the truth;
When every youth
Shall seek, not wealth and fame,
But this,—a spotless name.
Righteousness shall be bold
In that fair age of gold.

The golden age will come
When men shall work for joy;
When each shall find employ
Suited to each;
When toil shall teach,
Not bring the soul disgust;
Men will not hear, "Thou must!"
Labor will not be sold,
In that bright age of gold.

The golden age on earth
Will be a time of peace;
The wars of greed shall cease;
Envy shall fail,
Mercy prevail;
Creeds shall not separate;
Caste shall be out of date;
Love shall all hearts enfold
In that fair age of gold.

Germany From the Inside

By Alva W. Taylor

WAR propaganda is still blinding our eyes. Propaganda is a necessary part of war making, but it is poison to the processes of peace making and reconstruction. There have been many Americans in Germany this summer. The routes of the tourists were generally over the battlefields of the western front, into the zones of occupation, especially that zone occupied by American troops, and up the Rhine to Switzerland. Our chautauquas have been thrilled with the stories of men "who have been in Germany." They are sincere enough and quite eloquent, but many of them, we fear, saw German landscape more than fundamental German conditions. One cannot tell much about things by means of railroad journeys from place to place nor even by walking about the streets for surface impressions. For instance, we remarked all summer that there was little visible evidence of the vast numbers of wounded men; had we not known the facts our observation would have led us to the superficial judgment that their number was greatly exaggerated, for they were not visible. It is just the same in regard to poverty and unemployment and the general economic debility. And one's impressions are greatly strengthened when one's mind has been prejudiced by propaganda.

Post-war propaganda is producing the belief that Germany is prospering, that more than any of the war-stricken lands she is making the wheels whirr and is "coming back"; that her labor is productive and extending over long hours; that stories of poverty and want are "German propaganda" and a hypocritical whine to win sympathy and escape paying her just dues; that she is "dumping" cheap goods upon the markets and is already a menace to her competitors. To this is added the suggestion that, by skillful diplomacy, she is weaning Italy and England from France and viciously preparing to revenge herself upon her ancient enemy tomorrow. A day in Coblenz and a steamer trip up the Rhine do not enlighten one very much as to the truth or falsehood of these representations, nor does a fortnight in interior Germany, traveling from city to city looking at the fields and city streets. On the other hand, a few days digging beneath the surface through a competent use of the language, interviews with responsible officials and research into business, government and labor documents, plus an exploration of poverty on the ground will work wonders in revealing to the skilled student of social conditions the actual state of affairs.

SURFACE IMPRESSIONS

On the ship returning home we found a number of good Americans who "had been in Germany," and who were speaking in the tone of authority. Not one of them had been beyond the zone of occupation. Their judgments on conditions were exactly the opinions they took over with them, confirmed by interviews with military men in the occupied areas. But they were coming home with large assumption of authority begotten of having been in Germany. On sundry occasions a very likeable and rather impressive fellow-countryman told us his impressions which confirmed all that post-war propaganda had told him before he left his own native state. He spoke always in that incisive and authoritative tone that a successful man of affairs is likely to assume. The following colloquy occurred between us: "How long were you in Germany?" "Two or three days." "How far in did you go?" "Well, our party spent one day in Coblenz and one on the Rhine." "Did you speak the German language or did you have a good interpreter?" "No, sorry to say neither." "From whom, then, did you derive all this information?" "Well, two English women told us so and so, and we talked with a young American soldier, and up in Switzerland an old German who escaped, with his money, when the revolution came on, told us he was just waiting until the Kaiser came back so he could go home." Another was the conductor of a touring party who had traversed the occupied areas. He asked if it was safe to go into interior Germany and held the same opinions as the speaker I have just quoted, sharpened to bitter revenge by a visit to the French battlefields. Another was a very able and keen student who had jumped from place to place in a rapid tour "covering" Germany, viewing her problems from railroad windows, rapid street tours and the lobbies of large hotels. He was immune from the vicious aspects of post-war propaganda but carried, as we all did, an inevitable war prejudice that required convincing evidence to uproot; but he had not obtained, nor could he obtain in that way, any evidence worth while.

DIGGING BENEATH THE SURFACE

The customary summer tour of England gives one the impression that she has made a marvelous recovery. The streets are alive with traffic, the shops are full, the hotels are crowded, you miss nothing from the table except as the summer drouth has made vegetables scarce, the trains are full and fast and there is not, on the surface, a single visible evidence of war's destruction. But when you dig beneath you find millions unemployed, vast sums expended upon relief, a condition in the public treasury that baffles statesmen and so ominous a state of affairs in business that such an authority as Frank Vanderlip, the American banker, gives it as his mature judgment that the future is desperate. One of our hasty tourists mentioned above was regaling his auditors with a discourse upon the folly of unemployment allowances, drawing the conclusion with smug confidence that so long as a workingman could get fifteen shillings a week for doing nothing he would never go to work. We found that he had not taken a morning hour to go down to the Thames docks and see the thousands of men battle for the few jobs available; nor had he read of the crush and riot in London in late July when a firm advertised for fifty men and five thousand were at the gates when they opened; nor did he know anything about the storming of the "work-houses" by the workless demanding a place to live until they could find a job.

A summer tour of two or three weeks in Germany gives one the same sort of impression, except for the absence of automobiles and the unmistakable presence of more wan faces in the crowds on the streets. All sorts of things can be purchased in the stores. There is plenty in the hotels. The cafes and theaters are full. One needs to reserve seats in the trains several hours before taking them unless one travels first class—and the depreciated state of the mark makes even first class look very cheap in terms of the dollar.

INTERVIEWING THE NOTABLES

We were invited to go to Germany on behalf of one of the great international organizations doing relief work there. Through this connection we were given access to situations and interviews with personalities which no one of our party could ever have obtained alone, and such, we dare say, as no individual student could obtain no matter what interest he represented. Our commission was accorded interviews with the President of the Republic, the minister of reparations, an ex-chancellor of the empire, the rector and expert scholars from the university, the student leaders in the studientenschaft—the new nationwide student organization—the executive of every national labor organization, certain great employers, some of the foremost religious leaders, and last but not least, representatives and advocates of the various shades of political opinion—monarchists, socialists, republicans and communists. This impressive array of authoritative personalities was enlisted by officials of this international relief organization and coming to them, as we did, on behalf of good-will and a new and better understanding, men of all parties met us with candor, received our very frank questions without offense and answered in the same frank and open manner which characterized our inquiries. Interviews with such radically differing types of leaders helped immunize us, in a sense, against the dangers of propaganda. We found that in the stressful times of revolution differing viewpoints are made very sharp. We also had the benefit of the personal experiences of English and American relief workers who have had many months of intimate experience in inner Germany.

THE ECONOMIC SITUATION

Germany has had a good harvest this summer save for a loss in potato and other root and tuber crops occasioned by the drouth. The agricultural population will be well provisioned for so far as food is concerned though they may be short on clothing and certain articles that must be purchased from abroad. The wage earning class is not so fortunate. The average wage for unskilled labor is from thirty-two to forty marks per day. One dollar bought eighty-eight marks in the middle of August and the run has been from eighty up to that figure. The cost of living has arisen from twelve to fifteen times, the wage from seven to eight times. Thus labor can purchase from 50 to 60 per cent as much with the daily wage as before the war. There are nearly 3,000,000 unemployed and great numbers on part time. The government is giving subsistence allowances to 500,000 families to save them from starvation and is keeping as many workers on railroad and other government works to tide them through. The Quakers have been feeding 800,000 one meal per day and hundreds of thousands of working men are given one balanced ration per day at the factories as a means of keeping up a working strength. At home the average workingman gives to his children what little strength-giving food he can, so the employers must feed their men at the factories to guarantee that they will eat the food themselves. Municipalities and government bureaus are also feeding very extensively and are progressively taking over relief work, hoping to assume charge of it all in another year.

The condition among the salaried and professional classes is much worse. With them there has been an increase in salary and income of only three to four times. Thus they can buy only one-fourth as much as before the war. They are fairly eking out an existence for the most part. A university professor said he had worn his suit two years and that his salary of 1,600 marks per month would barely feed the five mouths in his family when supplemented by renting out all the rooms in his house except the three in which they lived. A new suit of the cheapest kind would cost from 1,000 to 1,200 marks, and "God only knows where another will come from when this one falls to pieces." One of the old empire's most distinguished civil officials told us he had never possessed anything beyond his salary. Deprived now of office and reduced to a small pension he had taken the leather off his upholstered furniture to make shoes and his daughter had turned the window curtains into dress skirts. He is living in a small country-place writing his memoirs with the hope that they will bring some return for his old age. A successful physician when asked why he did not increase fees to correspond with the rise in living costs, replied that people could not pay them and were depending upon public dispensaries largely, taking their chances with such services as could be rendered there.

THE SOCIAL SITUATION

The people are eager to work, but there can not be adequate resumption of industry until raw materials can be procured. The stories of whirring wheels and the great resumption of industry and all that are not borne out by a candid investigation nor by statistics. They would whirr if cotton, wool, iron, copper and other raw materials could be obtained, but with no credit with nations that export them and with the dollar worth twenty times its pre-war value and with an export tax of twenty-six per cent laid upon every mark's worth sent outside of Germany, industrial resumption looks impossible. All authorities agreed that some 26,000,000 of the population must go hungry this winter.

We went to the opera, took a look into the show-houses, toured Friedrichstrasse at night, stood in by the gambling machines, visited a great children's hospital, the Quaker feeding kitchens, the great Dom at a Sunday morning service. Not only thus did we take visual impressions of the social situation but we had very intimate interviews with the relief workers who know, through months of personal experience, just what the conditions are beneath the surface. We heard Tannhauser sung in superb fashion at the Charlottenburg Royal Opera. Balcony seats were eight cents in American money and the best seats in the parquet cost only forty-one cents. The theater was crowded and the audience was almost religious in its demeanor. There was not a single bare-backed woman there, not a lavish costume to be seen, and when the great throng filed out I stood in front until they had dispersed without seeing so many as a half-dozen automobiles drive up to take their owners home. The crowd dispersed as they might have done in an interior American town before the day of the motor car. American films are shown in the movies and they too were crowded. The street shows were thronged with people whose penury was written on their dress. The cafes and beer gardens were full. One can spend an evening in one of these places for a dime or two in our money, but that means a day's wage for a small party, in their money. Friedrichstrasse is crowded until midnight and the solicitation by young women is open and flagrant. These young women are not hardened sinners, but for the most part attractive in both appearance and dress. Gambling devices operate with open doors and with such a jam before them that one can worm his way through only with patience. The bets are small. Many of the patrons are men in caps with lined faces, who impress one with the fact that they are throwing a chance with the price of their last meal on the hope of winning two.

THE ILLUSION OF THE TOURIST

The hasty traveler sees this. He finds plenty in his hotel which his American dollar will buy. An old official told us he refused to go into the Adlon or the Continental hotels in Berlin, for said he, "they are filled with Germans who profiteered out of the war and are still profiteering on the people's need, and keeping double sets of books to escape the tax collector. "They," he added, "are traitors to their country and their kind." In regard to the gala aspect of amusements and diversions it seems probable that a people in extremity must turn to them or suffer desperately from nerves and depression. It is actually better to eat half a meal and spend the other half on an inexpensive recreation than to have a full meal and suffer from mental depression. The German people are under a terrible mental depression. Proud and confident, they are defeated and humiliated. Believing themselves the most efficient and powerful race in the world, they are conquered. Dreaming of the most glorious place in the sun, they are today as dust beneath the feet of their conquerors. As a result they are in the paralyzing grip of fatalism—the last refuge of despair before suicide. Thus they play and gamble with any small margin at hand, and many of the girls who yesterday worked in munition factories, under the double pressure of economic necessity and a morale lowered during the war, retreat to the streets as the surest way to food, good clothes and a good time.

This is all tragic enough from a human standpoint when one looks beneath the surface, but when one goes to the hospitals and relief stations there is no need to look beneath the surface. To pass through seemingly endless wards filled with little children suffering from rickets and tuberculosis of all kinds, and all other diseases brought on by malnutrition, and to visualize their numbers by imagining the endless paths one would walk if he undertook to see all their helpless kind throughout Germany, is to witness an act in this human tragedy which brings on sleepless nights. Then if one turns to the relief stations and considers what a populous city of penury and want it would be if all these needy millions were brought into one place, and if one considers that of the total sixty millions of Germany's population one-half are living with the wolf just outside the door, and if one remembers that these conditions obtain in a land which yesterday had no slums, permitted no begging, cared for its poor and unemployed with a scientific precision that brought the world to its gates to study its methods, one realizes how poignantly the German people today know the horrible folly of war.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION

The one thing we are inclined to forget is the fact that Germany is today in the hands of the legitimate sons of the rebels and patriots of 1848. No men ever fought more valiantly for democracy than did those gallant men of whom Carl Schurz and General Fritz von Siegel were illustrious examples. They were crushed by the iron heel of monarchical militarism and Bismarck so welded the autocracy under the Kaiser that all the power of the great German army was held against any recurrence of a republican revolution. The governors of Germany are today the legitimate heirs of the Revolution of Forty-eight. There is not a single advocate of the old junker regime in authority. The government is a coalition of the conservative wing of the Social Democratic party and the middle-class business elements. In this working agreement business and labor are learning to work together. They have arrived at an understanding in industry by which labor has delegates to represent it in all matters pertaining to its interests but without interfering with capital ownership. Great business men like Walter Rathenau sit in the cabinet, but no monarchist; and it is a solid republican government.

There is a large body of public opinion favoring a monarchy after the English type but very little sentiment favoring a return of the old regime. The Kaiser is plainly in poor repute since he ran away from danger. A keen man of affairs explained the situation in this way: "The Kaiser was advised in 1916 to grant his people a government after the English model. He was warned that by that means alone could he save his throne, for far-seeing men saw defeat from the day of America's entrance into the war. They also believed defeat would give the republicans the occasion they coveted to bring on the revolution. He haughtily refused. Then when the revolution came instead of coming to Berlin to face it like a man he ran away. The great mass of the German people want no more of him or of his family, but should we be reduced to chaos a strong man may arise and win the suffrages of the people." This judgment we heard others express, even republicans, and we all agreed that the largest element of safety lies in making it possible for the present regime to keep things going in a fairly stable manner. One of Germany's industrial and financial leaders said no monarchy was possible so long as labor had a fighting chance to make a living, for its millions would lay down their tools the day an effort to restore the monarchy was made. That is just what they did when Kapp tried his famous coup, and though he had army, government offices and the railroad headquarters, he could not turn a wheel and was compelled to quit. That, said the great labor executives, is the thing that will happen every time either a monarchic or communistic coup is attempted, and there are 12,000,000 citizens, members of the trades unions, knit together with a morale which no other labor movement knows. There are economic divisions in the movement, but a strong political solidarity and both the monarchical and communistic extremes are weaker today than they have been at any time since the revolution.

THE ALLIES AND GERMANY'S FUTURE

The future of republican Germany lies largely in the hands of the Allies. If they demand bricks without straw they can reduce the country to chaos and render the government powerless to meet the impossible. If the allies make it possible to get credits and to deflate the currency and thus to buy raw materials, and if they will allow Germany to keep the Silesian coal and mineral lands as a basis of reconstruction and arrange some method for large payments on the reconstruction of France through the furnishing of materials, the people will gladly go to work. The "war after the war" crushes the children of today and the generation unborn. In both England and Germany all agreed that there could be no reconstruction without new moral solidarity. No mechanics of reconstruction can complete the task without a spiritual new birth. No new world can be builded upon hate and revenge, nor upon the iron law of an eye for an eye. Germany made the war, and she should rebuild its ruin as far as possible. But let us not forget that her enemies made wars for five centuries whose results we knitted into the complex situation out of which this war sprung, and that the hands of none are altogether clean. That fact should temper justice with mercy. Peace will be forever impossible if each war is followed by reprisals; that vicious circle of the past must somehow, sometime, be broken. Peace for the future can be builded upon a program made for the future, and without too much care for the past. I plead for no extenuation of the Prussianism of yesterday, but I do plead for a chance for the German democracy of today. Europe cannot live either wisely or well until the 60,000,000 human beings at her heart complete their redemption in terms of the republicanism they have now established. And that they cannot do if today we keep heaping indiscriminately upon their heads the maledictions we heaped upon the heads of their oppressors yesterday.

Unsectarian Membership in the Local Congregation*

By Edward Scribner Ames

I HAD not intended to speak on this subject when I came to the convention but as the days have passed it has seemed to me that this wise provision of the program committee for an open discussion of open-membership urgently invited expressions from all who have given serious attention to it. What I have to say is chiefly a report of experience—not theory or speculation. I ask your indulgence with reference to a little personal history. Probably you have heard that the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, maintains the practice of receiving unimmersed Christians into full fellowship. Some publicity has been given to this fact. But it has not always made clear just why the practice was adopted nor how it has actually worked. It is true that this church has practiced the reception of the unimmersed longer than any other among the Disciples, but it was not the first to raise the question nor the first to attempt a practical solution of it.

In the larger sense the attitude of our Disciples churches to members of other communions was an original and essential problem of this movement for it was a movement for the union of Christian people of all denominations, sects and parties. More specifically this matter was involved in the original determination of our administration of the ordinances. Different attitudes were expressed in the administration of baptism and of the Lord's Supper. Alexander Campbell and his collaborators took an exclusive position in the practice of baptism but allowed Christians of any denomination to decide for themselves concerning their observance of the communion. This fact arrested my attention when a young man just out of college. During a conversation in a railway coach on a train in Iowa, before I ever went to Yale University and before the University of Chicago was founded, I asked B. W. Johnson, then an editor of the Christian Evangelist, about this difference. I asked him if we were consistent in the practice of open communion and of close baptism. At once, as if it were not a matter new to his thoughtful mind, he replied, "That is a question which the Disciples will have to face in the future." Within that decade one of our churches in Cleveland and one in New York City began the practice of receiving the unimmersed into their fellowship, but neither one continued it beyond the pastorates in which it originated. The question, however, was emphasized by their experiments.

ASSOCIATE MEMBERSHIP

Some years afterward, in 1903, the Hyde Park church adopted the plan of "associate membership." I have a letter from B. B. Tyler, then with the South Broadway church of Denver, congratulating us upon this action and exulting over the fact that his own church had adopted it in the previous year. After one year we modified our designation of this relationship and for sixteen years received unimmersed persons as "members of the congregation." Two years ago last May, the Hyde Park church adopted a resolution recognizing these persons as full members of the church, and it continues to receive such persons as full members.

*A speech delivered at the Winona Lake general convention of Disciples, in discussion of the question, "What should be the attitude of Disciples churches toward members of other Christian bodies?"

HOW "OPEN MEMBERSHIP" WORKS

At the present time there are several churches which practice "open membership" in some form. Only two of these are in Chicago. Many ministers favor it and numbers of laymen would be glad to see it put into practice in their churches. These members of our Hyde Park church have justified our reception of them. By their spirit and fruits we know them to be good Christians and they have become as active and as helpful as those who have been immersed. They give of their money, their time, their influence and their resources of character and talent as freely as any. We have a total membership of 400. About one-third are unimmersed. They have come to us from many denominations—Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists and Episcopalians. The Jews, Catholics and Mormons are represented. We live together in a blessed fellowship of mutual understanding and Christian service. I refer you to the Year Book for the record of our benevolences aggregating this year some $4,000 in a budget of over $1,300,000.

What are the motives and the principles impelling a number of our churches to adopt this attitude toward the unimmersed? It was not merely to gain numbers and economic strength. Some great churches, like the Linwood Boulevard church in Kansas City have lately established this practice. It is not because the ministers of these churches and the members are not loyal Disciples. In nearly every instance these ministers are sons of old Disciples families and are among the most loyal of the faithful. This practice has not been fostered by those who seek to betray our movement or who have rejected the teaching of the Bible. They conceive themselves to be guided both by the vision of the fathers and by the teachings of Jesus Christ and the word of God. They feel that this great religious movement is more and more sharply confronted every year by the searching question as to whether its mission to the world is to advocate Christian union or the doctrine of baptism by immersion. All the great forward impulses or religion in our time magnify the importance of Christian union and lessen the emphasis upon rites and ceremonies as necessary and essential means of salvation. While there is a marked tendency to the enrichment of worship by forms and symbols, there never was a time when the idea that such forms are essential to salvation was so vigorously and consciously rejected.

NEW LIGHT FROM THE BIBLE

New light has come to this generation from the Bible itself, and from life and from history, with reference to the teaching of the scriptures. The scholars of our time are no less devout than the scholars of a hundred years ago and they do have the advantages which this wonderful century has brought. There have been genuine discoveries as to the teaching of Christ, his social message, his rejection of the legalism and literalism of the scribes and pharisees. We see more clearly that his kingdom is better expressed in his own words as recorded in the Gospels than it is by the Judaized and ceremonialized mind of the Apostle Peter in the book of Acts. We are familiar with the fact that Paul, the great apostle to the Gentiles, had to rebuke Peter for this very legalism which was so rooted in his Jewish inheritance and training. The great words of Jesus himself are the magna charta of our faith and the authority for a fellowship beyond the bounds of legalistic forms and external ceremonies. His most vehement denunciations were directed against the tendency to white-wash the outside and neglect the inside, the fountains of the heart. "Hereby shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one to another." The first and greatest commandment, he said, is love. With this love he included faith in the kingdom of love and the will to further that kingdom in all the world and in all the relationships of life. There are abundant texts for these great authoritative principles of our Lord. Sometimes we are in danger of losing these weightier matters by our meticulous attention to the mint, anise and cummin of the forms and externals of religion. The Disciples will never move out into the larger practice of Christian union until they are wholly convinced that they have justification for doing so in the teaching of the New Testament and of Jesus Christ. The practice of union will never be extended by a lessening of loyalty to the word of God; but a profounder knowledge of that word and a deeper appreciation of it will lead us inevitably to a larger fellowship with all Christian people of every faith and order.

Oh, my friends, we are living in a new day of the world, in a marvelous age of science and art and industry and social revolution. There are signs of great promise. The age is heart-hungry for a religious faith to meet its needs, for a faith which is sane and virile and joyous. Will not the Disciples of Christ gird themselves for a service and a ministry large enough, wise enough and vital enough to enable them to do their part in this most marvelous time in the whole spiritual life of our race? We are in many ways uniquely qualified to be helpers and leaders in these crucial times. We are free from creeds and ecclesiasticisms and from old traditions. We are young and courageous and optimistic. We have a call and a conscience for Christian union and we will in the future gloriously fulfill that mission.

A Kiss

LAST night the Wind came and kissed her,
And the poppy's face is red,
And she laughs and sings for she does not know
That today the Wind is dead.

Charles E. Jefferson

Eleventh Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

IT SO happened that I heard Dr. Jefferson for the first time just after I had read his four golden books of counsel and guidance in the matter of preaching. It was an interesting experience, like listening to a master painter lecture on painting, and then watching him paint a picture; and never did practice fulfill precept more perfectly. Those four books, if taken together, form the best course of practical instruction for a young preacher of which I have any knowledge, as much for their fraternal spirit as for their plain-spoken wisdom. They have the ring of reality, the tang of experience, as of one who is not spinning a theory but telling us what he has learned by living. Uniting heavenly wisdom with homely common sense, they show how, since we have this treasure in divine use. A little book long famous in English literature earthen vessels, we must make the vessel fit for the was entitled "A Mirror for Magistrates"; and these books are a Mirror for Ministers, in which we see ourselves and our work, the things that help and the faults that mar the ministry—a mirror held in a wise and brotherly hand.

Some of us regard "The Building of the Church" as one of the best of all the historic series of Yale Lectures, if only it approaches the preacher through the church. There we see the preacher against the background of "organized preaching" in which his labor is enshrined; in the environment of faith and prophecy of which he is both the creation and the interpreter. The thesis of the lectures, expounded with characteristic lucidity of insight and style, is that preaching involves not one man only, but a society of men and women. The sermon does not grow out of the soul of the preacher alone, but out of the deep heart of the Church. It is not the preacher who makes the church; it is the church which makes the preacher. He does not shape himself, but is moulded by the communal life and faith of a body of believers, and gives back what he receives. The church in her corporate experience is his mother, to whom he owes his life of faith, and, by the same token, a life of loyalty. He is not an isolated individual, but an organ functioning in an organism; and his ministry belongs to him not alone by virtue of his temperament, his poetic gift, or his social passion, but as an endowment of the church of God whose son and servant he is.

THE SKYSCRAPER CHURCH

With this thesis fresh in my mind, when I entered the "Skyscraper Church," as the Broadway Tabernacle is called by the New York papers, I felt that I was approaching Dr. Jefferson through the great church which, in its present form and influence, is the creation of his faith as a leader and his acumen as an executive, no less than of his genius as a preacher. When he came to New York in 1898 he found a church living almost wholly in the past, and stifling in a neighborhood quite unfavorable to growth.

He made certain demands as conditions of his acceptance—there was, I am told, a three months' option clause, long since forgotten by both pastor and people—and from that uncertain beginning, in spite of the swelling tides of alien populations, and the swiftly shifting conditions of New York, the church has grown, and the preacher has grown with it, until today it is a bulwark of righteousness, a shrine of faith and a throne of power, in the greatest city of America. If Emerson was right when he said that every institution is the lengthened shadow of a man, the building at Fifty-sixth Street, with its modern appointments and equipment, and still more the noble Christian community, whose gracious, wholesome, creative activities make so many forms of fruitful service, is the incarnation of the spirit, personality and constructive vision of its minister. Such a ministry, so wisely and quietly wrought, rich in insight and enterprise, deserves to be celebrated with gratitude and joy by the whole church of every name.

NOT A STERN PERSONALITY

The New York papers are wont to describe Dr. Jefferson as stern, cold, unbending, an old-time Puritan pastor in whose thought modernism has no place, and whose methods are as masterful as his personality. It is a strange caricature, as alien to the spirit of the preacher as it is unlike the Puritans whose history he knows as few others. He does embody the heroic Puritan tradition, and if there is any place on earth where such a minister is needed more than another, it is in our gay and giddy-paced metropolis, in the garish glitter of Broadway. They err who think him stern, cold, or unbending; though, as he sits in the pulpit, his appearance does give one an impression of firmness, if not of austerity. But as he begins to speak his rugged face is illumined by an inner brightness, and one discovers that it is the firmness of strength, of poise, of serenity, suffused by a great gentleness, and touched by that elusive magnetic quality so impossible to define. On that long-gone Sunday morning the Tabernacle was full, the men outnumbering the women—young men, especially, to whom the preacher is so attractive. If, as Delsarte once said, "mediocrity is not the too little, but the too much," Dr. Jefferson is a genius in the conduct of public worship. The service was simple, natural, satisfying, rich without being ornate, reverent without being formal; and it did what every service of social worship is intended to do. It welded an audience into a congregation, wooing us out of our lonely isolation into liberty and joy of fellowship.

The sermon had to do with the atonement, and I felt a sense of dismay when he announced the theme, expecting a dull time with an old theological riddle. Having used the word once or twice, he threw it aside, because of the unrealities associated with it, using, instead, the word "reconciliation," which is nearer to the experience of the New Testament. As a thinker it was plain that he stood in the tradition of Clement of Alexandria, and, later, of Schleiermacher, Maurice, Wordsworth, and Coleridge, to whom the incarnation was "the climax of immanence in the world," and the atonement an age-long process in which God is ever present and all-suffering. The old ideas of the atonement, he said, were either artificial, mechanical, or theatrical. The idea of God underlying them was not only inadequate, but false. Henceforth we must think in terms of fatherhood, drawing our analogies not from the courthouse and the counting-room, but from the deepest, holiest realities of life.

Quite frankly the preacher gave us more than one glimpse of the struggle in his own heart in days ago, and how he rebelled against the old dogma: "I would not accept it. I became an infidel. No man can accept a doctrine that darkens his moral sense. I wonder in telling this if I have not spoken the experience of many of you this morning." Indeed, yes. Some of us knew every footprint along that dark path, and the bitter agony of the way. He told how a minister, who had outgrown the old dogmas, led him to see a clearer vision which set his heart singing. No doubt it was Phillips Brooks, under whose spell he fell as a young man, and by whom he was won from the law to the ministry. What a lawyer he would have made, with his clear incisive intellect, his scrupulous precision as a workman, and his gift of quiet, persuasive eloquence! Another bit of self-revelation came in his reply to those who say that, if God carries the wound of the world in his heart, He cannot be happy: "Of course he cannot be happy. Children are happy, grown people never are. After we have passed over the days of childhood, there is happiness no longer. Some of us have lived too long and borne too much ever to be happy any more." An undertone of pathos, far enough from pessimism—as of one whom the years had taken below the surface of things, some way down into the mystery and sorrow of life—made itself heard all through the sermon, if the ear that listened was sensitive. It was real preaching, what the English call "preaching of the centre," heart speaking to heart in words so simple that one felt the impact of reality. Somehow it recalled a passage in one of his lectures in which he tells what a sermon costs, and how the preacher must live the word of God before he preaches it:

A sermon is not a manufactured product, but a spiritual creation. It is not a machine which a man can construct in his sermon shop, and set running in the pulpit like the electric toys which one sees sometimes on the corner of the city street. A sermon is an exhalation, a spiritual vapor emerging from the oceanic depths of the preacher's soul. It is an emanation, an efflux, an effluence flowing from an interior fountain hidden in the depths of personality. It is an efflorescence, an outflowing of beautiful things whose home is in the blood. It is a perfume from spiritual roses blooming in the garden of the heart. It is a fruit growing on the tree of a man's life. "A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit." Make the tree good. A sermon is the life-blood of a Christian spirit. A preacher dies in the act of preaching. He lays down his life for his brethren. He saves others, himself he cannot save. The pulpit is a Golgotha in which the preacher gives his life for the life of the world. Preaching is a great work. To do it as God wants it done, the preacher must be a good man, full of the Holy Ghost and of faith.

There are those who hold that oratory always moves on a more or less low moral plane, and is an exercise perilous alike to the soul of speaker and hearer. Froude, who could away with eloquence, thought it nearly always misleading, if not dishonest; and Montaigne was of a similar opinion. Meredith has an epigram sufficiently light, to the effect that oratory "is always the more impressive for the spice of temper which renders it untrustworthy." Dr. Jefferson shares this distrust of oratory—he so fears unreality—and that, too, in spite of his amazing gift of lucid, fitly colored, gracious and moving speech. He knows how easily an orator is betrayed into saying more than he sees, mistaking ornament for insight; a peril which, if unchecked, eats away the moral fiber of a man. He knows that if a man sets out to be eloquent, using oratorical tricks, stratagems and pyrotechnics, he bids good-bye to truth and sincerity. One of his sayings ought to be written in the mind of every young minister: "Never endeavor to be eloquent. It may be that God will let you be eloquent half a dozen times in your life, but I am sure you cannot be eloquent if you try to be." All of which bespeaks the austere integrity of the man, his veracity of soul in dealing with the truth, and with the people. For no one has a more vivid sense of the potent, far-reaching influence of true Christian speech, whose word is also a deed, and of which he is one of the noblest masters among us.

STYLE WITHOUT AIRS

Style, he once said, is perfect when it becomes invisible; and that exactly describes his own style. It puts on no airs, knows no frills, and attracts no attention to itself. It fits his thought as tightly as the skin fits the flesh. There is not a wrinkle, and it is so natural and true that unless you sit before it as a critic and pay close attention, you will not see it at all. Simple, sinewy, flexible, it can preach a sermon, write an essay, or tell a lovely Christmas story, with equal grace and ease. The style of a preacher is conditioned, of course, by his mental quality and the fashion of his spoken address. Thus, the stately, sweeping periods of Gunsaulus were suited to the uses of his voice; that magnificent organ whose rich and manifold music follows us down the years. In like manner, the diction of Dr. Jefferson is admirably attuned to the character of his delivery, which is clear, gentle, melodious and of varied modulation. He is sparing of gesture; his sentences are short; and his language is rich in color, but its beauty is inwrought rather than decorative. His sermons are not read, but spoken, and that with an air of the utmost ease and spontaneity—like a teacher telling a tale, like a friend persuading you of a high matter. There is passion in his discourse, but it is not of a kind that resembles a torrent of fire. Rather, as was said of John Ker—whom he resembles in many ways—it is like "a warm radiance shining through the windows of a home where strong conviction and quiet faith dwells at peace with understanding and hope and acquaintance with grief." He does not seek to take the mind of an audience by violence or to carry it away on an impetuous tide of words. His way is rather to win his hearers, taking them captive unawares, showing them the beauty of the gospel and the meaning of their lives, seeking to lead them into the freedom and service of the Master.

SUBURBAN PREACHING

An English writer has recently said that one grave fault of the pulpit of our day, and especially in America, is what he picturesquely calls "suburban preaching." By suburban preaching he does not mean preaching to people who live in the suburbs, but preaching which makes its home on the fringes and outskirts of Christian truth, rather than in the center and the citadel; preaching that has much to say about the minor moralities, and the passing events of the day, but very little about the great themes of the gospel. If, the writer adds, preachers like Wesley, Newman, Dale, Spurgeon and Liddon have one common word to speak to the pulpit of today it is this: that behind all great preaching there lies always a great gospel greatly conceived. To that list of names he might have added Jefferson, whose plea for doctrinal preaching—as in his lecture on "The Place of Dogma in Preaching"—has been fulfilled, in a crowded and versatile ministry, by showing what such preaching should be. Take any of his volumes, such as "Doctrine and Deed" and "The New Crusade"—which are an honor to the American pulpit—and you find him dealing with the basic issues of faith, both in their profound significance for thought and in their practical meaning for life. His volume entitled "Things Fundamental" was a series of Lenten sermons, his custom being to devote that sacred season not merely to pious reverie, but to grappling with the great truths which, like the rock ribs of the earth, underlie and uphold the lives of our Christian men. Indeed, in the first sermon I heard him preach there was a passage as apt today as it was well nigh twenty years ago.

If Protestantism today is not doing what it ought to do, and is manifesting symptoms which are alarming to Christian leaders, it is because she has in these recent years been engaged so largely in practical duties as to forget to drink inspiration from the great doctrines which must forever furnish life and strength and hope. If you will allow me to prophesy this morning I predict that the preaching of the next fifty years will be far more doctrinal than the preaching of the last fifty years has been. I imagine some of you will shudder at that. You say you do not like doctrinal preaching, you want preaching that is practical. Well, pray, what is practical preaching? . . . If you really want practical preaching, the only preaching that is deserving the name is preaching that deals with the great Christian doctrines. When people say they do not like doctrinal preaching they often mean that they do not like preaching which belongs to the seventeenth or sixteenth centuries. They are not to blame for this. There is nothing that gets stale so soon as preaching. We cannot live on the preaching of a by-gone age. But doctrinal preaching need not be antiquated or belated, it may be fresh, it may be couched in the language in which men were born. And whenever it does this there is no preaching which is so thrilling and uplifting and mighty as that which deals with the great fundamental doctrines.

Not alone as a teacher of faith, but equally in its application to private character, social justice, the comity of classes and the fraternity of nations, Dr. Jefferson has been a wise and seer-like leader. No preacher in this land has been an abler enemy of war, using fact, reason, satire —every weapon in his bright armory, to fight the fiend. Some of his addresses are forever memorable, as when he led a visitor from Mars upon a tour of the earth, taking him behind the scenes in the parliamentary assemblies of the nations, until, disgusted at the duplicity of mankind—mouthing about peace and making ready for war—to hide his horror the Martian boarded a celestial express for a saner planet! What the world-tragedy meant to Dr. Jefferson, both as a fulfillment of his forebodings and a crucifixion of his ideals, only his brethren who walked through the same valley of shadow can ever know.

WAR'S CASUALTIES IN MEN'S HEARTS

Not all the casualties of the war were on the battlefield; in the hearts of Christian men there was devastation and unspeakable woe. Cast down but not destroyed, saddened but not defeated, Dr. Jefferson has been a tower of strength in days of rancor and reaction. Often he alone found the needed word for the hour, as when, on the Sunday after the rejection of the Treaty of Peace by the Senate, he took for his text the words: "And Noah was drunk." In a fairer, juster day men will turn the pages of his prophetic witness and thank God for a man who was clear-visioned under a cloudy sky, and whose testimony for righteousness, no less than his rebuke of evil, was uttered with gentleness of heart and the dignity of a golden voice.

Truly it is a great ministry, worthy of honor in all the churches, its influence more wide-ranging than the minister himself knows, and in ways no art can trace. To his younger brethren—some of whom toil alone in far places—it is a comfort and joy just to know that he is there, keeping the light of God aglow amid the glare of Broadway. His genius as preacher and pastor is only equalled by his wealth of friendship, his brotherly kindness, his sagacity in counsel, and his leadership in all Christian enterprise. Every man of us knows that whoever else may lose heart, let go of faith, or lower the ideal of the minister of Christ, that will Dr. Jefferson never! In days when the church is the target of every kind of calumny, and many fall away, he bids us lift up our hearts, remembering the words of the Lord Jesus how he said:

"I will build my church." He is at work. The church is no little private enterprise of ours. It is his. We are collaborators with him. Critics rage and brilliant writers imagine a vain thing. Kings and rulers in divers realms take counsel together and agree that the glory of the church is departing. The Lord holds them in derision. The church is not obsolescent. Humanity has not outgrown it. Its noon is not behind it. Its triumphal career has only begun. We are toiling amid the mists of the early morning. It is the rising sun that smites our foreheads, and we cannot even dream of the victory which is to be. We work upon an enduring institution. After the flags of republics and empires have been blown to tatters and the earth itself has tasted death, the church of Jesus shall stand forth glorious, free from blemish and mark of decay, the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it. Therefore, my beloved brethren, in these confused and confusing days, be steadfast, immovable in the presence of the world's clamor and rancor, always building your life and the lives of as many as God entrusts to your keeping, into the church of the Lord, for as much as you know that such labor is not in vain in the Lord.

British Table Talk

Limington, August 27, 1921.

NOT far away from the ancient port of Lymington, where I am staying, lies Beaulieu Abbey. To visit that fragment of an old Cistercian home is one of the delights offered by the New Forest. It is beautifully and reverently guarded. But what a wonder it must have been in the days before Henry VIII gave it away, or rather sold it. This land must seem to visitors from the west most wealthy in its ancient remains; but sometimes in such strangely beautiful places like Beaulieu the heart grows angry with the waste and decay which have robbed us of so much of our inheritance. Near to Beaulieu is the charming hamlet of Buckler's Hard, where little more than a hundred years ago they built many ships of the British navy. There the "Agamemnon" which fought at Trafalgar was built; and now there are about a score of houses near and a small wooden jetty or two! Buckler's Hard decreased while Portsmouth increased. Will the time ever come when the dockyards of Portsmouth will be as those of this pretty little village on the Beaulieu river? But these are only holiday dreams!

The Hayes, Swanwick

After an absence of several years it was good once more to live in the Hayes, that home of good fellowship, for the better part of a fortnight. It is a large hostel, set apart during a great part of the year for conferences. The two conferences in which I had my share were called by the London Missionary Society and by the Free Church Fellowship and both were as good as they could be. In the London Missionary Society there were nearly 300 members—missionaries and other officials, senior friends and, best of all, crowds of junior friends, all as keen as the keenest of their elders. It was a cheering sight to see those to whom the future belongs already absorbed in this most wonderful of adventures. There was even a runner of international standard with us! But most significant was the presence with us of Mr. Albert Mansbridge, who is the apostle of adult education in these islands and beyond. This was a sign of that larger interpretation of missions which sets this enterprise in the heart of all that is being planned for the kingdom of God on earth. Nothing is foreign to it. One of the laymen present, a man of great ability and distinction in the industrial and political life of this land, said that the time had come for him, as for all men of middle life, to determine to what ends he could most whole-heartedly devote the remainder of his years. He had had to revalue all the concerns of life, and this was his verdict: there was no enterprise so glorious and so utterly worthy of the best gifts which any man could offer as the missionary adventure. Of this he spoke with passionate intensity. There are still members of the churches and those without who imagine that missionary enthusiasts are narrow-minded fanatics. In reality they stand out among their fellows by reason of their wide and noble vision of the whole of life.

* * *

The Missionary

And it would disconcert such critics to meet the missionary as he is—a big-hearted, merry human being! We liked to chaff the missionaries on their skill at lawn tennis. Two of them fought out the championship in a thrilling finish. One of them won the short distance race against our international—it is true he had a start, but not a long start for a man of 51! Towards such men it is impossible not to feel as R. L. S. felt towards Tamate James Chalmers of New Guinea. They have their stories to tell of hardship and adventure, but not one, whether in China or India or Africa, wanted to change places with any man on the face of the earth. The last thing they seek is pity. At the close of the London Missionary Society conference the Chinese students in Great Britain came to share the building in the joint meeting of Christians and non-Christians. If there are jollier people than those Chinese, it has not been my privilege to see them. They were courtesy itself, and all of us came to have a great admiration for their merry ways and their friendliness. On the Saturday evening the Chinese ambassador honored them with a visit and on the Sunday Mr. Nelson Bitton, home secretary of the L. M. S., preached to their conference.

Revival— To What?

Following upon the London Missionary Society conference came the Free Church Fellowship, to which I tarried. We were considering the character of Christian experience, especially as that is related to the revival of Christianity, for which we are praying. To what? It was largely a conference busied with experimental religion. We began with meditations by chosen scholars upon Jesus Christ and the character of his life. This was the tragedy: Jesus lived in a land where there were activists who wished to force the hand of God and so to bring in his kingdom; and there were also passivists who, like the pharisees, declared that God would bring it in his own time and man could not hasten him. Jesus was crucified clearly because he was thought to be an activist by the rulers. He was left to his fate by his Galileans because he was not activist enough. Barabbas was chosen because of his attitude, there was no conceivable doubt. From this starting point, Mr. C. R. Dodd of Mansfield traced with rare power the real meaning of faith as it was taught by Jesus and expressed by him. More will be heard of this little paper. Afterwards there was a strong delineation of the Christian experience as it was found in St. Paul, and later in John Woolman. Then it fell to me to trace the Christian experience in the high light of the historic revivals. All this was preliminary to the discussion in groups whose reports were afterwards presented to the conference of the distinctive Christian experience. What is, for example, the difference between a good man who is not a Christian, and a Christian? What will be the distinctive marks which we must expect in this age from the action of the divine spirit? How will it be related to the peculiar needs of this time? As it always happens, we seemed for a time in confusion, so many are the phases of such themes. But we have always believed that in the frank interchange of experiences and thoughts we are guided into the mind of Christ, and this will be no exception. Amid all the talk of the moment it is worth while to prepare by careful and sincere thinking for the day of the Lord. We do not know and cannot know the times and seasons. He always comes a thief in the night. But "blessed are those servants whom their Lord when he comes shall find so doing." So doing what? Their own appointed job.

Modern Churchmen in Conference

The attentions of the press are somewhat embarrassing to church assemblies. The modern churchmen have been exposed to much criticism and censure for the utterances reported from their annual conference. It should be said that the members of a conference of such a character cannot be held responsible for all that is said. Dr. Foakes-Jackson, for example, spoke at the conference in his own name, but quite evidently his positions upon Christian origins were rejected by most of his hearers. Canon Barnes is most emphatic in his rejection of the interpretation offered by Dr. Lake and his colleague, and in justice to the conference his sermon delivered at the close should be remembered. "It is difficult for me to summarize the results of your conference. I am an evangelical; I cannot call myself a modernist. As you know, I answer all the questions just asked in the old way. Probably all who have been present would wish to assert that they also are evangelicals, firmly convinced that the gospel of Jesus is the religious message of God to man. Yet one or two, in discussing subjects where language cannot adequately express feeling, have seemed to doubt whether the Jesus of history was the unique person in whom St. Paul and St. John saw the only-begotten son. I weigh, without prejudice I trust, all that they have said. In the end I feel no hesitation in affirming that Jesus rose from the dead to become the living Christ, one with the Holy Spirit. We all seek for truth. But, whereas to some truth seems a tide destined to rise and sweep destructively across lands where Jesus reigned as the son of God, to me it is the power which will set free new streams to irrigate his kingdom."

The author of these words is the preacher whose words roused such a storm last year!

Sir Alfred W. W. Dale

Sir Alfred Dale, the son of Dr. Dale of Birmingham, died suddenly of pneumonia. It was my privilege to serve with him on the Mansfield College Board of Education. I learned to know his great gifts and his unaffected kindness. During his life he held many important offices in Cambridge and in Liverpool. But to the wider world he will be remembered as the biographer of his father. That book is one of the very best of biographies, and nothing could be more beautiful than the spirit of reverence and candor which pervades the book. Towards the end Sir Alfred was busy upon the life of Origen, but that will remain incomplete. As he advanced in years he became singularly like his father—and now another link with the greatest of all our divines in the last generation is snapped.

Christ and Baptism

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I read with interest the recent communication by Dr. Lhamon in your paper. His statements are correct, notwithstanding the criticisms made on his article. Jesus did not originate baptism. He found it already in existence and merely submitted to an existing rite.

To a lawyer, who is accustomed to look at the substance rather than the form of things, it is plain that what he meant to stress was not a particular form, but the substantive fact of separation from the world and entrance into a new society. It must at least be said that there is room here for two opinions. If that be true, then to refuse fellowship with religious bodies who adopt a different mode of performing this substantive act of separation from the world and entrance into a new society is to lose sight of the substance and chase the shadow; it is to be dogmatic, and assume, as Dr. Lhamon says, "infallibility" in a particular interpretation. Shall We Apologize to Satan?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Isn't it about time for us to leave off being so gentle as to hesitate to strike Satan a blow in the face for fear of offending a pacifist Christ. Your careful correspondent in the issue of the eighth instant appears to feel horrified at the idea of including "Onward Christian Soldiers" in the group of ten hymns for children of the church. Following him one would almost turn after the manner of our British cousins and say, "Sorry," or with the French to exclaim in subdued tones, "Pardon, Monsieur," as one makes an attack on sin. Must we preface our attacks on the forces of evil with an apology to the effect that really we mean no insult or offense? Can we imagine Jesus standing in the temple with the whip in his hand and with indignation flashing from his eye yet fearing or hesitating to speak in full rounded tones of anger to those who were abusing the house of God? As he spoke to the pharisees did he introduce his thought with a humble explanation that he intended no offense? There is the danger of eliminating so much of the virile as to leave our religion a mere pulp of inoffensive and ineffectual persuasion. What we need is not so much of persuasion as of declaration. The gospel of Jesus Christ is not merely a gospel of invitation. It is that but it is infinitely more than that. It is a gospel of definition. It is a militant gospel. It therefore must have hymns of victory and of conquest. Let the church go forward "marching as to war." If "the late government of the Sublime Porte" wishes to expurgate this hymn of the victory of Jesus Christ over all let that government do so, but let not any genuine Christian man seek to turn the conquering Christ, "our royal Master," into a graceful president of a woman's bazaar or the toastmaster at a pink tea.

Is Pacifism Radical Enough?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The article by Rufus M. Jones on "War and the Teachings of Jesus" is a challenge to our whole civilization. A letter can be of but limited length, but I would like to raise the following questions, although their brevity must lend itself to misconceptions.

1. If Jesus seems to be a pacifist and a philosophical anarchist from the historical evidence of the gospels, does that settle the matter for us today? A righteous war in self-defense, if there can be such a thing, is one way of trying to settle a question. That is, it is force used to the nth degree. Jesus fought hard and sometimes harshly in the realm of the intellect and the spirit of men. Is the method of just war, meant to accomplish the same ends aimed at by Jesus, essentially wrong? It is carrying the spirit of Jesus into the material forces, using them to work out spiritual ends? If it would not be presumptuous, I would suggest that pacifists, in dividing the world into two camps, have not made the division radical enough.

2. Bishop Schrembs in his installation sermon in the Roman Catholic diocese of Cleveland, says: "All power! Symbol of heaven. 'All power is given to me in heaven and on earth.' And it was by virtue of this power he continued and gave the apostles this solemn admonition: 'Go into the whole world and teach all nations. Teach them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you. And behold, I am with you always even to the consummation of the world.' There is the chart and history of the Catholic episcopate, running back through a long and unbroken succession to the apostles who stood on the mount of the ascension and heard these words pass over them and penetrate, as it were, into the innermost depths of their souls, and constituted them Christ's vice-regents here on earth."

In other words, Jesus claims all power in heaven and earth, and the Roman Catholic hierarchy have now the power on Jesus. Their vice-regency is challenged by Protestants. Do Protestants challenge the first statement? Frankly I believe rational Protestants who desire earnestly the spirit of Christ do challenge the first statement. We do not believe that Jesus has all power in earth and heaven, or that he is the God of all. The theological note is rightly struck by Mr. Jones in the beginning of his article. And I believe we will not accept in the future an infallible church, nor an infallible book, nor the assumption that we know all about the life of Christ. Certainly we do not know everything that Jesus did, or said, or thought. How then can we know that his life was omniscient? The foundation of a building is not the whole. Our experience seems to prove that nothing is perfect, and the truth alone frees us.

Are Girls Ruined By Dancing?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: On every hand we hear vehement condemnation and equally earnest defence of the public dance hall, but to most of the citizens it is a doubtful question as to whether the dance hall is harmful, beneficial or neutral. Many assertions are made concerning the number of girls ruined by dance hall influences, some writers having placed the estimate as high as seventy-five per cent of all the ruined girls of America. In order to get accurate information on the subject I began nearly one year ago a survey of homes and institutions for the shelter and cure of unfortunate and criminally inclined girls. This survey was accomplished by a questionnaire which was mailed to such homes in every state in the union, replies being received from thirty-four states, most of them east of the Mississippi River. Owing to this being the first attempt ever made to assemble accurate information on this subject, many of those in charge of homes could supply no material of importance. Questionnaires were sent indiscriminately to all homes listed in the Census Report, but no replies were ever received from homes under Catholic Church influence, nor would they assign a reason for their silence although they were repeatedly asked to do so. All other homes, both public and private, responded. The following facts have been compiled as being the most important ones for present consideration:

The minimum age of inmates was twelve years; the maximum age reported was twenty-six.

The dangerous age was shown to be sixteen years, and of the total number of inmates, twenty-three per cent or nearly one-fourth were of this age.

Eighty-two per cent or more than three-fourths of all the girls reported were fifteen to eighteen years of age inclusive.

Thirty-six per cent of this mass of girls were reported to be dance hall habitués.

Twenty-eight per cent admitted that they came to their ruin through the dance hall influences.

The superintendents of homes were asked to recommend a policy toward the public dance hall and while not all of them replied to this question, enough of them answered to show the drift of opinion.

Forty-four per cent favored abolition of the dance hall; forty per cent believed stricter laws and supervision by police-women would solve the problem they admit exists; twelve per cent lay the blame on the parents, who, they say, have failed to use proper discretion concerning their daughters' associates; and four per cent would substitute other wholesome amusements.

Probably the most striking fact uncovered by this survey is the constantly decreasing average age of the inmates of homes for unfortunate girls. Several years ago it was rare to admit a girl under twenty years of age, while the ages ran as high as thirty-five. Today the maximum has dropped to twenty-six and only one girl of that age was found in the thirty-four states covered by my survey. Very few were over twenty years of age, while nearly one-fourth of them are under sixteen. Picture to yourself the ordinary sixteen year old high school student and you can better appreciate that appalling fact. That sixteen is the dangerous age shows bad for the homes of the United States. The youngest girls reported were twelve, which is barely the age of physical ability. However, there were more girls at the two ages of twelve and thirteen than there were at the six ages of twenty-one to twenty-six inclusive.

Many superintendents of homes have testified that they have had to send girls to hospitals, before they could be admitted to homes, on account of venereal disease. In other homes where this precaution was not taken innocent inmates have been infected through contact with diseased girls. This leads one to wonder just what effect the dance hall is having on the spread of social disease. Visiting a hall the evening of the Fourth of July last at Wichita, Kansas, I was struck by the flapper type of girls and the effeminate, parasitic type of young men. All looked pale and listless, while many had different forms of skin disease plainly in evidence. Judging from the appearance of the habitués of the public dance halls one is led to believe that little assistance may be expected from them toward the eradication of social diseases.

Many people condemn the public dance hall as unsafe but contend that the club dance and the private dances are safe for their daughters to attend. Many police officials, among them the Head of Women Police in Indianapolis, and the Department of Public Welfare of Philadelphia, have testified that the club dance has caused them more trouble than the public halls. Dr. Phelan made a survey of ordinances governing dance halls and found that most cities prohibit certain forms of dancing that club dances and private dances indulge in freely. One institution in Texas unsolicitedly sheds some light on this question. They stated that thirty-nine girls were in the home, and of them fourteen had attended both public and private dances while twenty-five had attended private dances only. The facts are not voluminous enough to give this as exact for the entire country, but it does show the condition in one home which draws from a large section of the state of Texas.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Gospel and the City*

WE have heard that the church is dying out in the rural sections. Where, then, is the church growing? Every city pastor will tell you how difficult it is to reach the vast masses in the large centers of population. Is it only in the county-seats and in the larger towns that the gospel is winning its way? The city churches are growing, but whether they are keeping up with the phenomenal growth of urban communities is a matter for careful statistics to determine. There is no doubt that churches grow in the more favored sections of cities and in the suburbs, but the downtown situations are most difficult. There is no doubt but that outstanding preachers build up their congregations, but most pastors cannot, in the nature of the case, be remarkable. Paul took to the cities. Antioch, Philip, Athens (although he failed there), Corinth, Ephesus, Rome—these and other cities claimed his attention and challenged his energies. In the lesson today we find him starting the church in the commercial centre of Corinth—a wicked material-minded place. It was a hard task, but Paul succeeded. We cannot forget, however, that Paul was one of the most remarkable men that ever walked this earth in any age. Well-bred, well-schooled, widely-experienced and especially endowed. I have just finished reading the autobiography of Gipsy Smith. From first to last it is the story of continued successes, of vast crowds, of striking victories. Gipsy sings like a lark, his pathos is touching, his personality wins everywhere, he is carried upon men's shoulders, his carriage is drawn by men, instead of horses, strong and rich friends back him, he wins where others fail. He is extraordinary—only one in a million can be like him, maybe one in a generation. It was so with Paul. He was no common man. He had no ordinary experience. Men would have plucked out their eyes and given them to him. Men either wanted to kill him or worship him. He was an orator but more than an orator. He had the burning heart. He kindled a fire wherever he stopped. Chained to a soldier, he won him for Christ; bound in a dungeon, he sang the gospel; imprisoned, he preached to the governor; wrecked, he commanded the crew; arrested, he won the crowd; left for dead, he got up and started to preach again. He was indomitable, fearless, indefatigable. Above all and under all was the tremendous fact that he had seen Christ. You simply cannot get ahead of experience. When they asked the blind man, who had been healed, all sorts of technical questions he came back with: "I don't know all that, but one thing I do know, I was blind, now I see, HE healed me." There is no answer to that. In a western city the lawyers for the defence thought that they had, by circumstantial evidence, proved that the murderer was guiltless. Then the other side called an old woman to the bar. Her testimony was: "I seen him"! That was all. "I seen him"—very poor English it may be, but very good testimony and the guilty man hung for it. Paul had seen the Lord. "How?" ask the critics. Was it auto-suggestion? Did he have a fit? Was it a sun-stroke? Was it psychological? Paul had no difficulty with this business—he had had the experience. He knew what he was talking about. He knew that Jesus was not a dead hero but a Living Lord. That was his power. With that conviction Paul could set asbestos on fire. He could start a church even in Corinth, with its temples reeking with prostitution and its inhabitants mad over the dollar—or whatever they called the big coin in those days!

He began very quietly. No brass bands or placards. He met a friend and they started to make goat-hair tents. As they made and sold tents they preached. The fire began to burn. Converts began to appear everywhere. He got into the synagog and the next thing you know, Crispus, the ruler, was turning Christian with all his family. Things began to move. The fire began to get hot. The next word is "many." "Many" believed and the church was started. For eighteen months Paul stayed there and when he left, a strong church was established. It was not a perfect church—sometimes it seems to me it was the most human church in the world. They quarreled, they split up into parties, they went back to the old evil habits, they turned the communion into a revelry and got drunk! A pretty hard lot, and how Paul did haul them over the coals! But after all a strong church developed in that ancient New York—that trading center. It should give us courage. It can be done. What we need is a more vital sense of the presence of the Living Lord and a more complete consecration to our work. The fight for Christ must be won in our cities and we must lead that fight. God help us!

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Hunting Heresy in the Unitarian Denomination

If a man would escape the heresy-hunters, he must travel on beyond the Unitarian denomination. That body is now engaged in keen debate over the religious views of Dr. Dietrick of Minneapolis. Dr. Dodson thinks the Minneapolis divine has opened the door to out and out atheism. The issue seems to be over the right conception of God. The most common thought of deity among Unitarians has been expressed in terms of absolute idealism. Some of the newer interpreters now have a pragmatist conception of God or some such idea as that held by H. G. Wells, of a "human God." Rev. Edward Booth Young, a newcomer into the Unitarian fold from the Episcopal church, wants the church to draw up a "plain setting forth of its faith in God." If it ever tries to draw up anything on which Unitarians will agree the discussions will be worth going a long way to hear.

Religious Revival Looked for in Europe

England has a new evangelist who has recently held a series of meetings at the university city of Cambridge, assisted by Gipsy Smith, and in Germany there are many evidences that the wave of anti-religion has spent itself. The German Teachers' Association in 1919 decided by a small majority against the retention of religious instruction as a part of the public school curriculum. Since then a strong reaction has set in, and the sentiment in various cities is greatly in favor of the religious instruction. The Stuttgart teachers were the first to change their minds on this matter and they were at once followed by the teachers of Westphalia. In Hesse-Nassau 95 per cent of the teachers favor the religious instruction.

Large Deficits in Congregational Boards

The missionary societies of the world find themselves greatly embarrassed by the present condition of world finance. The result is that many of these boards are bearing heavy deficits. The Congregational women's boards are borrowing ever larger sums, and the total amount of their borrowings is now in the neighborhood of $175,000. In the view of the denominational organ, the Congregationalist, the situation is serious.

Making a Small Denomination Known Everywhere

It has been the printing press which has redeemed the small radical denominations from hopeless obscurity. There are as many members of the Dutch Reformed church as there are of the Unitarian church approximately. But who knows much about the Reformed church? Everybody knows that Unitarians reject the notion of a superhuman Christ. The Universalists likewise are not as large a body as the United Presbyterians or the United Brethren. But everybody knows that the Universalists believe in universal salvation through a fatherly God. How is it done? The story is easily understood when one gets the statistics on the publishing interests. The Universalist denomination, small as it is, circulated last year 34,100 books and pamphlets, 276,000 tracts and booklets free. That they believe they get returns is shown by the fact that the past year they made an increase in this work of 300 per cent. A skillful publicity bureau has made Christian Science known everywhere, and has given Millennial Dawn entree in several million homes in America, though the converts to some of these absurdities have been relatively few. Why have evangelical churches been so slow to read the significance of these facts?

Evolution in the Buddhist Religion

The measure of Christian influence on the mission field can scarcely be measured by the statistics on converts. There are other more significant facts which show the change in the beliefs of the people. The Christian Work speaks about the change in the Buddhist religion in Japan in these words: "There is a tendency among the priests of every denomination of Buddhism to popularize the Buddhist belief by participation in social service, which up to this time they have neglected. A chair of sociology has been established at the Jodo Sect College at Sugamo, at Setagaya, and at Osaka, where every scheme of social service is to be investigated. A social service bureau has also been established where relief work, special missionary work, will be undertaken. The new temple of Zojoji, now under construction, will be the headquarters on its completion in 1924 and a special organization for social services will be formed by the priests of the Jodo sect, where funerals will be conducted for the poor families free of charge. Prayers for the peace of the spirits of the fowls killed for the tables of Tokyo residents will be offered by three hundred poultry dealers of Tokyo at the Hachiman shrine in Tomikawa-sho, Fukagawa-ku, twice a year hereafter. Heretofore this ceremony has taken place annually on September 20."

Union Policy for Australia Changed

The plan of making an organic union of the Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational churches in Australia has not come to success, so an intermediate step will now be tried, the avowed object of which is to prepare the way for organic union. A Council of Cooperation has been formed which is made up of thirty-six members elected by the state assemblies of the three churches. This council has no executive power and can only make recommendations to the various denominational authorities. Subcommittees are appointed for various purposes. The following kinds of cooperation have been set up by these subcommittees: (1) Home mission and church extension work (including immigration); (2) secondary education and hostels; (3) young people's departments (including religious instruction in public schools); (4) training of candidates for the ministry; (5) temperance and morals; (6) devotional fellowship and evangelism. Very effective cooperation in ministerial training is already being carried on by the theological colleges.

Service and Exchange Department

If one is a Baptist one may get rid of the old hymnbooks that clutter up the choir loft or the library at the church. The Baptists now have a service and exchange department which renders aid free of charge. One can find out where to secure a Baptist physician or high school principal. The big item of service is that which relates to the location of ministers. The exchange provides useful information for both the ministers and the churches.

Baptists Out in the Northwest Want no Fundamentalist Meeting

Fundamentalists, through their meetings at Buffalo and Des Moines, have made the Baptists the most talked-of denomination. The rank and file do not like the kind of publicity that has come to them. Seattle gets the next convention. The board of the West Washington Convention has passed a formal resolution, after consulting leading Baptists in its constituency, that it wants no pre-convention meetings. This serves notice on the Fundamentalists that they are not wanted up in the northwest. Whether they will attempt to hold a meeting where they have been invited to stay away, or whether they will abandon their separate organization is a problem. Meanwhile the denominational press continues to express its disapproval of the big gift to home missions with a fundamentalist "creed" pinned to it.

Romance in Chicago's Slums

Disciples Brotherhood House has some pretty prosaic duties to perform at times. Mr. Brown has had to patrol the confines of the building during public meetings to prevent disturbances from boys. Miss Deming has had to take in more than one baby wrapped in rags, and give it its first bath and outfit of clothes. The house father, Rev. Karl Borders, finds himself often face to face with some pretty plain duties. But this has not prevented the play of romance. Mr. Brown and Miss Deming confessed to the house father recently a romantic attachment. The latter gave it his blessing. The young people wanted to have the most romantic of weddings, so they repaired to the dunes of Lake Michigan at a sunrise one Sunday morning clad in their khaki hiking suits and the minister, Rev. Karl Borders, also in his hiking suit, spoke the words that made the two lovers one for life. The young people are students at the university of Chicago and they will continue their ministrations for homeless Russian men, hapless gypsy children and all the other strange inhabitants of a neighborhood on the edge of the ghetto.

Hitch Comes in Union Negotiations

Methodist reunion in the United States seems to have come to an impasse. The southern newspapers claim that the trouble all arises from the attitude of the northern church. One does not need to be told what the northern opinion is. Aside from the problem of the status of the Negro in the church, there is little of importance to arbitrate. Meanwhile there has been much artful dodging of this fundamental problem. Southern leaders have expressed the opinion that the whole matter of reunion is indefinitely postponed, but the northern leaders claim they are still looking for a way out of the difficulties.

New Profession for Ministers

Just as medical men have become so diversified into specialists that they must send a man around from physician to physician in a difficult diagnosis, so religious work is undergoing a similar specialization. One of the new religious professions is that of welfare worker in a factory. Rev. John Paul Stafford, a Methodist minister, is head of the welfare work in all the Swift plants in the world. He is on the industrial relations committee. Americanization work is administered from his office. He superintends the recreational activities of the various plants. A graduate of De Pauw University and of the Boston School of Theology, he further trained himself for his service by the pastoral care of an institutional church in Chicago. The welfare workers in most of the great corporations are ministers, for these are the men that get the human point of view necessary in such a job.

How to Tell a Baptist Home

You can easily know when you get into the home of a Roman Catholic by the crucifix which you are certain to see about the house. Baptists will have a calendar this coming year with a big picture of the globe upon it. This calendar will contain descriptions of Baptist activities throughout the world, daily inspirational selections, B. Y. P. U. topics, Sunday school lessons and many other kinds of information useful to a member of the Baptist church. These calendars are put out by the Baptist General Board of Promotion, and are made to sell at fifteen cents.

Fraternal Orders Have Nothing on Methodists

The proud boast of a number of the fraternal orders is that they carry on extensive work in orphanages, old peoples' homes and hospitals. Not to mention other religious denominations in America, the Methodists have seventy-two hospitals in various sections of the land. They have eighty-three institutions in different states which engage in the care of the aged and of orphan children. This record probably excels that of any fraternal order in the land. The churches have not realized the power of such statistics in forming favorable opinion outside the church. A group of statistics on the benevolent work of all the Protestant denominations published as paid advertising in secular advertising in secular papers all over the land would be a most excellent investment.

Sunday Evening Club a Great Success

The theater church is no longer a great success in Chicago insofar as it depends upon the ministry of one man. But the Chicago Sunday Evening Club, with its constant change of speakers, has a record for the past year which certainly spells success. The average attendance for the past year was about 2,500. It is interesting to note that the seven o'clock Bible study conducted by Clifford Barnes, a layman, attracted an average audience of 2,175. This is only partly due to the fact that to gain admission many had to come early.

Pastors Cut Off Too Many Names

The ministers of the different denominations know that they receive their apportionments for the various church funds largely on the basis of the membership statistics. On this account there is less tendency to pad the lists than in former years. Indeed Bishop Stuntz of the Methodist church thinks that he has discovered a tendency to prune the lists too far. He recently warned the ministers in conference there "not to practice any rude surgery on the membership records."

Religious Workers Being Trained at Boston

It may well be doubted whether any educational institution in the country has more young people training for religious work than does Boston university. They not only have the largest graduate divinity school in the land, but they also have the astonishing information that in the various departments of the university are a thousand young people who are preparing for some form of Christian work. Many of these will never study in the divinity school at all, especially missionaries who are trained in medicine, agriculture, manual training and other kinds of specialties.

Daughter of Noted Indian Christian Dies

In telling the story of the noteworthy figures among the converts to Christianity in mission lands, there are few more dramatic figures than that of Pundita Ramadai. For a whole generation this Indian woman has carried on a work for widows and deserted wives which has challenged the sympathy of the entire Christian world. The work has grown until fifteen hundred women and girls compose her household. The direction of the industrial activities of such a large family is in itself a task to tax the strength of a great leader. The women are engaged in weaving, printing and farm work. Pundita Ramadai had a daughter, Mano Ramadai, for whom she had the very greatest affection. It had been hoped that this daughter would succeed to the leadership of the enterprise which the mother has so ably led. But Mano, after being wonderfully well trained for her duties in the best schools, died the other day. This is a great blow to the mission. Pundita Ramadai has found time amid her administrative duties for making a new translation of the New Testament in the Maharati tongue. American support of her work goes through the American Ramadai Association of Boston. The grief of the stricken mother makes her burdens doubly heavy.

Parliament Authorizes Scottish Union

The good cause of church reunion in Scotland has been put forward greatly by the enabling legislation passed by parliament recently. This does not absolutely assure union, but it removes one of the greatest obstacles to union that has been known to exist. The United Free church has within its membership those who were once members of the United Presbyterian church. These have been historically opposed to state control of the church. It is likely that some kind of compromise will be arrived at which will prevent the state from interfering in the doctrinal and religious life of the church while not disturbing the endowments and state aid which has been coming in the past.

Successful Pastor Goes to Los Angeles

Rev. Claire L. Waite has just closed a five year ministry at Colorado Springs, Colo. In that period he has received 902 accessions to the membership, almost half of these being by confession of faith. No professional evangelist has been allowed to assist, and the effort has been to secure new members upon some other basis than an appeal to fear. The shifting character of religious work in Colorado may be judged by the fact that Mr. Waite had been in service the longest of any Disciples' minister in his state when he resigned. He goes to Pico Heights church in Los Angeles, which is in the heart of a densely populated residential district.

Young People Being Dedicated to Religious Work

Some congregations among the Disciples of Christ have begun to feel their responsibility toward the recruiting of the ministry. Richmond Avenue church of Buffalo has a service for young people just before they go away to college. This year there were ten such young people, and of these six are intending to enter religious work. The pastor has addressed the young people on the reasons for entering the ministry and he urges it because it is unpopular, arduous, underpaid, thankless and lonely. Such an appeal has aroused the heroism of his young men.

Theological Seminary Connects Up With the Churches

The state university in most states has connected up with farming and industry. It is obvious that theological seminaries ought to do the same with the churches. Union seminary of New York sees this duty and has provided for this coming year a Department of Home Service. Rev. William P. Shriver, director of City and Immigrant Work for the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian church, will give a course on "The Organization and Administration of City Mission Work." Rev. Herman N. Morse will give a course on "Surveys and Statistics." Rev. Arthur L. Swift will present a course on "Social Analysis of City Problems."

Pastor of Moody Church Resigns

Rev. Paul Rader, pastor of Moody church of Chicago, has resigned. He has served six years as pastor of this church, being the successor of Rev. A. C. Dixon and Rev. R. A. Torrey. As president of the Christian Missionary Alliance he has had a growth of the sense of responsibility with regard to mission work, and it now seems to him that he should devote his full time to work on foreign fields. He has just returned from a trip around the world, and this trip has brought home to him the greatness of the missionary task. During the pastorate of Mr. Rader, Moody church changed its base to a point further north, services now being held at Clark street and North street. The church in recent years has been following the policy of frequent supplies from adjacent cities so that the pulpit ministry has presented great variety. This policy of pulpit supplies will be continued until a successor is found for Mr. Rader. It is interesting to note that this well-known exponent of the premillennial interpretation of the Bible pursued some graduate studies at Harvard after studies at the University of Denver and the University of Colorado. He was a teacher for a time, but in 1912 he became pastor of the Christian Missionary Alliance Tabernacle of Pittsburgh, where he continued three years. He has been an athletic minister of the Billy Sunday type and was at one time athletic director of Hamline university in Minnesota. His father was a Methodist minister.

Ministers of All Faiths Get Together

Boston has a unique institution in its union ministers' meeting. This organization is broad enough to take in both Unitarians and Roman Catholics. Some years ago a Roman Catholic priest served as vice president of the organization for a number of years. At the meeting on September 12, Rev. Albert C. Dieffendorfer, editor of a Unitarian paper, presided, and the principal address was made by Rev. Howard A. Bridgman, the retiring editor of the Congregationalist.

Automobile a Means of Carrying the Gospel

The automobile has often been attacked as the arch enemy of the church. It is called in the "holy-roller" circles a "devil wagon." There are abundant examples on record, however, of the benefit the machine is in the work of religion in this country. Mr. and Mrs. Wilbert P. Cooke of Washington, D. C., have recently completed forty thousand miles by travel in gospel work. In this journey they have distributed 89,000 testaments and 678,000 tracts and leaflets. Churches a considerable distance apart in the country may now have the same minister, provided they furnish him with a car. Such a gospeler as Rev. Ben N. Mitchell of Washington has adopted a car for use in his promotional activities in that far western state. One reads in the church calendars of many junkets in which churchmen use cars on religious errands.

Detroit to Have Second Gathering of Liberals

Detroit is the mecca of theological liberals this year. The Unitarians will hold their national conference there the first week in October. The Universalists will follow along two weeks later. They have an ambitious program of agenda and the leaders of the denomination will propose a budget of a half million dollars to follow their national drive of recent years. A feature of the Detroit meeting of the Universalists will be the assembling of a big mass meeting of Universalist men who belong to the new denominational order called Universalist Comrades. This organization is only a year old, but is hoped to make it quite as successful as the Unitarian Laymen's League.

Memorial Church to Frances Willard

The plan of commemorating the life and labor of great people in the church through memorial churches is taking hold in new places. Rev. Ray Eldred, the missionary, lost his life in equatorial Africa by drowning. The Disciples are engaged in gathering a fund to erect a memorial church to his memory in his old home community at Coldwater, Mich. Frances Willard was born at Churchville, N. Y. The old village Methodist church here is in a bad condition, and is not modern. Methodists will be asked to contribute to the building of a worthy monument to the memory of Miss Willard. The enterprise has the blessing of Bishop Burt.

Boston Paper Thinks We Need Better Preachers

The source of power for the ministers used to be the pulpit. In modern times the minister has become an administrator, a social factotum, a lecturer and a writer. The Boston Transcript thinks that he ought never to obscure the original function of the pulpit. In this connection it says: "Knowledge of history and sociology and exegesis and general literature are valuable to any preacher, but pulpit power is far more valuable. And most preachers, after they have been in active work for a half dozen years, and have learned that they are not endowed with the genius of Chalmers or Whitefield or Brooks, are in a more receptive state of mind toward the practice of homiletics, toward developing whatever moderate power they have, than they were when they left the theological school. Whether we like it or not, the pulpit today is in a severer competition with rivals than ever before in Christian history. Concerts, magazines, newspapers, automobiles, outdoor sports, moving pictures, and many other attractions decimate the church congregations. And the preacher, while he may urge 'duty' as the ground of church attendance, owes it to his people and to his own ordination vows to learn how to present his message in the most attractive and persuasive and compelling way of which he is capable."

Minister Arbitrates a Labor Dispute

All over the country the building trades are resisting a cut in wages with consequent tie-up of buildings and much unemployment. In Columbus, Ohio, the two parties to the dispute put their case in the hands of Rev. J. J. Tisdall as arbiter. He decided that there should be some reduction of wages at this time, and fixed the wage at $1.12½ per hour for bricklayers. This is but slightly lower than the award of Judge Landis to this trade in Chicago.

Disciples Will Back President in Peace Negotiations

President Harding will be able to count on the various religious organizations of America in any work he may do in bringing about disarmament. The Disciples of Christ at their recent convention at Winona Lake passed a resolution setting apart Armistice Sunday as a day to be known as Peace Sunday. It was also resolved that with prepared forms the churches should petition the President to end war. The Disciples are thus in cooperation with the Kenmore Plan "to kill war by petition." It is proposed that wagon loads of petitions should be delivered at the White House this fall to indicate the attitude of the Christian churches to the problem of world peace.

Methodist Year-Book Will Appear Shortly

The Methodist Year-Book for 1922 will go to press shortly, and the statistics for this volume are being compiled rapidly. The strength of this the largest Protestant denomination of America is shown clearly by these figures. They are as follows: churches, 27,146; value of property and buildings, $246,413,513; parsonages, 13,772; ministers and local preachers, 34,597; church membership, 3,859,751; Sunday schools, 26,575; Sunday school enrollment, 3,913,252.

Labor Sunday a Big Event in This Church

Throughout the land churches observed Labor Sunday or not according to the measure of their interest in the social application of the gospel of Jesus Christ. It is believed, however, that more ministers have held Labor Day services this year than in previous years. At Tabernacle Congregational church of Chicago a resolution was passed which rested for its information upon an investigation carried on by the New York Post in the coal fields of West Virginia. The resolutions protested the illegal use of state forces in West Virginia for the purposes of corporation magnates, and calls upon the President of the United States "to initiate a thorough and unbiased and prompt investigation of the alleged illegal and unjust practices of the authorities in these places, and if it be found true that the Constitution of the United States is being nullified, laws broken and justice thwarted, that steps be taken to safeguard the rights of the people now denied them, to punish those responsible for such travesties of justice, and to absolve from blame or suspicion the just operators of coal mines whose reputation is being reflected upon by the unjust acts of the less scrupulous operators." Rev. Gleford W. Lawrence is pastor of the Tabernacle Congregational church.

Disciples Ministers Get Higher Training

The number of Disciples ministers who are at this time receiving training in the great universities for the work of the ministry is ground for optimism with regard to the future of this people. The Disciples group at Yale last year was the largest denominational group there, twenty-eight students being enrolled, even more than the Congregational. In the course of the year ending June, 1921, over fifty Disciples students took courses at the University of Chicago leading to more efficient religious work. Aside from the Baptists, the Disciples are the largest religious group at this university. These young people are finding ready employment in the churches on the completion of their work, as there is widespread need of workers with adequate training for parish work.

Jugoslavia Has Methodist Conference

Protestant work, long held down by restrictive government measures in central Europe, is making great advances at this time. Bishop Blake visited the new state of Jugoslavia recently and organized a Methodist conference. The territory is polyglot, and it is significant that English was used as the language of the conference, the one language that the delegates could most understand. The conference affirmed its loyalty to the government in strong terms. This is in striking contrast to the attitude of the Roman Catholic church to the new government.

Methodists Will Hold Meeting in Detroit

Not satisfied with their splendid achievements in the centenary movement, the Methodists will hold a national conference in Detroit November 15-17, in which they will lay stress upon the world program of their denomination. It is hoped that large numbers of the church who have not contributed to the centenary fund may be led to a significant fellowship in the redemption of the world. The program for finding workers for all the fields at home and abroad is one of the items upon the docket. The meeting will be held under the direction of the committee on Conservation and Advance, which has headquarters in Chicago. The denominational leaders propose a larger cooperation with charity organizations, with jails and hospitals. The reform movements against liquor, prize fighting and gambling will be stressed. Altogether the meeting will be full of interest from start to finish as the typical Methodist enthusiasms find expression one after another.

Catholic Writer Opposes Ambassador to Rome

The Columbian, the organ of the secret order, the Knights of Columbus, carried an article recently from the pen of Maurice Francis Egan. Mr. Egan in this article comes out plainly against the proposal of establishing diplomatic relations between the Vatican and the United States. He says, "The United States has no interest which ought to be made a subject of negotiations with the holy father." There is pretty plain speech for a paper which goes to loyal Catholics. Mr. Egan is one of the most influential laymen of the church, and he knows very well that no one thing does so much to create antipathy to the Roman Catholic church as its political pretensions.

Better Racial Relations for the Southland

Death has been the teacher in the southland of the need of better racial relations. Following the riots at Tulsa there have come to be well-developed movements in many cities to bring the leaders of the two races into conference. The Y. M. C. A. has been able to set up 700 inter-racial committees in as many communities throughout the south. By means of these committees it is hoped that the extremists and the criminal of both races may be restrained in their evil deeds and the whole community be protected from murder and arson.

The Y. M. C. A. workers have not hitherto been protected by any sort of pension plan. Hence many of the secretaries as they saw old age staring them in the face have gone into secular work in order to make provision for themselves. It will be a matter of rejoicing throughout the Christian world that John D. Rockefeller, Jr., has made provision for a million dollar gift conditioned upon three millions more being raised before December 31, 1922. An interesting feature of the provision of the association for the workers is that the money given is to be regarded as "deferred salary."

Controversy Breaks Out About Syracuse University

Religious denominations are inclined to criticize their educational institutions these days, especially in the Baptist and Disciples groups. It is a little unusual for Methodist ministers to turn radical on this subject, but the New York Times asserts that Methodist ministers will refuse to support the drive for a million and a half to lift the debt from Syracuse is the alleged lack of spiritual life at the university. Ministers have spoken there to a handful of students, and the professors were conspicuously absent. The outgoing president, Chancellor James R. Day, has also been the target of attack for his ultra-conservative views in the field of economics. He has written a book against the labor unions.

Ku Klux Klan Leaders Are Mad

The leaders of the Ku Klux Klan are being manhandled by the press both north and south, both religious and secular. They now assert that they have had enough and will use their attorney to sue newspapers which in any way violate the libel law. This action in itself indicates the degree of unpopularity university. The reason for this attitude which the order has already developed in various sections of the country. No announcement has been made as to the probability of suing ministers who preach against the organization, and of these there may be a considerable number.

Of Dr. Joseph Fort Newton the American Journal of Theology says: "It is a striking fact that from a town of the Central West, whose very name is unknown to England, a preacher should have been called to the City Temple, London, a pulpit made famous by Joseph Parker and Dr. Campbell. Mr. Newton is a mystic, but of a different type. He goes back of the long line of doctrinal and ecclesiastical development to Jesus of the Gospels, to the ideal human life in whom God dwelt and through whom God revealed his redemptive love, the divine Saviour and Master of men. This life of the living Christ, touching every life, the soul of every redemptive movement, actually working in men and with men for the world's salvation. His sermons speak especially to cultivated minds, yet through their simplicity and naturalness and humanness, they make the universal appeal. Here is the real power. They do not speak the language of the church, but the language of humanity. They are real sermons of a warm, spiritual, enthusiastic manhood."

Dr. Newton is one of the favorite contributors to The Christian Century, and his books are particularly popular among our book-loving constituency.

The Sword or The Cross?

By Kirby Page

The Sword or The Cross?

From "The Nation" (New York)

"In his searching little volume, "The Sword or the Cross," Mr. Page presents with force and truth the extreme position against war which must in our opinion be taken by everybody who would be a sincere and loyal follower of the teachings of Jesus. Undoubtedly this book would not have been allowed to circulate during the war, which is but another proof of the fact that all wars constitute in themselves a denial of Jesus and everything that he stood for. Mr. Page does not hesitate to accept the logical consequences of his position. Thus he declares in answer to the question whether war is justifiable as a means of preserving political liberty that 'the following of Jesus Christ is infinitely more important than the maintenance of political liberty.' Had the Bolsheviks but had the vision to see this at Brest-Litovsk, had they but refused to fight and also to sign the shameless German demands, and thus to resist the German evil, their whole status in the world, and probably their future, would be entirely different. We wish for Mr. Page's little volume what is, alas! an impossible wish, that it be placed in the hands of every school child in this allegedly Christian nation. It would do a world of good and be a powerful weapon in the fight which is now on to save humanity from being exterminated by the very science of warfare which it has lately devised, it being today a problem whether war shall go or civilization perish. Not the least of Mr. Page's service is his final disposition of those phrases of Jesus which, together with the episode of the money-changers in the temple, are so blasphemously cited by the believers in mass-murder to make it appear that Jesus condoned what would have made all his teachings merely ghastly hypocrisy."

New Versions of the New Testament

MATTHEW ARNOLD once wrote to Charles Reade, the English novelist: "The old Bible is getting to be to us literary men of England a sealed book. We may think that we know it. we were taught it at home; we heard it read at church; perhaps we can quote some verses, or even passages; but we really know very little of it. I wish, Reade, that you would take up the Old Testament and go through it as though every page were altogether new to you—as though you had never read a line of it before. It will astonish you."

The reason of the wide popularity of the recent versions of the New Testament is simply that they aid the reader in coming to its messages with a sense of freshness. The pages glow with new interest. We recommend as the very best new translations the following:

Moffatt's New Testament, $1.50 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, gilt edges, $1.75, plus 8 cents postage).

Weymouth's New Testament, $2.00 plus 12 cents postage. (Pocket ed., $1.35 plus 8 cts.

The Shorter New Testament (Kent), $1.00 plus 10 cents postage.

The 20th Century New Testament, $2.00 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, $1.50 plus 8 cents postage).

"The Daily Altar" and the Devotional Life

WITH current developments in church history and life it becomes increasingly evident that the real need of the churches is the deepening of the devotional life of their membership, the attainment of true spiritual poise. The church cannot bring the world to Christ unless it reveals evidence of having the spirit of Christ in its own heart-life. Organizations of churches, however vast and efficient, cannot of themselves put the spirit of true religion into the heart of a single man.

"The Daily Altar"

By Herbert L. Willett and

has come into being for just such a time as this. Rev. Walter M. White, of Memphis, Tenn., reports that he is growing a new religious spirit in his great congregation through the ministry of this book in the homes of his people. Rev. B. S. Ferrall, of Buffalo, N. Y., is equally enthusiastic. And there are scores of other church leaders who are strong in their praise of The Daily Altar as the ideal manual of daily devotion needed for these strenuous and stressful times.

Looking Toward The Disarmament Congress

THE INDIANAPOLIS NEWS says: "In looking forward to the great gathering of representatives of the nations that is to meet in Washington November 11, it is the duty of Americans to cultivate a peaceful spirit, and to recognize the fact that peace can be won and enjoyed only by those who earnestly desire it, are dominated by a passion for it, and are willing to work and make sacrifices for it. A good deal more than diplomacy is needed to bring it to pass. Probably not since the beginning of the Christian era has there been a more moving call to the Christian church. Does it believe in the possibility of the fulfillment of the angelic prophecy of 'peace on earth' or is the church itself infected with the foul disease of cynicism and 'practicality?'"

It would perhaps not be too much to say that the fruitage of the coming Congress will be according to the active will and working of the Churches of Christ. If their effort results in a general and persistent demand for disarmament—or approximate disarmament—that wished-for goal will probably be attained. If the Churches are lukewarm in their attitude, the advocates of "practicality" will no doubt win the day. Ten thousand American ministers thoroughly alive and alert to this great opportunity would perhaps bring to pass the fulfillment of the ancient prophecy of perpetual peace. Every minister should have at hand the following books, as aids in a campaign for the making of sentiment for disarmament.

The Next War. By Will Irwin. By no means a war book; rather one which points out the course leading to world peace. A book, which by its general tone and by the wealth of facts and statistics that it presents, leads to comment and discussion. ($1.50.)

Economic Causes of Modern Wars. By John Bakeless. A prize essay of William College, setting forth all the economic factors which have played an important part in bringing about modern warfare. The period covered is from 1878 to 1918. ($4.)

The Sword or the Cross. By Kirby Page. Prof. Harry F. Ward, of Union Theological Seminary, says: "Mr. Page has faced the issue and has found an answer that satisfies his soul. What he has written, therefore, deserves the thoughtful consideration of all those whose duty it is to teach the people concerning the moral and spiritual validity of modern war." ($1.20.)

The Untried Door. By Richard Roberts. The author, who is pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, holds that the world has run into a blind alley, while all the time the "untried door"—Jesus' teaching—offers a way out. He maintains that Jesus' teachings are practicable today. ($1.50.)

The Proposal of Jesus. A bold challenge to the Church to show that it accepts Christ by applying his ideals to the solution of modern problems. ($2.00.)

A New Mind for the New Age. By Henry Churchill King. ($1.50.)

The Religious Basis of a Better World Order. By Joseph Fort Newton. ($1.25.)

The New Horizon in Church and State. By W. H. P. Faunce. (.80.)

World Facts and America's Responsibility. Patton. ($1.25.)

Some Aspects of International Christianity. By John Kelman. ($1.00.)

The Fruits of Victory. By Norman Angell. A sequel to "The Great Illusion," containing in as clear and vigorous a style as before, his economic arguments for internationalism. ($3.)

Hundreds of Churches of All Hymns of the

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

Rev. Joseph Fort Newton,

Church of the Divine Paternity, New York

After using the Hymns of the United Church for several months I find it in all ways adequate to the practical needs of the church. No great hymn has been found missing, and many of the newer hymns admirably express the newer emphasis and aspiration of the modern religious mind, especially its insistence upon the social meaning of the gospel. The old and the new blend without break or discord. The book is a noble interpretation of the Gospel in Song, and is itself a tie to bind together a broken church. When we argue we are divided; when we sing we are united.

Rev. H. D. C. Maclachlan,

Seventh Street Christian Church, Richmond, Va.

The hymnal is a gem. I have seen nothing on the same street with it. It contains all the classic hymns and all the worth-while new ones. Its hymns of human service and brotherhood are a genuine contribution to American hymnology. Its arrangement, topical indexing, letterpress and musical notation are beyond praise. The Aids to Worship and Responsive Readings I find very useful.

Rev. L. L. Dunnington,

Congregational Church, West Lebanon, N. H.

We are all agreed that Hymns of the United Church is the finest hymnal published. The choice of material is truly remarkable. You have saved us all the good old hymns of the past, left out the poor stuff and yet included the hymns of the new day on social aspiration, service and brotherhood. The selection and arrangement of the psalms in the Psalter are a particular joy to me

Rev. I. S. Chenoweth,

First Christian Church, Philadelphia, Pa.

I have had considerable experience with hymnals of other communions as well as with those commonly used in our churches, and I would unhesitatingly declare Hymns of the United Church to be the most acceptable for the church which recognizes its obligations to help make a better world. It does not contain a lot of the old, selfish hymns, while it does contain the best hymns inherited from the past and adds those which express the social aspirations of the twentieth century Christian.

F. E. Whitney, Dean

Defiance College, Defiance, O., Dept. of Music. Hymns of the United Church has been used in our College church services for several months and has been found very satisfactory. The very title of the book is wholesomely suggestive of one of the great ideals of the church universal today, and the sentiment of the hymns selected is such as to find a quick response in the hearts of all Christians. The music is fine and there is a wide choice of hymns for every occasion. The best of the old hymns have been retained, while some splendid new ones have been added. The book is beautifully printed and easy to read, the fact that all the stanzas are placed within the staves being a particularly desirable feature. The workmanship is excellent to the last detail. I congratulate you on having put out a hymn-book so spiritually and musically satisfying and so beautifully constructed.

Rev. W. A. Wagner,

First Congregational Church, Mitchell, S. D.

We are greatly pleased with Hymns of the United Church, which we have been using for one month. Our committee selected this hymnal after careful comparison with other leading books.

Rev. Jewell Howard,

Christian Church, Cameron, Mo.

Hymns of the United Church contains the highest class of hymns I know in one book. The forms for all occasions makes it a great help to the minister in preparing his themes. The responsive Scripture readings are the best selections I have seen. It is high class and will deeply spritualize any church that will use it. Our people are delighted with it and hope to order another hundred copies soon.

Rev. A. H. Cooke,

Park Ave. Christian Church, Des Moines, Ia.

It is a pleasure for me to say that Hymns of the United Church is the best thing that has come into our church life during the past year. The compilation embraces everything worth while; there is not a single thing in the volume that does not elevate. Both form and content are beautiful. The book helps the minister tremendously in the cultivation of the religion of the spirit; one is made to realize the beauty of holiness most vividly. How cosmopolitan is this hymnal! In singing from it one has already attained the unity of the spirit.

and HERBERT L. WILLETT, Editors

Rev. Herbert O. Allen,

Congregational Church, Sheldon, Ia.

The mechanical work on this hymnal is perfect. The binding is tasteful and flexible, and the beautiful, clear and open page with all verses printed in the staff is a continual delight. As for the editorial judgment evident in the selection of hymns and tunes, I think you have struck upon a happy medium as no others have done. Advisedly you have included several of the modern composers, and we find the good old hymns and tunes of our fathers, but you have included many of the more popular and worthy of the standard gospel hymns also—hymns that are a delight to “mere man.” In short, you have given us a thoroughly usable book for the whole people. It is possible to select hymns upon all subjects and for all classes and services. The responses also are well selected. Hymns of the United Church comes nearest to the hymnal I have been looking for during the past twenty-five years.

Rev. George H. Brown,

First Christian Church, Troy, N. Y.

We have used your book, Hymns of the United Church, for more than a year now, and I am glad to write that it is growing in favor all the time. It seems to me a perfect hymnal in every particular, and I am sure it will lend dignity to any service. The hymns are very choice, the responsive readings fine—I have never seen better—and the mechanical make-up is all that could be desired.

Rev. W. F. Rothenburger,

First Christian Church, Springfield, Ill.

After one year of constant use of Hymns of the United Church for regular worship and occasions such as are incident to the calendar of a busy church we are glad to say that it is most satisfactory. Its arrangement is most pleasing to the eye and the selection of hymns among the best in the field of hymnology.

Rev. James Watson,

University Cong. Church, Vermilion, S. D.

We are very much pleased with Hymns of the United Church. The book suits our purpose in every way. The feature which led us to decide to purchase these books was the fact that while the quality was as good as any we considered, it had the additional advantage of having the words of the hymn all contained within the score.

Rev. Clifton S. Ehlers,

Calvary Christian Church, Baltimore, Md.

Since installing the Hymns of the United Church in our church there has been a great increase in congregational singing and a deepening of the spirit of worship in consequence. Men who could not in good conscience sing some of the hymns we used in the old book, because of the sentimentality or the theological implications, sing with appreciation the great hymns of the spiritual life. It is an interesting fact that our Sunday-school, after years of use of the characteristic Sunday-school songs, are now singing out of Hymns of the United Church and are using much of the responsive material in the book.

Rev. Robt. S. Sidebotham,

Presbyterian Church, Manistique, Mich.

We selected this hymnal from all available books as the best, and have seen no reason to change our minds. We like it more as we use it more. Music and words together—a large choice of singable hymns—a rare selection of responsive readings—these are some of the things that give it a high place in our thinking. It is as free from denominational bias as any book we know.

Rev. J. E. Wolfe,

First Christian Church, Independence, Mo.

I want to tell you of our great satisfaction with Hymns of the United Church. It is thoroughly gratifying to have such an abundance of hymns that enable a congregation to express in song its deepest hopes, yearnings, aspirations in such days as these. Such a hymnal we find the Hymns of the United Church to be.

Rev. Henry P. Atkins,

Federation Secretary, Cincinnati, O.

The choice of title for this hymnal could not have been more felicitous. These are the hymns of the Kingdom—the hymns of life and service—in which the church has already united. The message of this hymnal is the true message of the pulpit.

Rev. Burris Jenkins,

Linwood Boul. Christian Church Kansas City

Hymns of the United Church, in use for some years at Linwood Boulevard, is highly satisfactory. Indeed, the book is reverent, worshipful, uplifting, inspiring. It fills precisely and fully the needs of our congregation.

GOOD FICTION

The Master of Man. By Hall Caine. This writer has taken for his new novel a subject which has had a great fascination for some of the foremost novelists—Tolstoy (Resurrection), Stevenson (Weir of Hermiston), Hawthorne (The Scarlet Letter), Scott (The Heart of Midlothian), and others. It is a story of sin and its consequences but above all "The Master of Man" is a heart romance that grips the imagination and stirs the emotions. ($1.75.)

Alice Adams. By Booth Tarkington. Author of "The Flirt." This study of an American family in vain pursuit of social and financial success is considered by many Tarkington's best works. Alice Adams, daughter of the family, is, of course, the chief center of interest. ($1.75.)

Pan. By Knut Hamsun, winner of the Nobel prize last year. Author of "The Growth of the Soil." "Pan" is published now as the third title in the collected edition of the Norwegian's works. ($2.)

The Brimming Cup. By Dorothy Canfield, author of "The Bent Twig." Of an American mother and her family—and of the struggle she wages in trying to decide whether a really honest love can survive. Said to be Dorothy Canfield's most notable book to date. ($2.00.)

Her Father's Daughter. By Gene Stratton-Porter. Applause for Gene Stratton-Porter has been expressed in the purchase of nine million copies of her works. "Her Father's Daughter" is delighting both the lovers of her nature books and the admirers of her fiction. Throughout the lovely, realistic atmosphere of these California gardenlands, and the happy surprises of the story, radiates always the winning personality of Linda Strong. ($1.75.)

Religion and Business

By Roger W. Babson

MR. BABSON is known as President of the Babson Statistical Organization, and as an expert in the science of business. But he is also a sturdy believer in the possibilities of the church. Here is the closing paragraph of his book:

"It is not the purpose of this book to suggest details of a plan for redeeming the world, but rather to emphasize the fact that the world can be redeemed socially, industrially only through religion. Governments may succeed in protecting men in freedom of effort and rights of ownership; but only religion can energize men unto a maximum of useful service and make them content with a simple material reward."

What Bigotry Costs the Church

WHAT church would not like to claim as a member Mr. Arthur Nash of Cincinnati. He has come to be known as "Golden Rule" Nash, and is in demand as an interpreter of his business ideals all over the country. He has furnished the church with a new apologetic, more convincing for our day than anything Paley ever produced. He has proved that in an actual concrete business situation the golden rule will work. In the October number of the American Magazine Mr. Nash gives us the history of his religious experiences. He has quit two communions because of ecclesiastical bigotry and narrowness. Born in an Adventist home of the strict sort, he was being educated for the ministry in that church. It was while he was training in the seminary of this denomination that he got interested in some "jail-birds" that were scorned by his pastor. Here he met a woman who was the good angel of the prisoners. When the men of his seminary denied her salvation following her death, because she was not of the true fold, Mr. Nash not only left the school, but for a time was an atheist and a tramp. The foundations of his religion had been wrecked by a denial of the work of the Holy Spirit outside the little sect to which he belonged. When he was won back to faith by a devoted wife, he became for a time pastor of a Disciples church at Bluffton, Ohio. Here he conducted the funeral of a man outside the church known as an unbeliever. For this he was censured, and once more he was adrift. A Universalist minister discovered him in Cincinnati, and a preaching experience in the Universalist church set Mr. Nash to thinking about an experiment in the practice of the golden rule. We have heard a good deal in the evangelical denominations about the things that destroy the faith of our youth. The teachers in the colleges have been excoriated. Certain progressive ministers have been pilloried. How would it do to canvas around among the young people who have left the church and find out what is the matter? In how many cases would we discover that it was narrowness and bigotry rather than modern theology which had driven promising young men from the church, as well as from the ministry?

The Triangular Irish Problem

EVEN if Sinn Fein and the British government come to terms there will yet remain the Sinn Fein-Ulster case to settle, and its settlement will not be easy. Correspondents from Ireland kept the American public well informed of the wrongs committed by the British Black and Tans. Not much has been said, however, by the secular press of the outrages upon the Ulster sympathizers committed in the name of the "Irish Republican Army." A recent letter from Ireland is reproduced in a current number of the Christian Work in which are enumerated a long list of these crimes. In this list are a number of shocking outrages committed against women and little children. Robberies were being perpetrated in order to secure guns and bicycles for the night riders. Under the reign of terror many Protestant farmers were leaving their homes and selling out, the very consummation hoped for by their enemies. The people of Ireland on both sides are living under a great strain, for civil war is always worse than war with an outside enemy. No one knows whom to trust. It is believed by most careful observers who are not violent partisans that the Irish of both the great religious systems would welcome any honorable peace. But meanwhile the cause of Ireland is in the hands of the most violent extremists. They have made demands which if they mean what they seem to mean, will never be granted by Great Britain save at the mouth of cannon and through the operations of a navy superior to hers. So long as the extremist party in Ireland is financed from the United States there will be no peace in Ireland. There can be peace, and such a peace as would have rejoiced the heart of almost any Irish nationalist up to five years ago, provided the outside world frowns down this state of seige between the partisans of the two factions in Ireland. Men in whose hearts are the roots of militarism will continue to counsel the Irish in a way to bring on more trouble. But those who favor peace through accommodation can have no patience with the extremist utterances of certain so-called friends of Ireland to be found in this country.

Society Reaping As It Has Sown

HOW do you account for so many murders and scandals in our society today? a minister was asked by a parishioner who stopped him on the street for the purpose. In reply he went into a discursive and subtle analysis of modern conditions. A better answer would have been to ask his parishioner to look at the churches and find there the explanation. The churches are almost empty of young people. Adult church members—perhaps this very parishioner among them—are saying that they “had too much religion when they were young.” So now when the young people propose a movie, a picnic or a party in place of church, there is no remonstrance in most homes. Even ministers have grown slack. An indulgent and foolish parenthood, holding loosely to its spiritual ideals, has produced a generation of pagan children. We shall have a continued harvest of tragedy and shame until we recognize that our children have more need of religious training—systematic, continuous, habitual—than of Latin and algebra.

Bible Study Is Making Progress

SOME have grown pessimistic over the place given to the Bible in modern life. They remind us of the polemical Christians of a former generation who carried their New Testaments around with them, and exacted a “Thus saith the Lord” from every one who set forth religious views. It is true that the polemical use of the Bible has greatly decreased, but another kind of appreciation has set in. Great universities are now beginning to give credit for Bible study toward bachelor degrees, and are even giving credit on entrance examinations for work done previous to matriculation. This is more true of great independent universities such as Columbia and Chicago, but it is also true of a number of the state universities of the middle west. The state universities in some instances teach Hebrew and the history of the Hebrew people, though of course they would not be allowed to teach the science of religion. There is a growing appreciation on the part of public school principals that the study of the Bible should have a larger place in the life of the growing child. Each year sees a considerable extension of the day schools of religion in various parts of the country.

These schools have passed the experimental stage in many communities, and a constituency has been cultivated to finance and support such instruction. The Daily Vacation Bible School movement has given a still wider extension to the Bible study idea. Thousands of children in cities all over the land have had the benefit of this training the past year. While the Bible was the storm center of argument, it commanded a certain kind of interest. Now that it is coming to be recognized as by inherent worth an indispensable part of our whole educational structure, it is in a much happier position. While one may make these optimistic observations, one is not convinced that the Bible yet touches life as it should and will. A decline has set in in all sorts of antiquarian interests in the schools, including the study of Greek and Latin. That the study of the Bible seems to be not only resisting this tendency but making positive gains in public interest testifies afresh to the incomparable value of its literature in the life of mankind.

Dr. Jowett Hears Call of Social Gospel

ON several occasions The Christian Century has called attention to the enlarging message of London's most popular preacher, Dr. J. H. Jowett. During his ministry as pastor of Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York and prior to that period, in Carr's Lane pulpit, Birmingham, Dr. Jowett's preaching was almost exclusively addressed to individual souls in their capacity as individuals. His New York ministry was often commented upon for its lack of the social emphasis. The hearers who enjoyed and profited by his sermons had to be familiar with biblical literature and the lore of the spiritual life. On the man in the street and on the intelligent but biblically untutored nine-tenths of the people, Dr. Jowett's delicately wrought textual interpretations were in large part lost. Returning to England as the war was closing, this master of homiletic art has heard the call to a social ministry. Without changing the essential character of his sermon method he has allowed his mind to reach out into the burly common life of politics and industry and touch the wounds and sores of our social body with the healing word of the gospel. Surrounded by strong churchmen who are identified with the labor and other social movements—notably Liggett, Clifford, Orchard, Inge and Rattenbury—and such leaders in the labor movement as Henderson, Barnes, Clynes and Snowden, who are also devout churchmen—his instinct of yokefellowship has no doubt broadened his insight and enlarged his sense of obligation to take a hand in the terrific struggle of clashing social forces that is now on. In a recent sermon he states his own point of view in words of characteristic clearness: “I find my own problems settled, at any rate in spirit and principle, and settled with great celerity, when I bring them into the light of the everlasting fatherhood of God. For me, it settles the question as to whether the factory laws should be amended in England. When the light of the divine fatherhood fell upon the little children going to their work at five in the morning, for me the question was settled. I had no difficulty with an eight-hour bill for miners when I brought the question to the everlasting Father. The problem of old age pensions for the destitute and honorable poor was speedily disposed of when I let the light of the everlasting fatherhood shine upon it. The claims of the cotters in the highlands of Scotland, crushed by the heartlessness of certain landed proprietors, seemed inevitable just when I brought them into the interpreting rays of the everlasting fatherhood."

The Call To the Heroic

GREAT Christian leaders are feeling that the call to the religious life has been put in terms that are altogether too easy and superficial. Rev. Gipsy Smith, who is preaching nightly to great audiences in Pittsburgh, on a recent Sunday evening reviewed the past thirty years of Christian effort. He asserted that some preachers have come to the place where they hold religion so cheap that it is a matter simply of holding up one's hand in a religious meeting to be counted. His appeal at the close of this sermon is worthy of a wider preaching. He said: "The majority of people want to dodge cross-bearing. They don't want privations, sufferings, danger. They don't want anything that would keep them awake at night. How many of you are willing to go out and help a fallen woman? You are ashamed to do that, but you know what Jesus said." Jesus never taught his disciples that they were to have an easy time as disciples. They might have to forsake family ties. They were to find a blessing in being persecuted for righteousness sake. The new way was not respectable. When all men speak well of us, we are in spiritual peril. He asked a certain rich man to sell all that he had. Zaccheus interpreted discipleship in terms of radical surgery to his private fortune. The call to the young man today must also be in terms of the heroic. When we ask young men to go to the mission field today, they respond in such numbers as are indicated by the fact that there are more young people at the University of Illinois preparing to be foreign missionaries than there are preparing to minister through the church at home. To do its work in the world the church need not always be numerically large, but it must always have moral quality. In its heart must burn the fire of spiritual devotion. Until Christians are ready to make of their bodies living sacrifices, the church will make no appeal to strong men and women of the world.

Psychology and the Biblical Dogma

THE dogma of the Holy Scriptures has been under discussion for some time and represents one of the great points of divergence between the passing orthodoxy and the modernism of our time. The two factors that have operated to bring about the change in the dogma are the historical study of the biblical literature—commonly called the higher criticism—and the application of the results of psychological thinking to the questions at issue. Dr. James H. Snowden, a careful theologian of the Presbyterian church and a thinker who is bravely facing realities, spoke last week before the World Alliance of Reformed Churches in Pittsburgh upon "The Written Word." Dr. Snowden called attention to the fact that a word either spoken or written never makes the same impression on any two human minds. While there is sufficient similarity of impression for human intercourse to go on, there is an overtone to a word, just as there is an overtone in musical instruments. This overtone is the element that explains the wide variety of interpretation of the Scripture. Dr. Snowden did not hesitate to assert that the divisions which separate the Presbyterian world into so many divergent sects was a result of a hard literalism in the use of Scripture. Dr. Hutton of Glasgow elaborated this idea still further. He declared that "we muse on the written word until the fire burns, and then what comes is the living Word." Both speakers called attention to the fact that the Westminster confession had never defined inspiration. The hard literalism of the verbal inspirationalists is the very thing that creates division of every sort. It is a literalism that translates "This is my body" into the Roman dogma of transubstantiation. It is a similar literalism that makes the immersionist withhold fellowship from those whom he must admit Christ has received into his fellowship. The premillennialist also has his text: "In like manner he shall come again." While Christian Science allegorizes many Scriptures, it uses with hard literalism those relating to healing. Thus an un-psychological use of the Scriptures has brought our unhappy divisions and misunderstandings. In humility we must recognize the limitations of human thought and speech. This humility is the beginning of brotherhood.

War As a "Pocketbook Proposition"

WRITING in the Atlantic Monthly for August on the "Economic Aspects of Disarmament," Frank I. Cobb, editor of the New York World, describes in prodigious figures the way this war business hits the pocketbook of the nations. Speaking of the United States alone, he states that the present expenditures for military and naval preparedness are more than the entire net expenses of the government five years ago—an amount equal to the "net earnings of all the railroads of the country in their most prosperous year." Mr. Cobb holds that the national defense is not strengthened but weakened by this enormous strain. He estimates that after destroying in the world war $348,000,000,000 in wealth and production we are now setting aside the income of $160,000,000,000 annually to pay for past and future wars. "Wars that spring from the people themselves," Mr. Cobb declares, "are few indeed; and most of the money that is now spent in preparing for another war among the white races is doubly wasted. If there is such a war during the lifetime of the next generation, on a scale equal to that of the recent war, it makes no difference who triumphs or who is defeated. Victor and vanquished alike will perish in the ruins of the civilization that they have destroyed." Writing in the World's Work for September on "Where Our Taxes Go, and Why," David F. Houston, formerly secretary of agriculture and later secretary of the treasury, says of the budget estimates for 1921 and 1922: "The striking thing is that practically all the huge total for the first year of more than $4,800,000,000, except about $401,000,000, is for war. For the second year, all except approximately $540,000,000 out of more than $3,800,000,000 is for war." The expenses for future wars, estimated at $1,766,464,000 for 1921 and at $1,580,896,000 for 1922, can be controlled, Mr. Houston says, in only one way, namely, "by removing the causes of war, by participation in an association of nations to enforce peace, and by disarmament through agreement."

The Nobler Heritage of Presbyterians

PRESBYTERIANS gathering in Pittsburgh from twenty countries to discuss religion in the light of the Calvinistic tradition afford a text for a revaluation of the inheritance which that historic Christian movement left not only to those who claim a place in the direct spiritual succession from John Calvin but to the general Christian world. Religious denominations are often confused as to their own essential genius. In the case of most of them the severest indictment is that they have not been true to their mission. They have violated their own best traditions. They remain, in every day of their continued existence, frustrating rather than fulfilling their natural destiny, undoing the work they set out to do, doing despite to the zeal and devotion and hopes of the fathers. How this came about in the history of the Disciples of Christ we set forth in an editorial several weeks ago. The story will not be fully told and the truth set forth in its frank reality until the traditions and present status of other typical denominational situations are examined.

John Calvin was at once a seer and a statesman of the first order. Though he operated in a small room he wrought out principles of religious and social life which should endear him to every American heart and induce us to write our civilization large in his debt. As a matter of fact his name is a laughing-stock among the greater number. Great areas of our religious life see red whenever his name is mentioned. Grotesque and impossible religious and social formulas are so indelibly associated with his memory that hosts of sincere American democrats bundle together all that dares be known as Calvinism and consign the whole to the flames without question or ado. It is sectarian Presbyterianism itself which has brought this evil estate to pass. The mere memory of a man is neither here nor there. But great traditions born of heroic devotion and tragic sacrifice are much too precious to be thus degraded and destroyed. They might have rendered enormously greater service than they have in the struggle which American democracy is making for its age and the ages.

Calvin is today almost universally known as a theologian. His name is popularly associated with religious formulas as lifeless and repellant as anything in theological lore. Calvin did write theology. There are extant tomes of the "Institutes," which were the product of his callow youth. Their profundity is a tribute to a mind capable of such intellectual output in its youthful immaturity. But the man and his contribution to his age, and to the unfolding civilization of subsequent centuries, are scarcely more to be judged by these hair-splitting disquisitions than is the great modern statesman to be appraised by the sophomoric lucubrations of his undergraduate exercises. The Institutes Calvin had written, revised and laid aside in practically their present form by the time he was twenty-seven years of age. The remaining almost thirty years of his life were devoted to an indefatigable statesmanship which in that short lifetime converted his city of Geneva from a notorious moral pest-hole into what Scottish emissaries, come to give it critical study, declared to be the fairest expression of the kingdom of heaven then on the earth. That was his life work, and therein lies the imperishable legacy he left to the ages.

In the hands of an unimaginative historian certain incidents and conditions of that period become very unattractive. And when upon them are plastered the formulas of the elaborate theological system of Calvin's youth the picture is grotesque indeed. But so must any historical era issue from such treatment. So will the fairest year or decade through which we ourselves have lived and struggled, when similarly taken in hand by hostile and scornful commentators of the future. In its historical setting, and emerging from the current ideals of his world, the course of Calvin, even in the matter of Servetus, who was burned at the stake in Geneva during Calvin's supremacy there, does not flame forth in more unfavorable relief than will the course, let us say, of Woodrow Wilson in the matter of Eugene V. Debs, through the perspective of three centuries.

Of course the fate of an individual is of minor concern. Whether the man Calvin is held in deserving honor or not may be allowed to pass. But it is deplorable that generation after generation should be wrought upon and made to believe that the vital energies of a great character and a great epoch and a great ideal in history lay in a bundle of dry and barren theological formulas. The historic fact is that the Presbyterianism of Geneva and of Scotland, in being transplanted to American soil found itself compelled to make an adjustment to an environment charged with sectarian rivalries and passions, and in making the adjustment, it was compelled to sacrifice much of its essential genius and greatness. This is not to overlook the fact that there were divisions in Presbyterianism before it was transported to the new world. But these divisions were real; they arose chiefly out of the social and political situation; and though deplorable, they had this virtue that they were all relevant to the big business which the movement of John Calvin and John Knox had undertaken. The divisions in the new world were chiefly ecclesiastical and doctrinal; they were outgrowths of the minor if not unessential concomitants of the Calvinistic movement and not of its inner genius. In thus turning sectarian, in the ecclesiastical sense, and entering into competition with other sects, Presbyterianism muddled the springs of its intellectual life and withheld from our American democracy the rich stream of social vision and energy which according to its genius it might have poured into it. Presbyterianism, first implanted and flourishing in Scotland, was in no sense sectarian. In these evil days of a divided Scottish church, and of Scottish communities preyed upon by all manner of freakish religious sects, it is difficult for the intelligent outlander to understand what has come over Scotland, and the present state of affairs is profoundly saddening to the pure Scottish spirit.

But confining our present thought to America, it has been nothing less than a grotesque blunder to take the precise type of religious organization developed out of hard experience in the closely knit communities of Scotland and clap it down upon the sheep ranches of Wyoming and the mining regions of Nevada. Of course Presbyterianism has not worked well under such conditions. But even passing over geographical incongruities and the impossibility of organizing sparse, widely scattered populations for effective functioning under a system originated and designed for snug little Scotland, the more tragic blunder is the attempt to make Presbyterianism work as a sect, as a faction in a given community, a little group of religious separatists contending with competing groups. The Presbyterian tradition must be radically distorted to contrive this. By its origin in Geneva and in Scotland its genius was integral with the community, with the commonwealth. The facile way in which the established and free churches of Scotland seem at this very hour about to reconcile their differences on a formula that disendows without disestablishing the church is a testimony to the socially vital and integral character of the Scotch Calvinist tradition. Other tokens of this nonsectarian social spirit are too numerous not to have significance. It has been the testimony of countless agents of good causes that the most sect-forgetful supporters, both in funds and in unreserved good will, are Presbyterian laymen. Mr. Moody, Y. M. C. A. leaders, educators, hosts and varieties of persons urging broad-gauged social and religious causes upon the American public, have again and again testified that Presbyterian lay support was far in excess of the Presbyterian proportion either of population or of means. The vote of Canadian Presbyterianism for the United Church of Canada; the call issued in 1918 by the General Assembly meeting in Columbus, O., to all evangelical bodies in America to take steps looking toward organic union; the noteworthy work of the Presbyterian social service commission in the days when Mr. Stelzle was its guiding spirit; the foreign mission policy which commits the Presbyterian board favorably to every reasonable project of unity in advance of specific discussion; such a statement as that frequently made by Dr. Robert E. Speer to the effect that he is glad the name Presbyterian cannot be satisfactorily translated into Chinese, because he is not interested in establishing the Presbyterian church in China, but only the church of Christ—these all are tokens of a generous fraternal nonsectarianism which derives directly from the inner character of the better Presbyterian heritage.

Yet in the sordid practicalities of denominational expansion, the Presbyterian way in American communities is hardly better than the ways of its neighbors. Presbyterians are wealthy. There are certain vital elements in their tradition which account for the fact. Ecclesiastical Presbyterianism has sought to buy its way into the graces of many American communities. It is a notorious fact that in home mission work no denomination has been so lavish with its subsidies. And, it might be added, no denomination has gained so little in numbers or other results for the expenditure of a given amount of money. Again and again, impecunious and impoverished religious organizations of other communions have thriven and captured the community immediately alongside of Presbyterian organizations upon which have been lavished outside home mission subsidies in sums quite staggering to their successful competitors. Presbyterian home mission subsidies have been on the whole a very poor investment, even from the sectarian point of view. Half or a third of the money expended by competitors frankly and intelligently designed for sectarian aggression has gone farther and beaten Presbyterianism in the sectarian game. This could scarcely be otherwise. Presbyterianism has sacrificed its dearest traditions when it has joined in that game.

The hour has come for each man or woman born into, or otherwise brought under the spell of, the Presbyterian tradition, to purge his or her own soul and gird anew the loins of the mind in loyalty to those elements in the tradition which have a vital contribution to make to our American democracy. Such a person should bravely rebuke, whenever and wherever it appears, any false and demoralizing sectarian aggression which is found masquerading under the Presbyterian name. It is a travesty ever to be resented that Presbyterian names and traditions should be utilized to support any in the scramble for denominational place and prestige, which, practiced now openly and now covertly, is so grievously demoralizing and sapping the vitality of our American religious life. Whatever may be said for the practice on the part of other religious groups, it is a sacrilege upon all that historic and essential Presbyterianism stands for, to engage in the practice under its auspices. Certain American religious groups were conceived of the aims and ideals of faction. They set out in the first place to divide the community life, create division, convert religion into a force for mutual antagonisms. They were usually conceived in sincere, if misguided, minds. But Presbyterianism is not of this ilk. It is a profanation of what Presbyterians must count most sacred, to make the system the instrument of such purposes.

The sectarian contest in which official religion is engaged today is a scandal to every intelligent and sincere Presbyterian group. Yet Presbyterians generally are susceptible to the specious reasoning that "because the rest selfishly strive for their own we must join in the contest." "We must hold our own in the general strife." Most people believe that the tradition will be lost unless a denominational organization to perpetuate it shall keep the field.

It is precisely this fallacy, on which sincere Presbyterians have so long been fed, which they should resolutely banish from their minds. They should refuse to listen to specious claims for any brand of sectarianism, even that which goes by the Presbyterian name. So long as the present petty competition among religious groups goes on and the Presbyterian tradition is officially sponsored by one of them, a worthy service of that tradition is impossible in American society. Once the tradition is liberated to make its way on its merits, the son of Presbyterian forbears, natural or adopted, will have true cause for glorying. And his glorying will arouse no jealousies among those of different traditional allegiances, for the ground of his glorying will be unselfish service and not the petty success of a somewhat more wealthy competitor in the unseemly religious rivalry which now disgraces American civilization. His neighbors will rejoice in such contribution as he and his tradition can make to the common good, just as he, in his turn, rejoices in the contribution to the same common ends made by his neighbor and by his differing religious tradition.

We cannot cure factionalism and at the same time seek the unholy satisfaction of creating and maintaining factions. To deplore sectarianism and still insist upon maintaining our particular sect is a kind of duplicity whose nature acute Presbyterian intelligence should not be long in recognizing. Of course sects must go, if sectarianism is to be banished, and the Presbyterian sect must go along with the rest. What possible difference can it make whether it shall go early or late? Indeed, will not that religious tradition render the largest service to American community life which first yields itself to this urgent service for the common good, and demands that the sectarian organization which assumes to represent it shall soonest disappear? A consciously disappearing brotherhood—to use a term common but not popular among Disciples—is a first rate agency of Christian unity. Can it be anything but an everlasting disgrace to be the last to make so holy and wholesome a renunciation?

The Great Gun

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I VISITED a Battleship, I and Keturah, and it was Some Ship. Yea, it was the Flagship of the Fleet. And the Captain entreated me kindly, and spake courteously unto Keturah, and we sat down in his Cabin and held converse one with another.

Likewise the Admiral, when he knew that we were on board, sent for us, and we sat down with him in his Cabin.

And we drank Tea, and there was nothing that we desired that was not done unto us.

And the Ship had many Great Guns, and twelve of them carried shells that were almost a Cubit in Diameter.

And the Captain permitted me to point one of the Great Guns, and to turn it upon its Axis, and to raise it and lower it. And it was very easy. Likewise did I look through a Telescope that was fastened to the Gun, that I might see where I was pointing it, and where it would shoot if I shot it. But I shot it not.

And I spake unto the Captain, saying, I am a Fair Shot with a Rifle, but this kind of Gun is a Little Beyond my Caliber and Range.

And the Captain said, Thou art mistaken. It is much easier to shoot this Gun than a Rifle. For with the Rifle thou must get three things in line—the object and the foresight and the hindsight; but with this, the man in the Conning Tower giveth thee the Range, and the Correction for the Wind, and all else that thou needest, and thou hast only to get the cross-wires of the Telescope upon the object, and hold them there, and that is all there is to it.

And I examined the Great Gun, and it was even so. For there was no labor of bringing the foresight down into the notch upon the rear end of the barrel and then hunting around to see if the target was anywhere on the same side of the Ship, for there was the Target and there were the cross-wires, and it was very easy to lift or lower the Great Gun or to move it to the Right Hand or the Left.

And I said, I have always supposed that this would be hard, but behold, I could do it myself.

Now this have I discovered in life, that it is often easier to do a Great Thing than a Little Thing. And there are folk who do small things with such great Labor that they have no courage to attempt anything larger; whereas, if they but knew it, the Great Task brings with it a sense of Exhilaration and Courage and High Resolve that make it easy; and when it is done, there is great joy in it.

Therefore do I say unto men, Shrink not from the Great Task. Undertake it bravely, and behold thou shalt find that it is better and less arduous than the petty tasks at which thou dost waste thy life and get nowhere.

Caesar and Christ

PROUD Caesar came in strength of steel;
The panoply of war was his.

At his command men poured forth life,
The cities perished, nations fell.

He left as heritage a blood-stained tide;
He came, he scorned, he slaughtered—
And he died.

The meek Christ came, his strength the true—
A heart of love his panoply.

At his command men found their life,
The cities flourished, nations grew.

As heritage, the reign of peace he gives;
He came, he loved, he pitied—
And he lives.

What Is The Bible?

By Conrad Henry Moehlmann

OUR question is pertinent for two reasons. The varied employment of the Bible in the past inevitably raises the issue of the essential nature of the Bible. The Bible has been employed to demonstrate the righteousness of war, to justify witchcraft, to protect the enslavement of human beings, to vindicate the consumption of intoxicating liquor, to promote polygamy, to prevent any effort to decrease social injustice, to prove a peculiar and particular brand of theology, to furnish ammunition and heavy artillery for dogmatic warfare, to repudiate the unification of the divided forces of Christianity, to construct innumerable weird and uncanny programs of the future, to develop the fanaticism of the heresy hunter, to attack the organization of this or that denomination, to produce bitter and malignant controversy over the ceremonies of the Christian religion, to secure the survival of a notable variety of fads and fancies. What in reality is the Bible?

The other reason grows out of the modern situation. Christianity is again at the parting of the ways. Long before war's cosmic cataclysm came upon us, Christianity was facing a two-fold challenge. It was being challenged for its failure frankly to meet the religious problem created by the modern economic situation. The modern man keeps on insisting that it is material under what conditions men labor and whether they are underfed and not properly clothed or housed. Christianity was also being challenged to take the lordship of Jesus seriously. The taunt has more than once been hurled at Christianity that the church worships Christ as God and then proceeds flatly to disregard his plain commandments. If Jesus is supreme, the church must obey him. Disobedience spells estrangement. If our conclusions and our life contradict him, we cease to be Christians. Or is the costly and fatal theory of Catholicism to be put into practice again? Is the church ready to deceive itself with the experiment that a small group within the church should fulfill the requirements of Jesus while the majority aims at but partial fulfilment of these same commandments? Of this the intelligent Christian should be assured, that Jesus must be supreme in the realm of duty or we become ethical heretics.

The world war merely stressed the point. If, before 1914, historical, literary and sociological criticism was being applied to the Bible, we may be certain that the Bible will be subjected to far more rigorous tests hereafter. Our reconstruction era is in a mood to overhaul everything. Nothing transmitted to us from ever so glorious a past may hope to survive in the practical world of to-morrow unless it adequately meets some of the needs of the thrilling new time. Shall the Bible be with us tomorrow?

FOUR INTERPRETATIONS

In the hope of arriving at a fair estimate of the true value of the Bible, we propose to examine four interpretations: the attitude of the Roman Catholic church, the attitude of the Protestant church as reflected in the Westminster confession, the attitude of the historian and the attitude of Christian experience toward the Bible.

I.

The answer of the Roman Catholic Church.

For the Roman Catholic, the supreme authority is not the Bible but the divine infallible witness of the church. The church preceded the Bible and produced the Bible. The church is therefore the guarantor of inspiration and the custodian of interpretation. As Augustine put it, "I would not believe the gospel unless the authority of the church moved me thereto." The Bible alone gives no sufficient description of the gospel of Christ. Man requires the unwritten teaching of divine tradition for an adequate exposition of the will of God.

The Catholic points out that there are numerous texts of the Bible. There are varying lists of the number of books in the canon. Which text is authentic? Which list possesses authority? The Christian would be in a Cretan labyrinth, eternally perplexed, if the living voice of the church did not guarantee infallibly the authenticity of the Latin Vulgate and the inspiration of all the 72 or 73 books of the Bible. Strange to relate, the authentic text had so deteriorated before the time of Jerome that Damascus requested the gifted saint to undertake a revision and had so deteriorated since Jerome's revision, at first denounced and later regarded as inspired, that Sixtus V (1590) was obliged to publish a pure and authentic text and to add a bull announcing this fact. Two years later Clement VIII recalled the authentic Sixtine text and issued the Clementine vulgate under the name of Sixtus, thus preserving papal infallibility. The bull of Clement made this authentic text the standard Roman text whereof "no word may be altered and whereof no variants may be printed." This infallible pronouncement did not prevent the equally infallible Pius X from appointing a commission which should try to "find or restore the original text as it came from the hands of Jerome uncorrupted by and stripped of subsequent admixture with other Latin copies"—a fatal though belated admission.

CHURCH AND BIBLE

The Roman Catholic church views the interpretation of the Bible as quite as important a matter as the question of its content. There is but one valid interpretation and this is locked in the vault of the church. If one's natural stupidity and invincible ignorance insist on evidence, he is directed to consider the splendid variety of opinion produced by innumerable Protestant bodies in the exercise of their human fallible interpretations. Indeed, it was to prevent pious souls from becoming perplexed that the Roman Catholic church undertook to supervise Bible reading. To be sure, local and universal laws against Bible reading were enacted by some synods, but nevertheless the Roman Catholic church has never objected to the devout perusal of the Bible and has never objected to the reading of the Bible in Hebrew, Greek and Latin! Even translations in the vernacular may be read, provided they contain the imprimatur of the bishop and censored explanations! The council of Trent penalized private interpretation. So it would seem that the good Catholic may read his vulgate Bible but may not formulate an opinion regarding it.

The Roman Catholic church insists that the Bible is a collection of writings subject to the supervision and official interpretation of the church. "The Bible in the church; the church before the Bible; the church the maker and interpreter of the Bible—that is right . . . is the Catholic position." This attitude overlooks the fact that during the first four centuries of its existence, the church in no way subordinated the Bible to itself. The Bible then belonged to the individual as to the church. When the layman gradually failed to avail himself of his undoubted privilege of reading the Bible, the church succeeded in withdrawing the Bible from the ordinary man and establishing a dictatorship over the manner and measure of its perusal.

II.

The answer of Protestantism as reflected in the Westminster confession.

The Westminster confession of faith may probably be regarded as representative of the historical Protestant attitude toward the Bible.

This confession finds the only sufficient revelation of God in the written holy scripture. It refuses to recognize any unwritten tradition as of binding authority for faith and for practise. Not 72 or 73 but 66 books were given by inspiration. The apocrypha recognized by the Roman Catholic are human writings. The authority of the holy scripture depends wholly on God, its author. The inward work of the Holy Spirit produces the acceptance of the divine authority and infallible truth of the Bible. The canon of the scripture is closed; no writings within the Bible may be removed and none may be added. While it must be granted that there are different strata of material in the Bible, that areas of the holy scripture are somewhat obscure, man cannot err as to salvation. The translated text is not immediately inspired but the Hebrew Testament and the Greek New Testament are not only immediately inspired but have been kept pure in transmission! The Swiss Formula Consensus 1675 maintained the divine inspiration of the Hebrew vowel points, although no text of the time of Jesus or several centuries thereafter contained vowel points. Moreover, the unity of the scripture may not be called in question. The sense of the scripture is one. The supreme court of religion is the Holy Spirit speaking in the scripture. Thus, the Spirit would, after all, seem superior to the written word. Further, the individual believer is entitled to free and unlimited access to and private interpretation of the Bible. The church may not intervene between the individual and the scripture.

ABSOLUTE VALUE

This answer, while granting that the Bible originated at a definite time, contends that its message in its entirety was intended for all time. The value of the Bible is absolute. Only within its pages does God speak in any final way. The Bible as such is the word of God. God speaks in an objective way in the scripture. The original text of the Bible is of immediate divine authority. The Bible is composed of the very words of God. The brain of man had naught to do with the transmission of the message. The Bible is everywhere equally the word of God. Thus it has been shown that the theology of Adam was of the Lutheran variety. Elizabeth's dogmatic system has been elucidated from a verse or two in the first chapter of Luke's gospel. Finally, this view admits no disagreements or contradictions in the Bible.

A consistent application of this point of view involves the transformation of the historically conditioned material of the Bible in universally valid dogma, erases disagreements with the magic touch of harmonization and allegory, cultivates insincerity, and turns the Bible into a vast desert.

Let us pause merely to examine the matter of the pure transmission of the text. The pronouncement of the Westminster confession is to the effect that the authentic text of the holy scripture is the Hebrew Old Testament and Greek New Testament because immediately inspired and because this text has been kept pure in transmission. No assembly of divines of even moderate intelligence could be arranged for at present which would be ruthless enough to go on record with such a statement as that. By the middle of the second century the Christian church was already in possession of two distinct types of text. In Jerome's celebrated and oft quoted letter to Damascus on the need of a revision of the common text of his time, he says, "If we are to pin our faith to the Latin texts, it is for our critics to tell us which, for there are almost as many forms of texts as there are copies of manuscripts." Erasmus described his manuscripts to be of such antiquity that they might have been written in the period of the apostles. Today we know that Erasmus did his work "headlong," that his first edition was a precipitate, that he had only a few late cursive manuscripts at his disposal, that where his Greek copy failed him in case of the apocalypse, he simply translated Latin into Greek, that he used his best manuscript but rarely.

MANY VARIATIONS IN TEXT

In his third edition Erasmus introduced a verse which he had conscientiously refused to print in his earlier editions and for which to this day no support can be found in a single independent Greek manuscript. Moreover, the textus receptus of England differs from that of the continent in over 250 instances. The differences between the revisers' text and previous texts is estimated at over 12,000 instances. The eighth edition of Tischendorf varies from the seventh edition by more than 3,500 instances. It was said of John Mill, the master textual critic of England of Bentley's time, that his New Testament noted 30,000 variations in the manuscripts of the New Testament. John Burgon, the conservative opponent of Westcott-Hort School, is responsible for the count that Alexandrinus deviates 842 times from the textus receptus; Ephraem

1,798 times; Vaticanus, 2,370 times; Sinaiticus, 3,392 times; Beza, 4,697 times. Indeed, we have over 4,000 Greek uncials, papyri, cursives, lectionaries, and no two of them are in perfect agreement. It is safe to say that no company of intelligible divines would today assert the purity of the Hebrew and Greek text.

III.

The answer of the historian.

The historian treats the Bible as a purely historical product. The Bible contains some of the literary remains of Oriental-Greek thought. Its value is relative. The Bible is literature as other literature. It is the religious classic of the Hebrew and primitive Christian church. Faith is required to make the Bible the word of God. The authority of the Bible is of a subjective sort. We have scriptures not scripture. The Bible is not a book but a collection or library of books. The Bible must be located in the general developmental process of the world. The Bible is an evolution. There is no demonstration of the authority of the Bible derivable from the preservation of its text or the manner of its composition. Indeed, man does not require objective authority at all. Man needs contact with personality. Acquaintance with the great religious personalities of the past results in religious conviction. Man needs the authority of the spirit. When one has lived in the environment of Jeremiah, Jesus, Paul, has shared their struggles, has stayed with them in their Gethsemanes, and has witnessed their triumphs, he becomes familiar with religious experience which approves or corrects his own. And this is the great essential. The longing of the modern man is for reality and sincerity and will not for a moment tolerate either the discounting or denial of facts.

FAILS IN EARNESTNESS

In its application, this view sometimes fails in moral earnestness. It not infrequently overemphasizes the background. It may know more about the mystery religions than about the ethical life. It often evaporates in a passion for the historical or the sociological. It may stir up enough critical dust to suffocate the average student. It has more than once forgotten that the development of the religious life is of far greater significance than the slant of the Greek accent or the underlying Aramaic root. It sometimes fails to view "every historical investigation as an ethical task." No investigation lacking in moral earnestness will contribute very much to our knowledge of the religious significance of the New Testament; and our quest is religious.

IV.

The answer of Christian experience.

To say no more, none of the answers considered grasps the significance of the Bible. For the Bible is not a history of dogma or of science or of sociology. It is a monument to religious experience. As it has been well put, "the Bible is a record of struggle toward God, is the history of the development of religious personality." The outstanding value of the Bible is its rich deposit of religious experience. Jesus himself is his greatest credential.

Paul is of greater significance than his views. The who counts for more than the what.

When the religious value is made primary, then "the Old Testament presents to our souls characters that are supremely worthy of our reverence because consciously centered in God and full of his power. It permits us to share the enthusiasm of the men who discovered the fundamentals of our religion and the character of our God. It is indispensable to complete discipleship to Christ, because it is the creator of the mould which his soul expanded."

Religious experience approaches the Bible without any preconceptions. It gladly grants the conclusions of the historical investigation. It recognizes documents and strata—a prophetic stratum, a priestly stratum, a Pauline stratum, a Johannine stratum, a synoptic picture of Jesus, a Johannine portrait of Christ, a mysticism of Paul that differs from the mysticism of John. It is aware that the historical background may not be neglected without penalty. It does not at all fear the relativity of the Bible.

But religious experience also affirms that even the best method of investigation is a tool, not an end. Criticism by no means settles the religious importance of a passage. We do not know Hebrews merely because we have settled that it is a homily and not a letter. We have not grasped the meaning of a parable because we have traced its development and can demonstrate its original form. The comparison of synoptic differences is but the first step in the understanding of the baptism narrative. Religious experience objects to enslavement by any method and refuses to quarrel over every verse and documentary hypothesis as if religion should immediately disintegrate if the decision went the other way. It holds that differences will cause no consternation, if the spirit of the New Testament is absorbed.

PAST EXPERIENCE

Religious experience deeply appreciates and makes use of the experience of the religious leaders of the past. It is interested in every previous interpretation of God as a value judgment. It affirms that Amos or Isaiah or John has a permanent message to struggling religious souls of today. It urges the appropriation of previous religious experience. To do this one must be in sympathy with the ideals of the Bible. To appreciate the classics, one must not only have an idea of what is classic but must also live in the classic environment. One must have the feeling of and for Sophocles to comprehend Sophocles. No one would think of being a scientist without possessing an interest in nature. He who has no love for bugs, who avoids the ugly crawlers, who will not fondle them and admire their coloration, who refuses to live in the bug world, will never publish a very interesting monograph on bugs. Precisely so, the important religious men of the Bible will never chum with us or walk by our side unless we breathe the atmosphere of the Bible and make their experience ours by repeating it. If we are not convinced that man is religious, if we refuse to exalt the spiritual, if the spirit of Jesus does not compel us, we shall not behold God in the Bible, however much we may affirm it. There are no objective markings to prove either the authenticity or the integrity of the Bible. But one cannot long contemplate the splendid devotion of the average adherent of Jesus in the most primitive period of Christianity, cannot live in the companionship of Paul for any great length of time, cannot reflect upon their hope of a glorious future where God dwells, even if his foot-prints are not to be discerned in the chaos of the present, without realizing the influence of the life here lived.

Religious experience affirms that when the Bible is studied from the angle of religious value, it is without any qualification the classic of religion. If the Christian ministry would recognize as its supreme task the study of the Bible in such a way as to ascertain its worth for the religious and ethical life of today, we should have less of the puny conflict between men who are theoretical, who are eternally interested in "to be," in discussion and in metaphysics and men who are practical, who are interested in "to have," in experience, in psychology. And we should retain the Bible for the modern man.

It was the religious experience of William Robertson

Smith that testified, "Of this I am sure at the outset, that the Bible does speak to the heart of man in words that can come only from God, that no historical research can deprive me of this conviction or make less precious the divine utterances that speak straight to the heart. For the language of these words is so clear that no readjustment of their historical setting can conceivably change the substance of them."

What the famishing religious world of today needs is contact with God. It is silently pleading with the minister to lead it back to God. Only the religion of the spirit can solve the problems of the new time. Man religious in his constitution must respond to the religious experience deposited in the Bible. And when the perplexed man of today asks for bread, for food that will sustain him in his struggle against fear, suspicion, doubt, selfishness, that will enrich him with God, shall there be handed to him a stone, dogma, a line of proof-texts, an imprimatur, a discussion of history, the proceedings of an ever so venerable council, an opinion of Bengel, a theory of Cumont, a comparative study of Frazer?

Is There Race Determination?

By Wayne C. Williams

THAT curious philosopher who once asked "Why doesn't the race commit suicide?" missed the mark.

There are plenty of good and sufficient reasons why the race does not and should not commit suicide. But if the philosopher who asked this question thereby meant to call attention to race responsibility he did humanity a favor when he asked the question.

We are not setting out to discuss race suicide at all. The debate has long since been decided by forces that began to operate before the human race arrived on the planet. Conceding, as we might, that the race could, if it chose and no other forces operated, commit suicide in a single generation and conceding what certain eminent thinkers—among them Theodore Roosevelt—hold, that at least a portion of the higher classes are committing suicide slowly, we observe that somehow the race keeps on multiplying and that some fundamental urge compels racial growth and increase.

A FUNDAMENTAL FACT

We are thus brought face to face with a profound and fundamental fact—one of those supreme facts that lie in all the truth about us and are so universal as not to compel curious attention, but so vital that they cannot wholly or ever escape attention: The fact that the race refuses to die off. Certain significant, half-known, undetermined biological impulses form a dynamic that hastens us onward, toward some unseen and dimly appreciated goal. Often in the presence of these vast and unmeasured forces the individual feels himself a mere atom, swept along in the stream of cosmic currents and uncontrollable forces that determine his own destiny for him. But this is a mistake, for the biologist and the psychologist both admit that behind all these forces lies a power of race determination as great as the power residing in an individual to determine his own choices. The race lacks only a complete race consciousness in order to determine what it will do with itself, and it is deciding its own fate.

We made the decision in part, yesterday and on all the yesterdays in which the race has been living, thinking and feeling and doing. We are making some more of it today, even while this is being read. We will make some more of it tomorrow. Thus to any man who looks out upon the moving panorama of humankind, we are seen to be weaving a loom, to be tracing a pattern, to be moving with the slow swiftness and indefinite certainty of a glacier toward some unseen end. Every day we see more of the pattern, and each new turn brings new conceptions and explodes some former theory for which men held tenaciously and perhaps fought and died.

IS THE PATTERN FIXED?

Can we change the pattern? Are we weaving to a fixed type that nothing can change, and was it predestined from the beginning just what we should weave?

Comes the biologic philosopher and says that it was all determined in the first protoplasm; that the fundamental urge is purely biological and we must look for scant meanings in microcosms and microscopic phenomena. But this gives us a purely material and biologic goal and takes away from life those ethical and spiritual values and ideals which give our race its peculiar dignity and significance in the animal world. We had better concede that the biologist has much to sustain his view, for he can show us a world, first mere vapor, then a solid globe with myriads of tiny animal forms, then gigantic animals and finally prehistoric man mounting to the civilized being we know today. Moreover he can show us man coming onto this planet very recently and a globe now swarming with his teeming millions. The biologist has much to sustain him, yet he cannot account for all.

Comes the speculative philosopher. There is a multitude of him and he is fast losing caste in a world growing definite and certain about so many things. Of course he excels in dialectic; of course no one can answer him for he cannot even answer himself. His speculations are scattered like debris over the human pathway, even from the very beginning, and he has never led the race anywhere, has never set up a single beacon light or guidepost or pointed to a single ideal. He is lost in a haze of mazy uncertainty for he always begins with the fundamental postulate that all life consists in a mere adjustment of sensory relations. So that these sages ought to greet each other in such fashion as:

"Oh, how are your readjustments reacting today? What a delightful reaction I had yesterday in adjusting myself to such and such an environment."

In short, our speculative philosopher has decided that "things are not what they seem," and lets it go at that.

Comes the social philosopher. He, at least, has a definite theory. He sees in man's progress only a struggle for existence, mere physical, human existence. He says that man first fought in the caves with wild animals, and today he fights in the factories with his fellows and his capitalistic over-lords. He finds only an economic motive behind the human drama and ruthlessly discards all such notions as love of country, of family, or sweethearts as mere trifles. Everything else must give way to man's desire for goods and gain; the world turns, and must turn, on this hinge alone. They are trying out this theory in Russia, right now, testing whether the economic motive is enough on which to bottom human society.

WILL THE RACE ARRIVE?

Comes our newest evolutionary philosopher and says that the race is working out altruism through struggle for self; that we are moving from the lower motives of egoism to the higher motives of altruism; from self to others. Fine! No one wants a much higher racial ideal than this one. We even have high church philosophers who are pointing out that Christ himself died for just this ideal and that this is the racial goal toward which a groaning humanity is painfully pushing itself. Most of us want to believe something very like this and many of us do believe it.

But granting that this is the goal of the race, toward which it is struggling and tending, what assurance have we that the race will ever reach it? We speak now of the present human race on this particular planet. Even the evolutionary philosopher, who has so much to back up his claims, dare not assure us that we will reach this goal. He can find only a tendency to reach it.

Nothing in human knowledge or human history or divine prophecy shows that we shall certainly reach the high goal set for an advancing humanity. The race may fail. The Creator may have to try the human experiment all over again on this or some other planet. Or, that part of the race which leads in civilization, the recent great nations that warred in Europe, may fail and leave to the brown and black races the attempt to reach humanity's ultimate goal of peace and permanence and the attainment of final race ideals.

Whether the race shall lose or win is, then, a determinable fact, to be decided by the race; it depends not upon outside factors or uncontrollable forces, but upon what a conscious, willing human race does about it.

We may make the choice in the next decade or generation or century or in the next æon. We may make it in this generation and we who now determine the decisions of governments and peoples may hold the destiny of the race in our own hands. Assuredly, we of the Teuton and European-Latin races hold the future of present day leading nations in our hands. So, which way shall we decide?

We may decide to kill each other off in war. Some very serious thinkers fear just this result. Some great generals who gained fame in the recent war have warned us of it. Some statesmen have given utterance to like fears. The war has shown that the race—or much the larger part of it—may blindly throw itself into one bitter struggle after another and kill and maim without stint until the fairest flower of the generation is gone. Yet here we meet another argument, for no one can say that war is always unjustifiable. On the contrary every teaching, every implication of the great struggle we have just passed through was that of stern necessity. Fight or die or be enslaved.

OMINOUS FEARS

Others fear that new and more deadly devices which science is preparing will enable men to kill each other in a more wholesale way and with more neatness and dispatch. Others fear the devastation and decay in certain hideous social diseases. Still others fear the race is losing its head in a vortex of self-seeking luxury and pleasure, with humanity lost in a whirlpool of loose living and indulgence, living solely for the hour.

Yet others see the race failing to maintain itself numerically. This class is divided into two camps: those who fear that the highly civilized races will succumb to the brown and black races through the numerical superiority of these latter races, and those who fear that the human race itself will gradually die off.

But it is up to the race!

We may state the problem another way: will the growth of race consciousness and racial conception of ideals and practices move fast enough to overcome the devastating and disintegrating tendencies now gnawing at the vitals of race integrity? Or again: how fast is race consciousness growing? Is there any standard or test by which to measure its growth? Is there, in fact, any race consciousness for all of us, humanly speaking? Does the race think of itself consciously as contradistinguished from the globe or the universe and from all other entities? Do we ever take the globe and hold it out in our hands and look it over as a whole?

The growth of national consciousness has been a marked feature of history for a thousand years. It has been accelerated and accentuated in the past six years. We have all seen great waves of national consciousness sweep over a people, in new conceptions of such problems as housing, or child labor, or recreation, or law enforcement. Is there any real growth of a consciousness that sweeps over national boundaries and forms an international consciousness? How fast must such an international consciousness grow to overcome the backward tendencies that make for either exclusive national consciousness or for no common conception of things, at all?

A THOUSAND YEARS FROM NOW

When we have answered these questions we may gain some light on whether the race is now about to fail, or may perhaps fail in a far distant future. What we must now realize is that the race will not of itself nor of necessity succeed unless we who do the thinking and deciding live up to our own highest ideals. How many actually care whether the race does fail? If an individual feels himself smug and safe and pensioned in goods or comforts or pleasures, does he really care if the race fails? Indeed is there something more than mocking in his scornful query, "What matters it a thousand years from now? Who will care then?"

Is anybody consciously planning for the next century or for the tenth generation hence? Is anybody planning for 2500 A. D? If our fate as a race lies in our own hands then why not now try consciously to meet the whole problem of the future? Why rely on unconscious motives or speculative forces? Every present day problem is being consciously solved, indeed must be so solved. Why not measure the whole thing in the light of race futures and lay out a whole program in terms of race destiny? If we then fail, we fail consciously and intelligently. And God can then try some other plan. Given a free choice, as we are, we hold race success or race failure in our own hands.

Humanity will consciously win or lose its own struggle. It has neither lost nor won. It has no license to blindly assume it will win. Victory is not its assured goal. Choice is its only visible goal. God may finally say, "Humanity failed on that planet; let us try another." Slowly, painfully, with infinite patience and trial, we are working out race destiny.

Of course this all has a bearing on the problems of the hour, on what we did yesterday and are doing today. It bears on disarmament; for who decides about disarmament? All of us or just some of us? Some probably. But why? And what motives control them? Are they afraid of a colossal failure, a stupendous and grotesque catastrophe, in which a greedy nation shall attack a defenseless one, disarmed under a mistaken idea of brotherhood? Then whose duty is it to tell the rulers of the people what to do? How soon may we expect that those who bear the burden of great armaments shall tell their rulers to disarm?

Shall we disarm? No, says competition. Yes, says brotherhood. Is the ferment of peoples in the world a sign of "deep calling unto deep," of the moving of mighty waters? Yes, says the social philosopher; it is the coming of the new day. No, says the voice of tradition, of institutions, and of visionless devotion to things as they are.

Only one mortal has ever spoken with authority upon these matters.

They called his name Jesus.

But that leads us to the door of the church and there we may leave our question.

My Visit to America

By Reginald J. Campbell

I WENT out to the Pacific coast and specifically to San Francisco on the invitation of the Bishop of California, Dr. Nichols. For some time there has been a movement on foot in this country and in America to exchange for certain periods some of our university professors and outstanding preachers and publicists, so that each country may make acquaintance with the modes of thought of the other. That movement has in the last few years been extended to promote an exchange of pulpits between ministers of religion: preachers from the United States have been occupying English pulpits and English preachers have been preaching to American congregations. The bishop wrote to me and said that on more than one ground it was desirable that I should visit California for a second time, and especially to preach in San Francisco; he thought it might render a service indirectly to my own country and in another way to that part of the world to which I was asked. But in my case this visit was of a rather special character, because the bishop asked me not for his own denomination only or chiefly, but speaking as the mouthpiece of the office-bearers of the First Congregational church in San Francisco he suggested, as that is the largest auditorium in the city, I should preach to that church on Sunday and do what I could for the Episcopal church at other times; and that was the program that was actually carried out. I went to California with that object in view, and preached for ten Sundays in the First Congregational church, a noble building, and also at other times in the Cathedral and several other Episcopal churches. But the work did not stop there. I also preached for the Methodist denomination at what they call their preachers' meeting, which is held at certain intervals, and I preached for the Presbyterians in the district. Bishop Nichols, one was gratified to find, was regarded as a true father in God not only to his own church but to all the churches. No man in the Episcopal church of the United States has greater influence than he. He has been for thirty-one years Bishop of California, and he expects, so he told me, to end his days there and he hopes in harness.

CITY OF THE ANGELS

We sailed in the Aquitania on May 14 and went from New York by Santa Fe and the Grand Canon to Los Angeles. I last visited the City of the Angels, as it is sometimes ironically called, ten years ago in the winter. I observed a phenomenal growth in the interval, and the people's pride in their city takes occasionally somewhat strange forms. They are very anxious to get ahead of San Francisco, they claim to have done it, according to the last census, and they make you aware of the fact. You go into a moving picture house, for example, and you find thrown onto the screen at intervals, particulars and statistics with reference to the growth of Los Angeles. Proposals have been brought forward for the improvement of the city, and they show pictures of what the alteration would involve, and ask loyal citizens to start the scheme. For instance, one idea is to bring water-power up to the city, so that they can increase the number of their electrical appliances, and they have a cleverly drawn picture of the water power actually in exercise—how they make a living picture of that I do not know. Printed below the picture is some such observation as this: "You see what might be if we could bring the water power to the city in this abundance"; and they close the exhibition with an appeal cast in these terms: "Why should not Los Angeles be the biggest city ever?"—by that they mean, I suppose, in the world. "It is up to you to see that we get ahead of the rest of the earth"—that is on the screen, a moving picture.

At the end of June we made our headquarters at San Francisco, but I had been preaching there on Sundays from the first Sunday in June, and I think I had the welcome of my life. First of all, the clergy of all denominations of the city and round San Francisco Bay prepared a reception on the second Monday, and that was followed a little later on by a special reception on the part of the Episcopal church clergy and laity; and indeed the receptions never ceased. I think they are the most generous and hospitable people on the face of the earth. I made a public announcement after I had been there a few weeks that I had to draw the line, that I really could not eat more than three dinners in any one evening.

There is more emphasis placed upon denominationalism there than with us, although the Bishop of California had asked me out to preach on Sundays in the pulpit of another denomination and to share my services between that and his own. The denominations do not coalesce in the same degree as the evangelical denominations in this country; nor indeed do they cooperate quite so closely as the established and non-established churches in this country are accustomed to do. So that when organic union comes, as come it will, I shall not be surprised to find that the way to it is shown by this country, rather than by America, and that America will follow suit. That is not the only way—if I may be allowed to say so, with all respect to our go-ahead cousins on this side—in which England is giving a lead to the English-speaking race as a whole. The social consciousness is not developed in the United States generally or on the Pacific coast in particular as it is developed here. Labor is not so articulate, it is not so well organized, it cannot make its needs so well known. In Los Angeles, for instance, they have what is called the open shop. Trade unionism exists, but there is no bartering, no penalizing of the free laborer who chooses not to be a member of a trade union; and all the time I was in San Francisco a great conflict was going on between trades unionism and organized capital on that very point. The employers are seeking to force the open shop, as it is called, and trades unionism is seeking to defeat that attempt. How it will go I cannot say, I do not know what the result is likely to be, but in a new country like that, where opportunities are so numerous, it is quite understandable that as every man expects sooner or later to be a capitalist himself, every man is trying to get on, where they work so much harder and so much longer than we do—it is quite understandable that labor should not be a united force to the same degree as labor in this old country is compelled to be.

AMERICANS WORK HARD

I said just now that they work much harder in America than we do. That is the first thing that impresses the visitor. Here it seems as if we have lost energy. Englishmen may tell me that it is only the fussiness of the American worker that makes you think he is doing more in the same time than the Englishman. That is not true; he is doing more, and in many cases he is doing his work better than we are doing or attempting to do it over here.

Further, you cannot but be impressed—I do not know about the rest of the United States; there is no other part of the United States in which I feel the same interest as I feel in the Pacific coast and have done ever since I went there ten years ago—you cannot help but be made aware the moment you become acquainted with the conditions of life in the Golden State, that the war has never troubled it, comparatively speaking. They think it has, and they will tell you how they were rationed after they came into the war, and how comparatively little sugar they were able to get, while we were getting none, and how heavily they were taxed. I asked them what amount of taxation they had to pay in proportion to their income, and when I told them what we have to pay they thought I was exaggerating. How true the saying is that one-half the world does not know how the other half lives! I actually met people who were foolish enough to think that England depended more upon her colonies for fighting men than upon her native strength. You would find that no educated man in any part of the world would have made that mistake. I do not mean that the generality of Americans think that, but some do.

There are some other possibilities of misunderstanding which ought to be removed and can be, but before I go on to them just let me mention the conditions of my own particular work. The Sunday morning congregation I addressed for these ten weeks consisted of about 2,000 people, or very soon did. About the third Sunday I think we were as full as we could manage to be, and I never addressed a more spiritually receptive assembly, consisting of professional men, ministers of religion of all denominations, lawyers, including United States judges, senators, university professors, and teachers in hundreds. There are two great universities close by. There is the State University of California, with 14,000 students, and there is Los Angeles University, limited to about a third of that number. That was somewhat of a surprise to me. I expected crudeness all the way round, and most of us have the idea that San Francisco is about the last word in materialism, as it is a comparatively new country, and you know what the reputation of that city used to be. I can only repeat that never anywhere have I had a congregation that was more spiritually receptive than that. But when I said so to the bishop he warned me how easy it would be to be mistaken if I were to generalize on that. He said, "We have our difficulties, as you will soon discover, and you have for the time being in this city the congregation that would be spiritually receptive. If without warning you were to go to some other congregation you might not find it quite so satisfactory."

UNBLUSHING SENSATIONALISM

Indeed, I noticed very soon a certain amount of rawness, if I may so put it, in the religious atmosphere, and unblushing sensationalism, and what we should call a lack of spirituality. How far it exists I do not know; I never met it at first hand, but it did exist. One indication thereof is the kind of advertisement you see in the newspapers concerning Sunday services.

Many preachers are accustomed to advertise their subject in an extremely—well, to our way of thinking, shockingly sensational way. For instance, the dean of the Cathedral, one of the strongest spiritual forces in the whole city, told me of a few of these that I had not seen myself but which he had. The rivalry between the south and the north, for instance, is sometimes amusing. If you tell anyone in Los Angeles that you have been in San Francisco they will say, "What in the world were you doing there? The center of things is here." And if you tell a San Francisco man that you have to go down every Monday to Los Angeles and come back every Saturday, he says, "What in the world are you doing that for? Of all the out-of-the-way places to live in Los Angeles is the worst!" They told me that in San Francisco shops there is this notice, "Stop, look, have you left anything?" In Los Angeles shops the notice runs, or should run, "Stop, look, have you anything left?"

The dean told me of an advertisement in these terms: "The Rev. Mr. So-and-So will preach on Sunday night"—the advertisement was very long, and mentioned a number of features, including a number of movie stars to be present as pulpit guests and to sit beside him and hear what he had to say on the subject of "Why Mary Fell Out of Bed." The answer proved to be, "Because she slept too near the edge," and the moral was, Keep away from the edge. Another subject was, "A Preacher's Trip in a Submarine"—it turned out to be Jonah! One pulpit subject I saw advertised was, "Why I Never Married." I came across one chalked blackboard: "Is Campbell a Christian?" It did not dawn on me for some time that it was my own character that was in question. These things are not characteristic of the religious life of California any more than of any other part of the world, but they are an element that it would be difficult to find in the same degree in this country or perhaps anywhere else in America.

MISUNDERSTANDING IS EASY

Coming to the possibilities of misunderstanding, there is, to begin with, the attitude of the people of that part of the world towards this country, their feelings toward Great Britain and the British Empire at large. I had two surprises in that connection. In the first place, I was surprised to find how bitter, relentless, unscrupulous and unceasing is the propaganda against England in certain sections of the press and in certain circles of society; and, on the other hand—we are never told this—how extraordinarily generous and whole-hearted is the admiration for England that exists in other quarters, how earnestly indeed many people contend for a fair view of this ancient country. Let me give a few illustrations.

When I entered the vestry of the church where I was to preach, before I had had an opportunity to say anything in public at all, I found a number of letters of welcome awaiting me, some very generous; but there were two, the writers of which signed their names, warning me that if I had come out to do any British propaganda I had better be careful. The letters were vaguely threatening. The writers believed and said other people believed that I was an emissary of the British government and that I had come out to try, to use their phrase, to pull the wool over the eyes of Californians. Knowing that that part of America was more pro-German than some other parts until America came into the war, and also knowing that the Japanese menace is felt more keenly on the Pacific seaboard than elsewhere. I did not think that those letters amounted to much. But more letters kept coming. I had not come to do any propaganda of any kind, but simply to preach the gospel and to address clergy and students. So I said nothing about them from the pulpit for a long time. But letters of this kind kept coming: "You are very clever, but we can see through you. What are you at, anyway? Your business is no doubt underground, like that of all the Englishmen who come this way," and so on and so forth. At last I did speak, at a Wednesday evening meeting. This was a spontaneous sort of gathering very much like those I addressed when I went to the western front during the war. After a service soldiers would come up in ones and twos and proceed to ask questions about what I had just been saying.

THE QUESTION DRAWER

The very same thing happened in San Francisco. There was a kind of reception after every service. But as hundreds of people came up to speak in their generous, free-hearted way I felt that there would have to come a term to it, and the office-bearers felt so, too. To remain for an hour after service was rather a tax. Also they had what they called a question drawer, so I offered on the Wednesdays in July to submit myself to questioning, not only on what I had been saying but on conditions in my own country. On the first Wednesday evening, as announced, we tried to hold the meeting in the lecture hall; it was not big enough, it could not be done; so we went into the church; and every Wednesday after that until I came away we held these gatherings, and they kept me on my feet for two hours answering questions. You can imagine how tired one was at the end of that exercise. You might expect that the questions would be to a large extent eccentric, foolish, superficial, and on the first Wednesday there was a group of that kind of questions that I did not answer, and there never was another. But, as aforesaid, these quasi-threatening letters kept coming; I thought I would speak out, and one Wednesday evening I did. I took one of the letters which referred to the tyranny of England, the wickedness of England, the responsibility of England for the war, the cruelty of England in Ireland, the massacre of Irish babies, and so on. I first read one of the letters out. I said: I am afraid to speak about England without being accused of being a propagandist; I am no propagandist. I have no mission here from the British government or from any authority whatsoever except the Bishop of California; and I am free to speak about England because I am not of English race, as my name perhaps would assure you, but I was born in England, I came back to England as a youth, I spent the rest of my life in England, and I want to tell you California people that I respect the English character and I love the English name; I should be a coward and a cad if I did not say that. Further, I said there is one thing that I cannot but admire in Englishmen, and the war brought that home to me as never before: the Englishman is cheerful in adversity, as most races are not; our men went into battle cheerily, as part of the game, as cheerily as your boys ever did or ever could. Furthermore, as to the part that England played in the war, there is no home in England that I know of that has not been smitten directly or indirectly as the result of the war. Eighty per cent of the Britons who fought in it were Englishmen. The audience heartily applauded the statement, and when I had finished I thought I would add another sentence. I said, further, there is one thing that Englishmen do not do—that to which the race to which the writer of this letter belongs are rather prone to—the English keep no grudge. When you can get grudge and hate out of the hearts of mankind, the war will be at an end.

JAPANESE AND IRISH

You may be sure the Japanese question came up as well as the Irish and also the disarmament conference at Washington, and also inquiries about our imperialism—and those were very awkward to answer, because now that the Central Powers have been defeated and penalized the great imperial power of the world is England. For a democratic nation to be at the same time an imperialistic nation is a very awkward thing to have to explain. But what do you think happened? When I frankly confessed that, Americans jumped to their feet, and it was Americans that defended England, and Americans who spoke about the mission of England in building free institutions throughout the globe, and Americans who thanked me generously and whole-heartedly for the fact that their own much-loved democratic institutions and all their ideals of common life, the things that were most valuable, most precious, and that they would not let go, the things for which Americans died, had been derived from England.

Then, still speaking of this particular point, I ought to say that the anti-English prejudice is fostered very largely by a group of newspapers under the control of one man—William Randolph Hearst. They wanted to know very much what we thought about the Hearst newspapers and Mr. Hearst's personality. Well, I said, I know the English, and they don't care a straw about Mr. Hearst, and they don't want to know anything about him, either. Up got a clergyman who said, "I will tell you what we would like to do with him over here. We would bury William Randolph Hearst fifty fathoms deep under the greenwood tree until the resurrection morning, and if I saw the angel with the trumpet approach that spot I'd run up to him and say, 'Gabriel, don't blow!'" That is just characteristic of Americans; it is the sort of thing they do, and do without a moment's warning, and one has to become accustomed to it.

TEXT BOOKS OF HISTORY

I am afraid also that the prejudice is largely one of religion. The Sinn Fein propaganda is dangerous, no doubt about that, but I never met with more indignation against it than I met in California. Still, they are powerful enough to sway the politicians, and they do it. The historical text books used in the schools, in the opinion of many historians, do not tell quite fairly without bias the story of the rupture with England that led to the Declaration of Independence or the story of the subsequent misunderstanding with England, notably in 1812, when we went to war with the States, and in the Civil War when officially we did not play a too creditable part. Some things might have been told a little more fairly. For instance, about the cause of the Revolution; it is stated that England insisted on oppressing the people of New England, the nucleus of the United States, imposing burdens of taxation without the consent of the governed, and so on—a long indictment. There is another side to that. Democratic England then as now was on the side of these New England farmers. Lord Cavan made his last speech in the House of Lords on their behalf; he never finished that speech, because he fell and died. He had come from a sick-room to protest against the folly that was driving a wedge of prejudice between us and our blood relations on the other side of the Atlantic.

Recently there has appeared a book that I want to advertise—"A Straight Deal, or the Ancient Grudge," by Owen Wister. That book should circulate by the million in both America and Great Britain. He just tells the story. He says he was brought up in a prejudice against England and confused England with her German king, George III, and he did not know the democratic forces that then or in the Civil War were on the side of America—men like Bright and Cobden, and the Lancashire cotton spinners who said they were prepared to starve rather than to see the north beaten in that war and slavery established there forever.

THE OTHER SIDE

On my first Sunday in San Francisco Judge Morrow of the supreme court of the United States, was deputed to give me the official welcome. He took out of his pocket and read that famous resolution of the Lancashire cotton spinners sent to President Lincoln at the very height of the conflict, saying that they were being ruined economically and they were starving and suffering because the cotton had been shut out from the Lancashire mills on account of the struggle, but that they were on his side and the side of freedom as against slavery and of union as opposed to separation.

I had received an enormous number of threatening letters from Sinn Fein and Roman Catholics and a cutting from the New York Tribune reporting a speech of a Roman Catholic priest in New York which began: "Britain has the heart of a devil. There is and never has been but one way of dealing with Britain—that is, by blood"; and this servant of God went on to advise India to rise and shed blood, and Egypt and South Africa to do the same, and Ireland to go on doing it. I took this cutting in my hand, and I said from the pulpit, "That is a perfectly wicked thing to say, and all the more so because said by a man whose profession it is to speak in the name of God. There is none of the spirit of Christ there; that is the spirit of hell. I will answer one Irishman by quoting another. On a great historical occasion Edmund Burke said, 'It is impossible to indict a nation.' The nation of Burke contains people as good-hearted, as kind-hearted, and as averse from tyranny as you or as any people on this earth." What happened? That congregation, on the Sunday, began to cheer, the applause was loud and long-continued, inspired by sympathy and respect for England. I concluded by declaring that, whatever the Japanese Alliances might or might not involve, there was no country on this earth with which Britain more desired to be on terms of friendship or to which we felt so closely akin as the United States of America. I think we need not have much fear when we know that the best elements, civil and religious, in America are on the side of that better understanding; and please God, it won't be long before we get rid of that ancient grudge which has been maintained on the other side of the Irish Sea.

There is in America a surprising amount of intimate knowledge of our domestic affairs when contrasted with our comparative ignorance of theirs. We don't know very much about their public men. They know as much about our Prime Minister as we do. Something amusing in that connection recalls itself to my mind. A man said to me in front of the vestry door, "I have come 250 miles to see you. People tell me that I am very much like Mr. Lloyd George—do you think so? Looking at him steadily I said, "Well, we are all sons of Adam. But the next time I see the British prime minister I will ask him if he resembles you." To my surprise he took that as a most agreeable thing to say, and went off smiling and chuckling. I do not of course know what version he will give his friends.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE

Mr. Lloyd George, by the way, is regarded with something like affection by millions of Americans. They recognize his genius. I was asked on more than one occasion whether it was true that in his earlier years and in his young manhood he was a preacher. I did not know, so I could not say. Now I come to think of it, what a magnificent preacher our prime minister would have made! Probably one of the very greatest preachers of the century if so be that his vocation had led him that way, as possibly it nearly did. If he goes to the United States for the Washington conference—please God it may be entirely successful in lifting away from us that shadow under which we have groaned for so many years of competitive armaments—if he goes to Washington he is going to get the welcome of his life. Americans say so, and you can feel assured of it. That is one reason why he may stay away, because he wants to get the work done. The more people slander and villify him over here the higher seems to mount the admiration and the goodwill of the millions of Americans who are watching his career. I am holding no brief for any particular party or any particular man in England, but when I was thousands of miles away from this country I think I never felt so near to our own prime minister or so proud of him. It was then for the first time that I woke up to the fact that I really loved him; for he stands for England after all, the principality of Wales does not monopolize him, and to hear Americans speak of him with admiration and confidence made me feel that we at home owe a debt to our public men; that is, to strengthen and not to weaken them; to believe in them at their best, and not to be ever suspecting them of their worst. Moreover, if you heard what Americans say about British self-criticism you would be more careful. Every word of detraction that is carelessly spoken or written here seems to be reproduced there and exaggerated by the propaganda to which I have referred. One old Californian of English descent told me to say this the first chance I had after getting home: Tell them not to run their country down; there is no need. It has as glorious a record as any country upon this earth. Don't let us belittle her fame or her contribution to the world's good.

In conclusion, let me say that there were some generous propositions made to me by one deputation and another to remain on the Pacific coast, and I think I would like to tell you what I said. If I were a young man I would do it because I should not feel expatriated, I should feel at home. But I am too old. When a man gets into the fifties he does not want to pull his roots up. I have been six-and-twenty years a Christian minister, and the greater part of that time has been spent in or around London. I am too British, you see, and I am too much a citizen of London to feel quite as much at home anywhere else. I have lived so long in London that in London I hope to die.

Sowing the Dragon's Teeth

[Two disconcerting errors crept into Professor Taylor's department recently. In the issue of September 8 he was made to represent Lord Cecil as saying that the League of Nations would "function with the United States." This obviously should have been "without the United States." In the issue of September 15 he is made to say, "There is hope in patience and evolutionary processes, but more in violent and cataclysmic revolution." The word "more" should have been "none." Each of these errors gives the exact opposite of the meaning which Professor Taylor wished to convey.—THE EDITOR.]

A New European Psychology

YESTERDAY the whole world rushed to the front to save France from Prussianism. Today those same nations, to save the future peace of the world, must save France from her own militarism. One hears this statement again and again in England. In France one hears execration of Lloyd George and expressions of bitterness toward England for her failure to stand by her ally in her bitter-end policy of revenge and military peace. In Germany he hears kindly words for all the other of her late enemies except France. At home we had listened to the war type of propaganda that is still carried on: we are told that Germany was already prospering; that she would soon be underselling all her late enemies; that she was still, at heart, monarchist and militarist; that she wished a cheap mark and so kept her money standards low; that the stories of poverty and near starvation at the bottom of her society were after-war propaganda; that she was not attempting to pay; that she was filling the world with propaganda and would return to her idols as soon as she could wean the late allies from France. But day after day it was borne in upon us by English leaders that the real menace is the continuance of a militaristic policy and that Paris, not Berlin, is today its headquarters. Englishmen have not suddenly become friends of Germany; they have not forgotten the air raids or the Lusitania nor anything at all of war's horrors. In the village of a few hundred souls one reads in the church the long list of young men whose memories will not soon die, and the tax collector will not soon let Englishmen forget the war that Germany made in spite of all England's offers for disarmament, her efforts at The Hague tribunal and her fervent last hour petitions for peace. But Englishmen who think are not confusing the issue; they have gotten over the war passion that damned all Germans as war demons and blessed all militarism outside of Germany as Christian and righteous. They have isolated the horrid devil that makes war and find his name to be not Germany but Militarism, and they are suspicious that his devilry is no different when he operates from Paris than when he operated in Berlin. As the sorry figure of Wilhelm becomes more and more ridiculous in its unstripped caricature of yesterday's All-Highest, the shadow of Napoleonism rises out of the mists across the channel.

The "Great Fear" in France

We went to Verdun, rode across the battlefields for one hundred miles to Rheims and down through Chateau Thierry to Paris. The hour spent at the great American cemetery at Romaine was one of those emotional experiences one never forgets. There lie 30,000 brave American lads, making an heroic end of as brave and vicarious a crusade for the right as is recorded in the history of mankind. All day we had been taking caps in hand as we passed the endless series of cemeteries where young Frenchmen died in the same spirit and for the same purpose. For one hundred miles we rode through a rich land that had been made a desert and is yet, even after three summers, still filled with great treeless gaps and hills torn and bare and lined with barbed wire. The prosperous little villages of yesterday are heaps of ruins; most of them, though they offended not, are laid as low by the curse of war as was Sodom and Gomorrah by the curse of God.

It is not difficult to understand why Frenchmen are in the grip of a Great Fear. Our protest against present French governmental policy is not born of any half-baked opinions or radical reactions or of any lack of perspective as regards the terrible chapters of history written only yesterday. It is indeed just those chapters that beget the protest; one cannot cross the hills of Verdun, where 900,000 men died—the great majority either lying in unknown ground where their bones were mixed with clay by the shells, or in graves where the only mark is that of an unknown soldier—without feeling that the most disastrous, unconvincing and uncivilized method used by man for the settlement of disputes is the appeal to the sword. It was not devised by reason but born of a barbaric inability to reason, and by reason alone can it ever be banished. It is disillusioning to find the very nation we yesterday sacrificed to save from the sword, adopting a governmental policy that can have no other denouement than another appeal to its bloody arbitrament. We can understand France's great fear, but it is impossible to understand why she plans only for the use of the tools that so nearly destroyed her.

* * *

Making the Most of the "Great Fear"

"The militarists are making the most of the Great Fear in France," said a brilliant and well versed English journalist to us in Paris. This man has spent many years in France, speaks the language fluently and is less a reporter of French events than an interpreter of them for his London daily. He explained the situation in this wise: The poilus were, by a great majority, farmers' sons. The small business men contributed their quota, but France is still largely agricultural and the industrial worker was conscripted to make the munitions of war while the village lad was sent to the front, his mother and sisters working the fields as they so well know how to do in France. The French peasant is very provincial; his farm produce is selling at a high price, and he today reasons out of two categories, viz: the war took our lads and Germany made the war; farm produce is high, therefore the government must be very good. So the French government, like our own and that of England, being made up of very conservative and hard-minded men—men who look backward a great deal more than forward—is making the most of the situation and forwarding the ancient policies of safety through force and power.

We must not forget French history when we talk of these men and this spirit. The glory of Paris lies along the Champs Elysee, with the arch celebrating Austerlitz at one end and the great Napoleonic Arc de Triomphe at the other. No tomb in the world is so garnished with glory as that of Napoleon at the Invalides. A century ago the world was adjudging France as it today adjudges Germany, and France has more solid years of military history than any nation in the world. The backward look takes her to that. Men like Foch and Clemenceau win wars and win for French minds the distinction of the finest military strategy in history. But Clemenceau can sarcastically say at a conference called to devise a better way than war, that he sits between a modern Apostle Paul and a Savior of the World, while Foch boldly argues that force alone gives security and that French security is best guaranteed by occupying all Germany to the Rhine, by denuding her of coal and iron and putting over her a taskmaster who will force her for generations to come to make bricks without straw. That is just the sort of thing that German militarism demanded for France when Napoleon was overthrown, and then as now it was England that called the halt.

* * *

Germany's Root of Bitterness

In adjudging Germany today we must remember that there is a new regime there. The sons of the men who were beaten into the earth in the revolution of 1848 are now in charge. The war brought one boon to Germany—it overthrew the Prussian Hohenzollern and gave government to the republican. We heard just one opinion everywhere and from every class there, and that was that no Hohenzollern and no Prussian Junkerism could ever come back into power. Many thought it entirely possible that the hardships of the peace could so demoralize industry and social cohesion as to bring a strong man to the front as monarch, but even monarchists conceded that republicanism would stay if the present government is given a chance to make good. Again and again we are told that the present regime would be glad to close the book of the past with the death of Hohenzollernism and build for a new world on the basis of peace and industry. It was never hidden from us that a deep bitterness was entering their souls over the French policy in what they call "the war after the war."

The cruel blockade that killed so many of the aged, the women and the children in the period between the armistice and the signing of peace might be balanced off against the cruelties of Prussian military policy. The leaders were very ready to acknowledge the mistake of invading Belgium, one of the foremost of the government ministers calling it, in a great German public meeting, "the saddest day in German history." But the things that are being done in the enforcement of the peace are the root of their bitterness, and there is no doubt that many a sordid German mind dreams of the day when France will alienate her allies of yesterday and leave them a chance to settle the score with her. This is not the dream of the new republican Germany; their hope is for a revision of spirit as time mellows it, and above all that America will come into world affairs as an arbiter of peace and call the war-maddened world back to the principles of President Wilson, under which they laid down their arms. The Silesian question, the quartering of black troops on the Rhine, the burdening of the empty German treasury to support 200,000 French troops in the zone of occupation, the threat of taking the Ruhr, the impossible conditions by which she must pay without being allowed the means wherewithal to pay, and the spirit of revenge which she finds in all this, is the root of bitterness which threatens the future peace of the world.

We plead, not for Germany, but for justice and those ways of peace that make for peace; not against France, but for her and against militarism. "I fought at Verdun for three years," said a French poilu, "and was taken wounded for three years to a German prison. My younger brothers fought, one four years and one two, and now they drag the last one off for two years military service. Have we not given enough for war? Yet our government prepares only for war; it betrays us who fought for peace."

British Table Talk

London, September 6, 1921.

IT is a pleasure to think upon the close fellowship between America and this country in the Peking Union Medical College. The new buildings are to be dedicated in the week from September 15 to 23 and the English and American trustees will be in China to take part in this solemn rite. It will be remembered that the first act of the China Medical Board of the Rockefeller Foundation was to acquire the property of the Union Medical College in Peking. Since that time with lavish generosity and with daring foresight the board has laid the foundations in China of one of the world's greatest medical schools. The story of the work in Peking is one of the romances of the missionary enterprise. In 1901 a young Scots doctor went to Peking to re-establish the medical work of the London Missionary Society Compound. He saw only the ruins of the hospital built by the devotion of earlier workers. Only one old tree had escaped the general destruction. Now on the foundations laid by that Scots doctor, Thomas Cochrane, there has arisen the magnificent school of medicine into which our American friends are pouring their wealth and science. The Boxer rising appeared to be an almost fatal blow to the work of the Christian church in this generation. In reality, it marked the beginning of a new day. Since that time the missionary cause in China has known a new birth and of that new life the Peking medical school is a sign. It means much that the medical profession of China in the coming years will be framed in a Christian atmosphere, and nothing is more clear than the purpose of the trustees to keep the college true to its foundation principles. The new buildings, now set apart for their noble purpose, may become the scene of a far-spread missionary influence. What may it not mean to Christianize in this way the future civilization of that eastern nation upon which so much of the world's destiny depends.

A Royal Chaplain

The death of Canon Edgar Sheppard has caused much sorrow to his friends; and it has enabled the wider public to understand the real character of the man whose ministry lay so largely in the court. The following tribute from The Challenge will be of peculiar interest. It is written by one whose tribute does not come without intimate knowledge:

"The death of Canon Edgar Sheppard is a grave loss, not only to the church in which he filled for so many years a difficult and very responsible position with a dignity and charm and simplicity peculiar to himself, but also to the many in all ranks of society who knew and loved him. When we first arrived, shivering with panic, to preach at Buckingham Palace, his kindness and tact put us at ease during what otherwise would have been a bad quarter of an hour; and he was the same in all his dealings—one of those rare spirits who can 'walk with kings' and yet never lose 'the common touch.' A man of genuine devotion and enthusiasm, free from personal ambition, full of sympathy and humor, keenly interested in the life of the church, and in recent years renewing his youth in the experiences of his son at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, no one could be less like the conventional idea of a royal chaplain. No one will be more widely and genuinely mourned; no one will leave a gap more difficult to fill. It is, we hope, not indiscreet to add that he rejoiced greatly at the change which has come over the court during the present reign—a change the reality of which he was uniquely qualified to appreciate."

The Congregational Union-Autumnal Meetings

From October 3 to October 7 this union will meet at Bristol under the chairmanship of the Rev. A. V. Viner. Some will recall a former session of the union in that same city on the eve of the Transvaal war. I can well recall a hot discussion among a group of us as we sat upon the downs above the city. It is a changed world which the church has to face today. And yet it looks sometimes as though it had changed less than men think. The program of these meetings appears to group itself around the missionary obligation of Congregationalism. At the great public meeting three addresses will be given on this subject: "Home" work will be entrusted to Dr. Jowett, "Colonial" to Dr. J. D. Jones, and "Foreign" to Mr. W. H. Somervell. Two of these speakers are known everywhere. But the third speaker, the treasurer of the London Missionary Society, is for spiritual force and statesmanlike outlook not unworthy to stand with the others. There is no man in this country who can bring to the work of the kingdom of God a deeper passion and a warmer love. He is a busy man of affairs. He has traveled through India and served the L. M. S. with rare devotion. But on Sunday afternoons in Kendal, his home, he will be found in the Sunday school of his own church. There are many others of whom this could be said; for them and for all of us Mr. Somervell will speak. At another public meeting there will be addresses upon "The Conditions of National Well-Being" and at one of the morning sessions the subject will be "Evangelism." Altogether it looks as if the Congregational Union is preparing for a trek.

Christ and Caesar

Two workers have cooperated to write upon this subject: Mr. Herbert Morgan, director of extra-mural studies, University College of Wales, Aberyswyth, and Mr. Nathaniel Micklem, professor of Old Testament Literature and Theology at the Selly Oak Colleges, Birmingham. They are both dear friends of mine, of whose work it would be hard to write impartially. Between them they cover a wide range of knowledge upon philosophy and economics and theology. They run very well in harness and their book has a unity not always found in books in which two authors have collaborated. If anyone wishes to discover what are the social theories which attract serious minds today as they face the confusion of the modern world, he cannot do better than read this masterly analysis. It will interest American readers to note that one of the representative writers discussed here is Dietzgen, whose last years were spent in the United States. He was no academician but "a simple tanner who learnt philosophy by himself." His writings, however, are significant as an outcome of Hegelianism. For Hegel's spirit, Dietzgen substitutes matter and his real interest in putting forward such a view of the world is shown by him when he writes: "In dissolving the dualism of mind and matter, the theory of the scientific method of thinking destroys the last pillar which supports a society divided into rulers and ruled, into oppressors and oppressed. In such a way Hegel, linked to materialism, is presented to the masses. With much sympathy and yet with relentless logic the writers of this book deal with this position. But their greatest piece of destructive criticism is reserved for Dr. Temple, the Bishop of Manchester, whose Bishop Paddock Lectures, "Church and Nation," are selected as representative of the way of the ecclesiastics. It is a fine piece of dialectic, but it is more than that—it is a brave challenge to the Christian church to abandon its timidity and its fatal willingness to compromise and to believe that Calvary which was the only way for Christ is also the only way for his people—'Calvary which stands here for the uttermost appeal of love that will take no refusal from those who neither understand it nor respond to it, and for a victory over men not by killing them but by dying to awaken their insight.' This is the way of Omnipotence. Can it be altogether impractical for us?"

Charlie Chaplin

In ancient times cities disputed the right to claim Homer as their own. Today several schools are claiming the honor of training the immortal "Charlie" who is drawing near this island of his birth even now. So quickly does a mythology arise that already this comedian has a halo of legend around him. Since the world began no man has made so many of his fellow mortals laugh, and so far he deserves well of us. But we rather overdo our interest in him, and he will be embarrassed by the number of his former schoolmasters and friends and by the attentions of sober and God-fearing journals.

The Methodists in Council

The immense range of Methodism in the world has come home to us in the conference now in session in London. The conference has 500 delegates. They represent 99,925 churches, 55,063 ministers, 97,461 lay preachers, 10,138,861 church members, and probably 50,000,000 worshippers. The conference has been busy upon many great concerns; but it is hard to know its inner meaning from the words released through the press. It is possible that greater even than the messages given and the discussions will be the fact of the Œcumenical Conference itself. Methodism is itself a real and living fact not to be neglected by any students either of religion or of human history. Last week I stood in the rooms which Newman had in Trinity College, Oxford; out of the window he saw in his youth the same scene, the long lawns, and Wadham College beyond. There are other rooms for which visitors inquire: they were at one time occupied in his youth by John Wesley of Lincoln College, and there the Holy Club used to gather. Where is the next revival to take its origin? Perhaps some undergraduate or some miner, or tentmaker is marked for this part in the eternal counsels. Clearly we cannot nominate him; and why "him"? Why should it not be a woman?

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Gospel and Paganism*

LAST week we saw Paul establishing a church in a commercial community, here we find him doing the same thing in Ephesus. Apollos probably preceded him to this pagan stronghold and by his remarkable oratory and philosophical approach interested a group of people. Much attention seems to have been devoted to "reasoning," indicating, perhaps, an intellectual angle of approach. There are various avenues to Man-soul. Take the fourth gospel: the writer, whether John the disciple, or another man by the same name, who lived in Ephesus (the Ephesian elder theory—now widely accepted) made his point of contact the "Logos" doctrine, a distinctly intellectual performance. Man-soul may be stormed emotionally or besieged practically, there is no one fixed way to win a man or a city for our Lord. In Corinth we saw Paul settle down to tent-making, in Ephesus we see him trying first the religious approach through the synagogue and later renting a lecture-hall and going after them academically. Paul was not a small man; he could match brains with them as well as emotions. As an orator he could distance them all, as a debater he could overthrow them, as an advocate he could out-plead them, as a lover of the Christ he could warm them into a new realm.

This matter of approach is one of the most important things that we have to consider today. Charles Cuthbert Hall went out to India to lecture in Calcutta to the students. Afterward I heard him say that it was all a matter of finding some common ground, some point of contact. I recall that he used Paul's tactful approach to the Athenians as a supreme example of what he meant. Paul would have made a good salesman! "Friends, I see you go in for religion, now in the line of religions I have the best thing on the market, look here—!" He was off and he had them with him.

Recently I have been talking to some prominent missionaries. I have learned something from them. They will tell me that too often our western approach to the oriental has been tactless and brutal. We have too often gone out there saying, "Oh, you know nothing, you are poor, ignorant things, now sit up here and let us tell you all about everything." Thus we have ridden roughshod over all their customs, ideas and emotions. This is an idiotic procedure. India does not need to have America forced down upon her. China does not need to have England fitted down over her. America is perfect for Americans; England is grand for British (as for the Irish—well! let them settle that) but we must not go with our arrogant notions to these foreign lands and people. Paul would not do that. I heard a great bishop say last week that Christianity is only beginning. "We do not know," he said, "just what it will be like until India has made her contribution and China has made hers." Does that shock you? I hope it does. It may make you think and that is beneficial. We have not yet fully grasped Jesus. Why, only recently have we reached the conception that he has any social message. We used to think he came just for individuals. Now we see that Jesus had a message for governments, corporations, masses of men everywhere and in all times: Is it at all likely that our western civilization has laid hold of all the beauties of Jesus? He was of the East, may it not be that India will get a more accurate picture of him than we? Is it not doubtful if a materialistic and practical people can find the best in Jesus, using their yardsticks and dollar-marks? Can you measure Jesus by noise, dollars and numbers better than by silence, soul-values and transformed hearts? Does a cathedral really hold and honor Jesus? Can you count his progress by the number of proud, rich families that "belong" to the "church?" These are deep questions that must not be answered with a mere wave of the hand.

These missionaries tell me that from now on our approach must be to appreciate and conserve all the good we can find among the so-called pagans. Tagore may be over- or underrated, but he represents one point of view. It is not all bad! What do you think of Gandhi? How do you like what the Koran says about liquor? Can you find anything fine in Confucius? Is Buddhism all bunk? Are the ancients all fools? Does America know it all? Is there no common aspiration? Are there no great, deep human interests? Is "comparative religion" sacrilegious? Has Jesus no new revelations, no new appeals? Have we exhausted his contributions? India will teach us much about Jesus. China will contribute a new value-judgment on our than the American church of today. None of us has fully seen Blessed Lord. The vast, united church of the future will be better, broader, sweeter, higher, quieter, nobler, more inspiring Jesus yet!

CORRESPONDENCE

Chords and Discords

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In a recent issue of The Christian Century Prof. H. Augustine Smith is reported to have recommended, in a speech at the Ohio State Sunday School Convention, ten hymns that all denominations should sing and that should be taught to all Sunday school children. The writer desires to raise this query: Why stop with these ten hymns? Why not include all of the universal hymns—estimated by hymnologists to be about fifty. Then there are a few that are approaching universality that might be included to good advantage. A complete list of these hymns should be published for the benefit of parents and teachers.

In another issue of The Christian Century we find Rev. Quincy L. Dowd criticising one of the hymns suggested by Professor Smith, namely, "Onward, Christian Soldiers," which is one of the universal hymns. Criticism of this hymn is as old as the hymn itself. Furthermore not a single hymn that has become universal has escaped the pen of the critic. There is scarcely a universal hymn that has not had words and whole lines changed to suit the fancy of some "hymn-tinkerer" who imagined himself capable of compiling a hymnal! A few have gone so far as to omit some of these hymns from their compilation. "Nearer My God to Thee" has been omitted because Christ is not mentioned in it. "There Is a Fountain Filled With Blood" has been omitted because it is "an exaggerated form of speech." Other examples are on record. These hymns have survived all such attacks and are to be found in all standard denominational hymnals—mostly in their original form.

The Christian Century itself in commenting upon the music of the International Convention of Disciples of Christ held recently at Winona Lake, says: "It is doubtful whether the rather commonplace singing of ill-selected songs by certain of the male quartets which luxuriate in the well-known 'barber-shop chord' is particularly edifying." It may be true that in some cases the selections were inappropriate, but we are somewhat puzzled as to what is meant by 'the well-known barber-shop chord.' You surely do not refer to the beautiful augmented sixth chord which is used so often in its various forms in our standard hymn tunes. Will the editor kindly elucidate for the benefit of his readers?

Conneaut, Ohio.

W. E. M. HACKLEMAN.

[Of course, a chord is a chord. No one could criticise a chord, any chord. But to revel in one chord, to translate other simple chords into that one musical form, and to be returning to it again and again and again, is artistically unimaginative and cheap, and it is this that makes so much of the male quartette music pall on the ears of listeners, like Mr. Hackleman, who are accustomed to good music.—THE EDITOR.]

Patriarch of Moscow Appeals for Aid

As the famine grows worse in Russia, the appeals from that unhappy land become more desperate. Bishop William T. Manning of New York recently received from Patriarch Tikhon of Moscow, the leading ecclesiastic of Russia, the following cablegram: "Through you I appeal to the North American Nation." There is famine in Russia. A great part of her population is doomed to a hunger death. The corn of many provinces, formerly the country's granary, is now burned by drought. The famine breeds epidemics. Most generous aid is needed immediately. All other considerations must be cast aside. The people are dying, the future is dying, because the population is deserting homes, lands, fields and farms and is fleeing eastward, crying for bread. Delay spells an unprecedented calamity. Send immediately bread and medicines. I am sending a similar appeal to the English people through the Archbishop of Canterbury. Pray may God avert his wrath."

Presbyterians Pay Their Debts

The New York banks have now received in full the Interchurch underwritings of the Presbyterian church. In order to make payment the church has issued certificates of indebtedness which will be met out of the proceeds of the various church boards. The debt was just a trifle less than six thousand dollars. Whatever uneasiness the New York banks may have had at one time is entirely gone now for one by one the great Protestant organizations have met their obligations. Thus the financial credit of the churches has remained intact through a difficult period.

Congregationalists Give Up to Baptists

As an evidence of the new day that has dawned in home missions one may cite the recent action of the home mission board of the Congregationalists in giving up their work among the Crowe Indians at Riverside, Cal. This tribe is known as being very responsive to Christian teaching, but there were only 1800 Indians, and two home mission boards competing to make them Christians. One of the Congregational workers will remain with the mission and continue his work under the direction of the Baptists.

Y. M. C. A. Welcomes Chinese Students

The income from the Boxer indemnity fund continues to be used to send Chinese students to the United States. Recently 120 of these students were passing through Chicago on their way to the various institutions which they will attend this coming year. It is to the credit of the Chicago Y. M. C. A. that it recognized the significance of these young people who are to be among the future leaders of China. A luncheon was arranged in their honor, and afterwards a reception in the lobby of the Y. M. C. A. hotel. It is often said that Chinese students come to this country, and are disillusioned with regard to the significance of Christianity. This may be in part because of their lack of social contacts with religious people. Of course a single luncheon cannot finish the work for these young people. They should be cordially received in the university cities.

Protestant Union Growing in France

The churches of the evangelical sort in France are drawing together, and their delegate to the Alliance of Reformed churches at Pittsburgh said recently that they must forget denomination and remember only that they are Protestants. "Protestant Week" was observed recently, and delegates from all the Protestant churches of France gathered in the area devastated by the war. Most of the meetings were held at Lille. About eighty people were present. The war has given a new vitality to French Protestantism as the French people, after acquaintance with their Protestant allies, have decided that Protestantism is not such a bad thing after all. In some cases women are being licensed as evangelists, and this in a country where the women have no political suffrage. The note of the meeting was optimistic.

Quakers Have Done a Wonderful Work

No religious communion in Christendom has such an honorable record for relief work in connection with the war as do the Friends. The two leading American branches, the Hicksite and the Orthodox, have cooperated in this humanitarian work and as a result the union of the two organizations may not be so far off. Since Russia has been closed to the outside world, the Friends have sent to that starving people a total of $600,000 worth of supplies. Under the stimulus of this great service, Friends' churches in this country are taking on new life. Many people who three years ago knew nothing of the teachings of this organization have been led to inquire into its doctrine.

Aftermath of Winona Lake Convention

Rev. R. E. Elmore, the minister who for two years past has been agitating the case of the procedure of the Disciples China missionaries in respect to so-called open membership, is not satisfied with the action of this year's convention at Winona Lake. In a signed statement he characterizes this year's action as a repudiation of the action of the St. Louis convention which demanded a conformity by the missionaries. He now says that the missionaries in China have refused to sign on the dotted line. The vote at Winona was one of the most decisive that has been taken on a moot question in recent years, but the subject goes to the roots of Disciples tradition and customs and will no doubt be agitated for many years.

Gipsy Smith Having Successful Campaign in Pittsburgh

Gipsy Smith is conducting a series of evangelistic meetings in Pittsburgh. His ministry is being waited upon by thousands. In his message there is sweetness and spiritual power and less of offence for the men who think of religion in modern terms than may be found in the work of many other professional evangelists. Rev. John Ray Ewers, pastor of East End church of Pittsburgh is the publicity chairman for the enterprise, with the result that the Pittsburgh papers are giving large space to the movement. A mayoralty campaign of great heat is being waged in Pittsburgh, and Gipsy Smith has publicly espoused the reform ticket.

Federal Council Speaks on Printers' Strike

Trouble in the printing trades extends throughout the country. In many cities the trade has been effectively divorced from the union movement. The Social Service Commission of the Federal Council calls attention to the demands of the Employing Printers of America that the men working in their employ tear up their union cards in return for the favor of employment. This is called the "American Plan." Thus the attitude of the printers is shown by the Federal Council to be not "open shop," but in reality closed shop, shops being closed against men belonging to the printers' unions.

Catholic Church to Give More Attention to Music

The Roman Catholic church in this country will in the future give larger attention to church music. Archbishop Hanna of San Francisco has recently sent a priest to study for three years in Europe. When he comes back he will be charged with the task of improving the music in all the churches in the diocese. The Catholics favor the use of boys' choirs, and already in a number of cities there are well-known musical organizations of this character.

Visiting Scotch Minister Very Popular Here

Dr. John Hutton of Glasgow is in America in attendance upon the Alliance of Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian System. While here he has been kept busy speaking on special occasions. The Presbyterian Seminary of Pittsburgh opened its autumn sessions with an address by the well-known Scottish minister, and he has spoken both in New York and Philadelphia. Of large build and genial personality, he has the freedom and fire in his preaching that is usually associated with the style of the American pulpit, and his subject matter is thought through in that thorough-going way so characteristic of the Scottish theological mind.

Billy Sunday Wants Fatty Arbuckle Released

Without waiting for any trial, Billy Sunday, the popular evangelist, has come to the conclusion that the movie comedian, "Fatty" Arbuckle, ought to be released since he "has been punished enough." This is quite contrary to the editorial opinion found in most of the journals of the country where one may find the editors saying that it is just such sentimental handling of criminal cases which has brought American justice to the low repute in which it is to be found today. The papers suggest that preachers who deal with these cases should avoid putting their emotions ahead of investigation of the facts.

Pastor Emeritus Wants to Quit

Dr. John Roach Straton has been visiting many unpleasant places in New York, and telling what he saw. This has aroused a great deal of protest in the membership. Dr. Robert McArthur is pastor emeritus in Calvary Baptist church where Dr. Straton preaches and Dr. McArthur has requested that his name be removed from the church calendar as pastor emeritus, as he does not endorse Dr. Straton's course. Dr. Straton attended the Dempsey-Carpentier mill in order to denounce it afterwards, and Dr. McArthur regarded this as being too sensational for the Christian pulpit.

Generous Gift to a Missionary Family

Few in this country realize the hardships that have been imposed upon missionaries by the changing economic conditions in the orient. While Germany and France suffer because of our exchange rate, our missionaries suffer because of the rate prevailing between this country and oriental countries. Rev. W. H. Erskine and family are leaving this autumn to return to Japan following a furlough. They have been supported by Central Christian church, of Youngstown, O. This church made up a purse of a thousand dollars which was presented to the missionaries at a farewell reception tendered them recently. This act greatly cheered the missionaries and they went forward with much joy. There are six children in the Erskine family. Rev. W. S. Lockhart has recently become pastor of Central church.

College of Missions Inducts Dr. Brown Into Chair

On September 23 Dr. George William Brown was formally inducted into the chair of classical Indology at the College of Missions in Indianapolis. Dr.

Brown brings to his new position a rich experience and a thorough training. He served seven years as a missionary in India, gaining there a first hand knowledge of the people and of the work of Christian missions. In an academic way he has also been trained completely. After taking a master's degree in Hiram College in 1898 he was for a time a teacher in the public schools. Later he studied at Johns Hopkins University for the doctor's degree, being a fellow in San-

Presbyterianism Seeks Union With Itself

PAN-PRESBYTERIANISM — that is, Presbyterianism of all sorts of histories, traditions, and present abodes, subdivided into 175 denominations scattered throughout the world—held its eleventh World Conference in Pittsburgh, Sept. 16-23. The official title of the gathering was The Council of the Alliance of the Reformed Churches Holding the Presbyterian System Throughout the World. Its first session was held in 1875, and its last meeting previous to the Pittsburgh gathering was held eight years ago. The purpose of the organization is to bring into closer unity of mind and fellowship the separated groups of those who are the spiritual children of John Calvin. At Pittsburgh twenty different countries were represented by 350 delegates, giving the gathering a striking international aspect. There were delegates from both the state and the free churches of Scotland. The two Reformed churches of Holland, state and free, are connected, though as "corresponding" members of the Alliance. From France came the Rev. Mr. Couve. The Waldensians of Italy, a group with a most romantic history, sent the dignified Signor Tron, who makes his home at Torre Pelice. Rev. A. Keller of Zurich, Switzerland, represented the oldest ecclesiastical tradition of them all, for had not John Knox lived in Geneva? The new countries of central Europe were represented, Prof. A. De Boer, of Budapest, bearing on his lips a thrilling story of the manner in which a nation forsook an ancient religion of authority in a day. The Scotch delegation towered like intellectual giants in the company.

FIRST MEETING SINCE WAR

The sessions in Pittsburgh were held in the fine old First Presbyterian church. Its gothic architecture and solid stone walls unadorned by the decorator were a fitting setting for a gathering of the heirs of the stern traditions of one of the most heroic churches in all the world. The solidity of conviction and the depth of piety of this group of Christians found a symbol in the beautiful building.

It was the first meeting of the Alliance since the war. Problems have emerged which give to all sensitive Christian leaders the feeling that we live in a strange new world. Presbyterianism must face famine and national jealousies. The cry for church union and the demands of a politically emancipated womanhood made a program whose dominant note was modernity. If Presbyterians seem to be more divided than any other family of denominations, they seem to be more keenly aware of the evils of disunion. Scotland for a hundred years has been engaged in the task of unifying its divided church, and one after another successful union has been achieved. The impending union of established kirk and United Free church will almost finish the task in that country.

The alliance came up to Pittsburgh this year feeling that the problem of the continental churches of Europe was the leading one. It seemed at one time that there would be no representatives from the continental churches, but the beneficence of some Pittsburgh laymen made it possible to secure representation from nearly every Presbyterian and Reformed organization in Europe.

The story and appeal from these churches was uniform. The war has dynamited the religious prejudices of Europe. It has broken down the powers which most repressed religious liberty. There are open doors of opportunity everywhere. The delegate from Czechoslovakia told of thousands enrolling themselves as Protestants without ever seeing a Protestant minister. This has resulted from a fresh and unbiased study of the history of their people.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN EUROPE

While the opportunities are so great for a rapid development of the reformed faith in Europe, the economic conditions have so impoverished the ministers that they can scarcely do their work. A half year's salary scarcely suffices to buy a suit of clothes. There is no money for the erection of church buildings that are needed in many sections. There was some veiled resentment of the Methodist invasion of Europe, but there can be no doubt that the Methodists have stirred up the Presbyterians to undertake a vast enterprise in Protestant rebuilding in continental Europe.

The discussion of the various Christian unity proposals was so cautious, not to say suspicious, in its tone that the British delegates felt called upon to administer a sharp rebuke to the speakers. Dr. David J. Burrell of New York was the only out-and-out defender of the present order of things ecclesiastically. He called Christian union talk "baying at the moon," and demanded practicality. He asserted that most of the enthusiasm for Christian union was to be found among high churchmen and heretics. His address was an elaborate attempt to show that God had made nature with both unity and diversity and therefore denominational Christianity is according to the divine order.

Dr. Carnegie Simpson of Cambridge University, England, went into an elaborate examination of the Lambeth pro-skrit while there. During the past four years he has been a teacher at Transylvania University, giving instruction in Hebrew and Old Testament literature. Dr. Brown is one of the recognized scholars of his field. He has served as chairman of the literature committee of the Mid-India Council, and is the editor-in-chief of a Hindi Bible Dictionary. He has left to himself an imperishable monument in a revision of the Old Testament in Hindi. At the College of Missions he will instruct in Sanskrit and Pali, the two classical languages of India. He will lecture upon the religions and philosophies of India. Thus the young people that go to the field after a course at the College of Missions will be equipped to save many years of valuable time in the service of their people. At the formal service of induction, Dr. Brown made an address on "The Psychological Obstacle to the Conversion of India."

Canadians Push Movement for Family Worship

The Presbyterians of Canada feel that the future of religion lies with the family. Two books are being circulated free in the homes of their country. These are "A Cycle of Prayer" and "Morning and Evening." Through the use of these prayer manuals many homes which hardly knew how to conduct family prayers now engage in devotions daily. Many families this side of the line have been writing for these manuals lately, showing the interest in the movement here.

Making a Ritualistic Church Popular

Unique among the Episcopal churches of New York is St. Mark's-in-the-Bowery. In a down town location, it was for a long time a hopeless problem for its rectors. In recent years it has combined two ideas into what it now describes as liberal catholicity. While the ritual has been made more elaborate, the church has established a platform on which dissent may freely speak. The result is that once more the historic church has come to be crowded with worshippers. It is sought out particularly by those with advanced social views.

Gives Space to Meeting of Church Leaders

The visit of the Archbishop of Canterbury to the General Assemblies of the two leading Presbyterian bodies of Scotland has been interpreted by Episcopal writers as a great act of condescension. In the Constructive Quarterly of September this incident is described in detail. The archbishop was invited to speak in St. Giles, the leading Scottish church, posals. He paid generous tribute to the spirit in which these proposals had been made. He found in them, however, a defect which in his judgment made them impractical. He asserted that Presbyterians believed that the church creates the ministry, while the Episcopalians believe that the ministry creates the church. He finds the Episcopalians unique in this emphasis for neither the Orthodox church nor the Roman Catholic church makes the ministry primary. The Congregational attitude toward the ministry was declared to be too casual. Between Episcopal prelacy and Congregational laxity he found a middle ground attitude in the Presbyterian system. He demanded as the first step toward reunion a recognition of each other's ministry by Episcopalians and Presbyterians.

THE LAMBETH PROPOSALS

The alliance is divided into the western section and the eastern section, with the Atlantic ocean as the dividing line. Each one of the two sections brought in a report on the Lambeth proposals with the suggestion that the section report be made the report of the alliance. The western report emphasized the errors of the Lambeth document, while the eastern report laid its stress upon keeping open the doors of conference. The two reports went to a special committee of twelve for harmonization.

An important suggestion was made in the progress of the debate. After a number of speakers had dealt sharply with the Episcopalian theory of the ministry, one speaker told the story of the Lambeth Conference. After the bishops had spent much time in sharp debate, all discussion was stopped for an hour while they waited in silence for the voice of the Holy Spirit. After this silence a much broader spirit prevailed, and the most generous document ever produced by these bishops came into being. The Presbyterian speaker urged that the alliance should also wait upon the voice of the Holy Spirit.

The woman question is irrepressible among Presbyterians as among all the older Christian bodies. Dr. Clarence E. McCartney spoke on "The Place of Woman in the Church," and his address was followed by discussion. Dr. McCartney favored the election of women not only as deaconesses but also as deacons who would sit in the sessions of the local churches. He charged, however, that the ordination of women to the ministry would bring in a flood of heresies. "From Eve to Mrs. Eddy every religious fad has found among women its supporters and disseminators," he said. Presenting statistics for the denominations that permit women to be ordained, Disciples, Congregationalists, Friends, Universalists, Unitarians and others, he showed that after many years of this practice the number of women ministers did not materially increase. Brushing aside the biblical argument against women preachers with scant courtesy, he argued on the grounds of expediency against the ordination of women. He urged that such ordination would delay the cause of Christian union, shutting the door in the face of the Episcopalians and Roman Catholics.

SHALL WOMEN PREACH?

The dignified presbyters waxed merry at the expense of the speaker, for Dr. McCartney is a bachelor. The representatives of the various continental churches of Europe marveled that in a country where women have suffrage they should be denied ordination, whereas in central Europe where women have no suffrage they are already recognized in many countries as full ministers. A speaker from the Presbyterian church of England recited the action of his church in admitting women to the eldership, and in declaring that there was no objection in principle to ordaining women. He made a textual examination of two texts often quoted against women speaking in the churches, and showed that both these texts had very poor critical support, whereas another text in which Paul recognized that women actually were speaking in the churches had the best of support.

Presbyterians have the theological bent, and of course there was an address honoring the memory of John Calvin. This was delivered by Rev. William Crowe of St. Louis. The most important of the theological discussions related to the doctrine of holy scriptures. Dr. J. H. Snowden of Pittsburgh delivered an address on "The Written Word," which was very creditable to American theology. Making a study of the psychology of human speech, he showed that no word meant exactly the same to any two men, though there is of course enough agreement to make conversation possible, but every word has its overtone, like a musical instrument. The failure to recognize the inevitable variation in the interpretation of any written word has brought about the division of Presbyterianism.

FRATERNAL GREETINGS

Sessions were given over to the consideration of the home mission problem, and to foreign missions. Greetings from other communions were brought by Bishop Francis J. McConnell, Methodist; Rev. Carter Helm Jones, Baptist; Dr. John Edgar Park, Congregationalist, and Bishop Brent of the Protestant Episcopal church. Dr. Charles S. Macfarland of the Federal Council spoke.

Among these spiritual leaders of forty million Calvinistic Christians, one finds a fine combination of intellectualism and piety. A characteristic fault of the whole Presbyterian movement has been a tendency toward division. This is being corrected in modern times by the cultivation of a quite contrary spirit, until one might almost venture to say that Presbyterianism leads the world in its zeal for the principle of Christian unity. In the lay membership of these churches are immense wealth and social prestige. While the alliance since its formation in 1875 has succeeded thus far in doing hardly more than opening up channels of communication, it may yet prove to be the bridge across which the divided provincial groups of Presbyterianism may meet one another in a fellowship both fraternal and catholic.

but made no reply to this gracious invitation. Intercommunion and interchange of pulpits are still delicate subjects, according to his way of thinking. Nevertheless the incident has lessened by a great deal the strain which has long existed between the Scottish and the English churches.

Rescue Missions Coming Back Into Their Own Again

The rescue missions in the various cities almost went out of business during the war. The coming of prohibition and abundant employment solved temporarily many of the problems of the "down-and-out" class. These missions are reviving again under the abnormal economic conditions now prevailing. In Chicago, Pacific Garden mission continues its work with an ever-increasing audience. The celebrated Bowery mission of New York is swamped with appeals for help. The last week in August the mission gave meals to 1,715 men, an increase of over 200 per cent over the same period last year. The mission will re-establish the midnight bread line if it can find the funds to do so.

Day Set Apart as Disarmament Sunday

The International Conference on the Limitation of Armaments will begin its work early in November, and Sunday, November 6, has been set apart as a day of prayer in the churches by action of the Federal Council. So important does the Disarmament Congress seem in the eyes of the Federal Council officers that they have gotten out a Disarmament number of the Federal Council Bulletin. In this bulletin one finds these impressive words: "These weeks before the convening of the conference call the churches to clear thinking and to earnest prayer. The nations need to recognize that armaments and super-armaments, growing ever more terribly destructive, are but external symptoms of deep-rooted moral disorder. Armaments and war spring from national policies that are under the control of fears, suspicion, greed, arrogance—in a word, from sin. And sin it is the church's mission to destroy." Already many denominational organizations have arranged to reinforce the appeal of the Federal Council, and it is believed that the church will unite on this special day with a universality of action seldom found in church activities in this country.

Theology a Hot Subject on the Coast

If anyone thinks that theology is a dead subject, he should visit the Pacific coast. It is said that men in this section do nothing but meet and discuss the new heresies. Recently those who love to call themselves "safe and sound" called a gathering which was named the "Pacific Coast Theological Conference." The sessions were held in First Congregational church of Tacoma. The old themes of the incarnation, the atonement, and the resurrection were given treatment. Nearly all the denominations of the great northwest were represented. One speaker spoke to the theme: "The Antidote for the Pessimism of Experience."

Southern Baptists Get New Seminary Campus

The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, the leading institution of its kind in the south, has been operating in a downtown district of Louisville. The seminary will be moved soon to Crescent Hill, a tract of more than thirty acres in a Louisville suburb. The new buildings that will be erected will cost two million in addition to the proceeds of the sale of the old buildings. Half of the two million dollars is provided out of the big drive which the southern Baptists completed not long since, and in which they secured ninety million dollars.

Something About the New Disciples President

The recently elected president of the International Convention of the Disciples of Christ, Rev. Stephen E. Fisher, of Champaign, Ill., has lived a modest but intensely active sort of life in that city for nearly twenty years. His election to the highest honorary office in the gift of his brethren comes as a recognition of the work he has done through the years. After graduating at Eureka college in 1900, he became pastor of the church at Gibson City, Ill. Later he became pastor of University Place church, of Champaign, Ill., which is directly across from the state university campus. He has been so popular with the students that the auditorium of his church had to be doubled in size a few years ago. So beloved is he by his congregation that he has had the unusual honor of being elected pastor for life by his church. By this means the church hoped to forestall the theft of their pastor.

Bolshevists Opposed to Free Speech

The bolshevist element on the west side of Chicago continues to show its zeal for free speech by trying to break up Christian gatherings assembled peaceably on the streets to discuss religion rather than economics. The West Madison Street mission of the Protestant Episcopal church was recently attacked. So violent were the disturbers that a decision was made by the mission to invoke police protection. Since then no further interruptions of the work have occurred. This mission in a month has furnished 1,584 meals, 316 lodgings and twelve men have been clothed. During the month 10,952 tracts have been given out.

Hindu Holy Man Goes to Trinidad

The converted Hindu holy man, Sadhu Sundar Singh, who during the past year made a profound impression in England, is going to Trinidad for a ministry there. The people of Trinidad are about one-third Hindus, and it is thought that a man of their own people talking Christianity in terms intelligible to the orient will be able to do a great deal of good. The Sadhu continues a ministry such as he exercised in his former religion, which includes a life of poverty and preaching.

Army Officers Must Observe Sunday

Since the appointment of a new order of army chaplains, there is evidence of improvement in the spiritual conditions in the army. Recently the following order was given by the Secretary of War and signed by General Pershing, chief of staff: "The sentiment of the nation concerning Sabbath observance should be respected, and no marches, except in cases of necessity, be made on Sunday. Opportunity should be provided for religious services, conducted by the chaplain or through community cooperation, and dignified publicity of such services should be made." This order follows some of the oldest traditions of the American army, General Washington having ordered his officers in 1778 to provide opportunity for the men to worship on Sunday.

Hostility Changed to Friendliness

The "rummies" are not very grateful to the W. C. T. U. on account of the loss of their booze and they are inclined to lay at the door of this organization a good deal of the responsibility for the eighteenth amendment. This hostility manifests itself from time to time in adverse newspaper criticism. The national convention of the organization was held in San Francisco recently, and to many of the leaders the reception seemed just a little chilly at first. This coldness turned quickly to good western hospitality as soon as the program of the convention got under headway. It was realized that the women of the W. C. T. U. are not fanatics, but educated and cultured women wanting only the best things for the nation. The big note sounded in the convention was law enforcement.

World Methodist Gathering in London

BY reason of its magnitude, its mingling of races, the strong personality of many of the delegates and their vigorous utterances, the Ecumenical Conference of Wesleyans is making a marked impression upon London, which is not easily moved by religious assemblies. The remarkable messages sent to the conference by representative people, including the highest personages in the land, indicate the great importance attached to it and all that it stands for. His majesty the King's cordial welcome to the delegates breathed the hope that their efforts would "promote the advancement of a deep religious spirit in the daily life of the peoples of the world, and further the movement towards a closer intercommunion of the Christian churches." The prime minister in his greeting said the conference represents the most remarkable religious movement of the last two centuries: "The English-speaking races owe a special debt of reverent gratitude to John Wesley, the greatest spiritual leader and religious organizer they ever produced." The Archbishop of Canterbury expressed his deep interest in the conference and his high appreciation of the welcome the Lambeth Appeal had received from Wesleyans. Regretting that absence from his diocese would prevent his personally welcoming the conference, the Bishop of London hoped "the Wesleyan church and the church of England will be the first to set the example of reunity, and so bring about the realization of the great reunited church of Christ upon which all our hearts are set." Dr. Clifford, who was made a fraternal delegate of the conference, remarked of the Methodist church: "Its mission is universal, its adventurousness admirable, and its self-sacrifice an exceeding great and precious promise." Leaders of other denominations also sent friendly messages. Viscountess Astor, M. P., wished she could be present at the conference—"but I am not a Methodist nor a missionary, nor even a person of much standing. The reason I should like to be with you is this: Each year I realize more that the world's problems can only be solved in the Christ way. So you who are striving to go in that way would help me along the road. We who believe this have a great and joyous mission. . . I wish somehow that we who profess to be Christians could just be a little more loving." The response of the conference to the king's message included the remark that "the Methodist church unites in an especial degree the great American republic and Great Britain," and the address to the President of the United States recalled Mr. Harding's declaration in his inaugural address that "America is ready to encourage, eager to initiate, anxious to participate in any seemly program likely to lessen the probability of war, and promote that brotherhood of mankind which must be God's highest conception of human relationship."

Queen Victoria. By Lytton Strachey. Author of "Eminent Victorians." Undoubtedly one of the great biographies of the time. Besides the picture of Victoria herself, there are dazzling portraits of many of the chief figures of the period — Melbourne, Disraeli, Gladstone, Prince Albert. ($5.)

The Mirrors of Washington. Anonymous. Says the Philadelphia Evening Ledger: "If it does not have a wide popularity it will not be because it is not the most brilliant appraisal of American public men in a generation." 14 portraits painted with a merciless brush of 14 of Washington's greatest. 14 caricatures by Cesare, 14 photos. ($2.50.)

The Mirrors of Downing Street. By a Gentleman with a Duster. Keen, sharply drawn character studies of most of the figures in British public life familiar to Americans. ($2.50.)

My Brother Theodore Roosevelt. By Corinne Roosevelt Robinson. Not a political book, but a human record of an interesting lad who grew up with a charming family. Containing many Roosevelt letters, and filling a gap in present Roosevelt literature.

Back to Methuselah. By Bernard Shaw. Author of "Heartbreak House." A clever reviewer of this latest work of Shaw's has aptly characterized it as a "drama in five tracts"—its five acts being an exposition of his scientific, political and religious creeds. ($2.25.)

GOOD FICTION

The Master of Man. By Hall Caine. This writer has taken for his new novel a subject which has had a great fascination for some of the foremost novelists—Tolstoy (Resurrection), Stevenson (Weir of Hermiston), Hawthorne (The Scarlet Letter), Scott (The Heart of Midlothian), and others. It is a story of sin and its consequences but above all "The Master of Man" is a heart romance that grips the imagination and stirs the emotions. ($1.75.)

Alice Adams. By Booth Tarkington. Author of "The Flirt." This study of an American family in vain pursuit of social and financial success is considered by many Tarkington's best works. Alice Adams, daughter of the family, is, of course, the chief center of interest. ($1.75.)

Pan. By Knut Hamsun, winner of the Nobel prize last year. Author of "The Growth of the Soil." "Pan" is published now as the third title in the collected edition of the Norwegian's works. ($2.)

The Brimming Cup. By Dorothy Canfield, author of "The Bent Twig." Of an American mother and her family—and of the struggle she wages in trying to decide whether a really honest love can survive. Said to be Dorothy Canfield's most notable book to date. ($2.00.)

Her Father's Daughter. By Gene Stratton-Porter. Applause for Gene Stratton-Porter has been expressed in the purchase of nine million copies of her works. "Her Father's Daughter" is delighting both the lovers of her nature books and the admirers of her fiction. Throughout the lovely, realistic atmosphere of these California gardenlands, and the happy surprises of the story, radiates always the winning personality of Linda Strong. ($1.75.)

Dr. Lyman Abbott of The Outlook
says of Lloyd C. Douglas'

Wanted—A Congregation

"Mr. Douglas's volume is not a story with a moral, but a moral in a story. A minister who is preaching to a small and eminently respectable congregation in a large church is invited to a birthday dinner with a college classmate; meets there three successful men—a manufacturer, a doctor, and an editor; is inspired with a new spirit of energy, enterprise and initiative, and goes home to put into his business the spirit which they put into theirs and to employ much the same sort of methods. It is a good book for ministers to read, because a spirit of energy, enterprise, and initiative is a good spirit for ministers to acquire. But to imitate the Rev. Dr. Preston Blue's methods and expect from the methods the Rev. Preston Blue's success would be a great mistake. Mere imitation rarely achieves a great success, and never in any form of industry which requires spiritual power. And methods which are employed by one minister in one community with good results may, when employed by a minister of a different temperament and in a different community, be fatal to results. I commend the book for inspiration but not for

Looking Toward The Disarmament Congress

THE INDIANAPOLIS NEWS says: "In looking forward to the great gathering of representatives of the nations that is to meet in Washington November 11, it is the duty of Americans to cultivate a peaceful spirit, and to recognize the fact that peace can be won and enjoyed only by those who earnestly desire it, are dominated by a passion for it, and are willing to work and make sacrifices for it. A good deal more than diplomacy is needed to bring it to pass. Probably not since the beginning of the Christian era has there been a more moving call to the Christian church. Does it believe in the possibility of the fulfillment of the angelic prophecy of 'peace on earth' or is the church itself infected with the foul disease of cynicism and 'practicality?'"

It would perhaps not be too much to say that the fruitage of the coming Congress will be according to the active will and working of the Churches of Christ. If their effort results in a general and persistent demand for disarmament—or approximate disarmament—that wished-for goal will probably be attained. If the Churches are lukewarm in their attitude, the advocates of "practicality" will no doubt win the day. Ten thousand American ministers thoroughly alive and alert to this great opportunity would perhaps bring to pass the fulfillment of the ancient prophecy of perpetual peace. Every minister should have at hand the following books, as aids in a campaign for the making of sentiment for disarmament.

The Next War. By Will Irwin. By no means a war book; rather one which points out the course leading to world peace. A book, which by its general tone and by the wealth of facts and statistics that it presents, leads to comment and discussion. ($1.50.)

Economic Causes of Modern Wars. By John Bakeless. A prize essay of William College, setting forth all the economic factors which have played an important part in bringing about modern warfare. The period covered is from 1878 to 1918. ($4.)

The Sword or the Cross. By Kirby Page. Prof. Harry F. Ward, of Union Theological Seminary, says: "Mr. Page has faced the issue and has found an answer that satisfies his soul. What he has written, therefore, deserves the thoughtful consideration of all those whose duty it is to teach the people concerning the moral and spiritual validity of modern war." ($1.20.)

The Untried Door. By Richard Roberts. The author, who is pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, holds that the world has run into a blind alley, while all the time the "untried door"—Jesus' teaching—offers a way out. He maintains that Jesus' teachings are practicable today. ($1.50.)

The Proposal of Jesus. A bold challenge to the Church to show that it accepts Christ by applying his ideals to the solution of modern problems. ($2.00.)

A New Mind for the New Age. By Henry Churchill King. ($1.50.)

The Religious Basis of a Better World Order. By Joseph Fort Newton. ($1.25.)

The New Horizon in Church and State. By W. H. P. Faunce. (.80.)

World Facts and America's Responsibility. Patton. ($1.25.)

Some Aspects of International Christianity. By John Kelman. ($1.00.)

The Fruits of Victory. By Norman Angell. A sequel to "The Great Illusion," containing in as clear and vigorous a style as before, his economic arguments for internationalism. ($3.)

Where the Faiths of Men Meet

By John Kelman

Bahaism

By Orvis F. Jordan

T. Reaveley Glover

By Joseph Fort Newton

Fifteen Cts. a Copy October 6, 1921 Four Dollars a Year

Four Great Books on Modern Religion

Jesus in the Experience of Men:

By T. R. Glover

Like Dr. Glover's earlier volume, "The Jesus of History," this one demonstrates afresh that "Jesus of Nazareth does stand in the center of human history, that he has brought God and Man into a new relation, that he is the present concern of every one of us and that there is more in him than we have yet accounted for." The author describes his purpose as primarily historical—watching "the Christian apostle and the Christian community brought face to face with new issues, intellectual, spiritual and social, and doing their best to adjust old and new." Professor Glover is Fellow in St. John's College, Cambridge, and University lecturer in ancient history.

Price $1.90, plus 12 cents postage.

Outspoken Essays:

By Dean W. R. Inge

Dean Inge, of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, is one of the great scholars of the Church of England, a Christian philosopher, a keen student of modern life and its tendencies against the background of history. His writings have given religious faith in England a new intellectual appeal. He has won attention no less by the fearless honesty of his inquiry than by his profound comment upon the problems which today engage the minds of men. While he excludes from his consideration no source of knowledge, his approach to the study of these matters is that of the man who believes in God, who believes in the teaching of Jesus, who, because of this faith, accepts the priestly vocation and devotes himself to the service of his fellows through the avenues which the church affords. This book is one of the most popular of the books of "the gloomy dean," as he is sometimes unjustly called. Dr. Newton believes that this book is one of the few current books that will be read fifty years from now.

Price $2.25, plus 12 cents postage.

What Christianity Means to Me:

By Lyman Abbott

As indicated by its sub-title, this book is "a spiritual autobiography." Dr. Abbott states his purpose in the book as follows: "I began the systematic study of the New Testament when I entered the ministry in 1866. Since that time I have been a student of one book, a follower of one Master. This volume is an endeavor to state simply and clearly the results of these sixty years of Bible study, this more than sixty years of Christian experience. The grounds of my confidence in the truth of the statements made in this volume are the teaching of Jesus Christ and His apostles as reported in the New Testament, interpreted and confirmed by a study of life and by my own spiritual consciousness of Christ's gracious presence and life-giving love."

Price $1.75, plus 12 cents postage.

The Proposal of Jesus:

By John H. Hutton

The thesis of this book is that Jesus—disregarding, it is true, the petty disputes and the sects and parties of his day—had as the chief message of his ministry a definite solution for the larger situation of his time, both political and religious, intended to avert the tragic and inevitable national disaster which he saw impending. The author holds that Jesus came into the world for the very purpose of submitting to mankind a program for both personal and social life, in the name of God. He was put to death because he adhered to his program as the only public policy which could save the Jewish nation. Also, that his program "still stands, and still represents his mind and what he accepted as the mind of God and the final ruling upon the conduct of human affairs." Dr. Newton says of the book: "The author makes the whole ministry and message of Jesus not only luminous but awe-inspiring."

Price $2.00, plus 12 cents postage.

These four books, with "What and Where is God," have been our "best sellers" during the past six months. They are essential books. Every alert minister and thoughtful churchman should possess all of them.

Should the State Be Compelled to Teach Religion?

CERTAIN Presbyterian leaders in the state of Washington report that they have established a federated organization devised to include various denominations with the avowed purpose of "establishing the teaching of the Bible as a part of the education the constitution requires the state to provide for; and to obtain the opinion of the highest courts thereon, including a deliverance of the supreme court of the United States, and also a plebiscite, if deemed necessary." The state supreme court of Washington has barred out the Bible from the public schools on grounds that are offensive to the Christian consciousness, alleging that the Bible is a "sectarian book." The answer to this offensive ruling in the judgment of many leading churchmen of Washington is to demand the teaching of the Bible by the state. It is hard to imagine that a worse calamity could befall religion than to have it interpreted to the youth of the nation by our public schools as now conducted. While the church will never rest easy under a judicial decree which calls the Bible a sectarian book, the remedy is certainly not that sought by the protesting churchmen of the state of Washington. They allege that since the Bible has been outlawed in the public schools juvenile delinquency has increased. There has not been enough Bible in the public schools anywhere in fifty years to make very much difference to the child. It would be more sensible though not yet wholly fair to lay the increase of juvenile delinquency at the doors of the church. The church's slipshod method of teaching religion a half hour a week instead of devoting much larger portions of the time to this task is as notorious as it is farcical. The lack of conscience among church people on religious education is a failure of church teaching. What the church does have a right to ask the state is that the time of a child shall not be so monopolized by secular studies that he cannot pursue those fundamental studies which are the foundation of all ethical and spiritual attitudes. It requires in most states no new legislation to secure this fundamental right, since it is already conceded to Catholics, Lutherans and Jews and may be secured by evangelicals on demand.

Evangelism or Revivalism?

IN many of the leading cities of the country this fall there are being held conferences on evangelism. Dr. Goodell, of the Federal Council, together with the secretaries of evangelism of the various denominations, will speak in these cities both in union meetings and in denominational groups. It is hoped to infuse into the church for the coming year a new militancy. Several years past there has been a loss of church membership. Last year registered a gain, but one year's gain is not sufficient to wipe out several years' losses. The methods proposed by this company of experts will be of great interest to pastors everywhere. Have the leaders of evangelism gone back to the discarded professional revivalists to learn how to recruit the churches, or have they gone to the successful pastors of the country who have really built up their congregations? It is one thing to ask Billy Sunday how to recruit the church. He goes through a campaign with his thousands of hand-shakes, collects his thousands of dollars and leaves the church to find its converts as it may. It is another thing to call into council such men as Dr. John Timothy Stone or Dr. William E. Barton, seasoned church builders, and ask them how to do it. The big idea in evangelism is the use of the local church. Pastor and people are the agency to go to the unchurched of the neighborhood, and bring the claims of the gospel to them. If the new evangelistic team comes with any program involving the reinstatement of the discarded professional it will mean that a unique opportunity has been lost. But if these expert counsellors in evangelism come with the purpose of lifting each communion up to new spiritual levels where it will have vision and power to do its own recruiting, they should be received with all honor.

Movie Producers Take a Hand at Self-Reformation

CONFRONTED by the possibility of a national censorship law, the movie producers struck a truce last spring with Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts of the International Reform Bureau. They recognized that unless something drastic was done, the hands of the producers would be tied with restrictive legislation. The producers now announce their principles of reformation. Fourteen prohibitions have been issued to the firms supplying the public with film. Some of these relate to sex interest. Suggestive acting, white slavery, illicit love, nakedness, sex dances, and underworld scenes are to be barred. Some of the prohibitions relate to vice and crime. Drunkenness and gambling are not to be made attractive and no picture is to instruct the morally weak in the technique of crime. Respect for religion is to be shown henceforth, for no picture is to go out that would be offensive to any religious sect, nor any incident shown that would imply disrespect for religion. One may hope that this will mean the end of those pictures of Protestant ministers which showed them as fools and hypocrites. One of the most important of the reforms relates to the abolition of salacious titles and advertising. Usually this feature of bad shows has done more harm than the pictures themselves. It takes a year or two for old film to be retired and the effects of the reforms now announced will be some time coming into many communities. It is well for public opinion to be patient and give the producers time to make good on their promises. Dr. Crafts has been willing to take these promises at face value. In case the reform is genuine, there are many ways in which the church might join hands with the movie houses to their mutual advantage. Some great religious films may yet be produced commercially, and when these are offered, the church can as well afford to give them free advertisement as to advertise novels which have been regarded as having religious significance.

Is Preaching Coming Back?

IF in recent years the minister has been administrator, financial secretary, general booster and hustler rather than preacher, there are evidences that a new conception is forming both in the clerical and the lay mind. Much administrative work can be done by laymen with occasional attention from the minister. Many a consecrated layman wants to be set at some practical church task, and when he moves into a new parish he seeks one. The most important thing a minister has to do is to preach. In all those great periods of history when the church has gone forward there have been great preachers. The high church movement of England, which, whatever one thinks of its contentions, is one of England's most aggressive religious movements, is laying a new stress upon preaching, and is developing men of great ability in the pulpit. As the current impulse in both England and America for a revival of evangelism gathers headway it defines itself more and more in terms of preaching. It may well be questioned whether the young men coming from the seminaries in our time are as well prepared for preaching as were their predecessors. The zeal for parish ministries of various kinds has obscured the fact that the pulpit is after all the dynamo of the parish activities. These young men have ideas, but often cannot express them. They lack both in the elements of successful public speaking, and in the literary power to frame crisp and convincing English. They lack, also, too often, the gift of sensing dramatic situations. As the times demand more successful preachers, these young men will have to learn to exercise more effectively the pulpit arts.

Questions that Stimulate Thought

LOOKING toward November 11, the local federation of churches of Wichita, Kan., has promulgated ten questions to "stimulate thought," as follows: What is the meaning of true neighborliness among nations? Can an American citizen be an adequate Christian without being neighborly in his attitude toward such people as the Mexicans and the Japanese? Is it Christian for America to spend more than 88 cents out of every dollar of its federal taxes for war purposes? Can international relations be Christianized without some sort of a league of nations with America in it. Can we believe in foreign missions and at the same time despise the "backward races"? On what conditions will a Christian America be able to forgive a defeated enemy? Ought Christian America to be preparing for the "next war"? Would it not be good statesmanship to spend at least as much in preparation for peace? Ought the Christian church to urge some "moral equivalent for war"? May conscription be applied by the state for other than military service? What is the Christian interpretation of "America First"?

Present Day Forms of Evil

EVIL, like epidemics, takes now one form and then another. As the influenza spread across the world, for the time eclipsing all other human afflictions, so does sin in a particular period take on a form peculiar to that period. In our time, one of the most prominent characteristics of evil is an excessive increase in hate. Racial hate is more bitter than ever before. The war has filled us with a horrid brood of hates, children of a terrible mother. Men who once lived together in peace and brotherhood in the same church are now divided over industrial controversies. There is also a strange aversion to work. One hears of slacking everywhere. The increase in this form of evil, has been laid at the door of labor union men. It is not to be denied that some misguided union leaders have encouraged a limitation of output, but one finds slacking everywhere. Who will say that the average clerk does as much work as he used to do? What is the record of the average college student of today. A single mid-west university will lose several hundred students in the first few weeks of the term. These are the students who came up for fun rather than for hard work. If one might judge by the number of automobiles at the golf club any afternoon this fall, one would surmise that even the captains of industry who preach loudest the duty of toil are not taking business any more seriously than they might. Present evil also takes the form of a mad rush for pleasure. Amusement parks, road-houses, and every kind of irregular pleasure have come into new popularity. The kind of debauch in which "Fatty" Arbuckle reached a climax of notoriety is appallingly common, if we are to credit the statements of Judge Lazarus. One may summarize these forms of evil by saying that materialism as a life philosophy has for the time captured the hearts of millions. It is perhaps not a philosophy, for it is not a well-considered attitude. It might be more accurate to describe it as the absence of a strong, clear sense of the reality of the spiritual. The mood of the time must run its course soon. Humanity is not long satisfied to feed upon husks in the far country.
